6334. Do you think that court should continue as it is, with the alteration in the form of proceeding that you have suggested, or have you any other suggestion to make?—I cannot say that I have considered the matter so thoroughly as to venture to say that the court should be abolished, or that any modification of it should take place further than that which I have suggested. At the same time, there are very extensive powers conferred upon the court by the last Glasgow Police Act, which hitherto, I believe, have only been partially put in operation; indeed, we are only beginning to discover some of them.

6335. Is there a considerable amount of work done by the Dean of Guild Court?—At certain seasons there is a very considerable amount of work done.

6336. Mr. Paterson.—You referred just now to large statutory jurisdiction conferred on the Dean of Guild Court—that is, in matters sanitary?—In matters sanitary, and in police generally.

6337. In relation to streets?—And drains.

6338. Have they not got the smoke nuisance on their hands, or is that taken to the Sheriff?—There is a private Act under which the Dean of Guild has jurisdiction in matters connected with the smoke nuisance; but it was found so cumbrous and unsatisfactory, that the procedure under that Act has now been given up.

6339. It was a quasi penal Act?—Yes.

6340. And there was power to inflict a fine of 40s. per day so long as the nuisance continued?—It was so.

6341. Do you remember the title of the local statute which conferred that jurisdiction on the Dean of Guild?—I think it was an Act for the maintenance of Glasgow Green.

6342. Has not the statutory jurisdiction now enjoyed by the Dean of Guild Court, flowed to it very much through local Acts of Parliament?—Almost entirely, if not entirely, through Acts in relation to the police of Glasgow.

6343. The additional jurisdiction enlarges the emoluments of the clerks of court?—It must, seeing that they are remunerated by fees.

6344. And the local legislation may have been promoted by kindred municipal bodies?—It may.

6345. Mr. Harrison.—Are there any, or many, complaints of the working of the present system, in respect of inconvenience to parties making alterations?—There is a good deal of complaint on the head of delay. Parties don't complain so much of having to vindicate their rights, but here they are tied up in a litigation which proceeds according to the forms of the ordinary Sheriff Court, as these forms stood before the passing of the Act of 1853. They are tied up to a litigation in that form, and which must be disposed of before they can proceed to erect their buildings; and that litigation goes on before a court which sits only once a fortnight.

6346. Do you think the public would prefer that the jurisdiction of that court should be transferred to the Sheriff?—I don't know whether they would or not. I should say they would.

6347. Mr. Baxter.—But if it is to exist, should the process be simplified?—It should, somewhat in the manner I pointed out.

6348. The Chairman.—You alluded to the constitution of the court as consisting of representatives of certain bodies that have property in Glasgow. Is there any dissatisfaction with the manner in which they exercise their jurisdiction? Is there any feeling that they don't exercise it fairly?—I don't think there is a general feeling to that effect. There may have been, in particular cases, a sort of feeling that the leaning of the court necessarily was in a particular way. For example: the Dean of Guild is a leading member of the Town Council, as well as of the Merchants' House; the Town Council resolve that it is for the public interest that the streets should be widened; the law-agents or chamberlain of the Town Council negotiate with a party, and he is obstinate, and will not give up his right; then he applies for a lining; the Corporation may say he is not entitled to build forward, and may throw obstacles in his way. I have heard complaints of that being done, and I have heard insinuations thrown out against the court in the matter, as acting under a necessary bias, although inclined to act quite fairly.

6349. Would you suggest any alteration in the constitution of the court? Has anything occurred to you that would be preferable, and practicable?—Nothing has occurred to me further than that which I suggested at starting, as to the procedure in applications for leave to build. The other matters which were suggested by a member of the Commission, I had not considered in such a way as to prepare me for the question which your Lordship puts.

6350. Your suggestions were as to procedure; my question is as to the constitution of the court. You have no suggestion to make as to that?—No.

6351. No other practicable constitution has suggested itself to your mind as better than that which exists?—I believe that to have the functions of that court exercised by a stipendiary magistrate, would be a great improvement; but I cannot suppose that, in the present state of the public mind on the subject, that would be in the meantime agreed to. Besides, it might be said that the work of that court was not sufficient to employ a judge.

6352. And the fees presently exacted not sufficient to pay him?—The fees presently exacted would probably be sufficient to pay him; but my former suggestion was, that the procedure which brings in the greater part of these fees should be abolished.

6353. Have you any other observations to make?—No.

6354. Mr. Webster.—Do the Burgh Court and the River Bailie Court exercise jurisdiction in civil matters?—Practically they do not. John Naismith.

6355. The Chairman.—Practically that has died out?—It has. There is sometimes a stray case in the River Bailie Court. I once had one.

6356. As to criminal jurisdiction, the magistrates act under the Police Act?—Yes.

6357. Mr. Webster.—The River Bailie Court is quite separate from the Burgh Court?—Yes.

6358. It has jurisdiction over the Firth of Clyde?—Yes, down to the Cloch Lighthouse.

6359. What sort of causes come before that court? Are they both civil and criminal?—I believe police causes come before it; but in practice the civil jurisdiction is all but obsolete.

6360. Who is the judge of that court appointed by?—By the Town Council.

6361. The Chairman.—Are there any Barony Courts in or around Glasgow?—Not that I am aware of.

6362. There are no minor bodies that exercise jurisdiction?—No; all the districts were incorporated with the city by Act of Parliament many years ago.

6363. As to police also?—Yes, they are all incorporated.

6364. Sir Edward Colebrooke.—With reference to your suggestion that the Sheriff-substitutes should act as colleagues of the Sheriff in the court of appeal, are you of opinion that the Sheriff should retain the power of appointing his substitutes?—Yes, I do not see any objection to that. Their position is perfectly independent as soon as they are appointed.

FRIDAY, 15th JANUARY 1869.

Members Present:—

Lord Colonsay.	Geo. Harrison, Esq.
The Lord Justice-General.	Jas. Adam, Esq.
Lord Barcaple.	A. B. Shand, Esq.
Sir Edward Colebrooke.	T. Graham Murray, Esq.
Jas. Campbell, Esq.	Charles Morton, Esq.
A. Orr Ewing, Esq.	J. B. Baxter, Esq.

6365. The Chairman.—I believe you are a practitioner in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen?—I am.

6366. How long have you been so?—Upwards of thirty years.

6367. Have you held any official appointment there?—I am assessor to the magistrates in the Dean of Guild Court, and in the Burgh and Police Court.

6368. Do the magistrates hold a Burgh Court there?—They have held none since I have held the office, except for summary removings, nor, I believe, for many years before.

6369. How long have you been in office?—About three years.

6370. Do they hold a Dean of Guild Court?—There are occasional cases there, but not very many, because the jurisdiction is only exercised in regard to ruinous buildings.

6371. Does anybody sit with the Dean of Guild in that court?—The Dean of Guild and his assessor; no one else.

6373. How long have you been assessor to the Dean of Guild Court?—For nearly three years.

6374. How many cases of that kind have you had within these two years?—Not exceeding a dozen, if so many.

6375. More than half-a-dozen?—Yes, I think so.

6376. Mr Baxter.—What is the general nature of them?—Those that are at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal are for warrants to pull down ruinous buildings, but one neighbour may complain against another. In one case, a dispute arose with a party rebuilding his house, as to whether he had a right to interfere with his neighbour's property.

6377. Does a proprietor apply to the Dean of Guild for warrant to build?—No; the plans have to be submitted to the Police Commissioners, under special Act of Parliament.

6378. Mr. Morton.—Nor for a warrant to alter existing buildings?—Not necessarily, unless you wish to interfere with your neighbour's property in some way.

6379. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Does the Dean of Guild judge of that?—Yes.

6380. When he is interfering with a conterminous proprietor?—Yes.

6381. Have you no cases of that kind?—There has been only one in my time, I think.

6382. Then the duties are more than taking down ruinous buildings?—Yes; the jurisdiction extends further, but it is not often exercised.

6383. Mr. Adam.—Did the single case you spoke of arise in regard to taking down a ruinous building?—A man was rebuilding premises; and in the course of his operations, it appeared that he could not complete them without interfering with part of his neighbour's property; and he applied for warrant to do so.

6384. The Chairman.—That, of course, was served on the neighbour?—Yes.

6385. And he resisted?—Yes.

6386. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Does the building of a new house not affect the rights of conterminous proprietors?—I presume it does occasionally; but in point of fact, parties are content with the sanction of the Commissioners of Police. There is a special Act requiring the plans to be submitted to them.

6387. Mr. Baxter.—Any conterminous proprietor who feels aggrieved, I suppose, is left to his remedy of interdict?—Exactly.

6388. The Chairman.—In regard to the Sheriff Court, does the Sheriff exercise any jurisdiction in reference to questions as to conterminous proprietors?—Yes; whenever his intervention is called for. I have known it exercised in cases of disputes about common courts and passages, and so forth.

6389. Or in regard to encroachments he may be applied to for interdict?—No doubt.

6390. In regard to the constitution of the Sheriff Court, as consisting of the Sheriff and his substitutes, have you any observations to make?—Our profession is strongly in favour of the continuance of the double Sheriffship, although we are of opinion that the number of Sheriffs may be reduced with advantage.

6391. What is the plan that has occurred to you about that?—That a number of counties should be grouped in the manner which has been already begun, by appointing the same person Sheriff of several counties, as in the case of Banff, Elgin, and Nairn, and others.

6392. You would have a Sheriff-substitute at each of the places where a Sheriff-substitute now is, or nearly so; and instead of having one Sheriff, say for Aberdeenshire, you would have one Sheriff for Aberdeenshire and Kincardineshire?—Aberdeen, Kincardine, and probably some other county.

6393. Would you have that Sheriff a gentleman resident in Edinburgh, and attending the courts there?—Our wish is, that he should have full occupation from his office as Sheriff. I do not think it matters whether he resides during his spare time in Edinburgh, or any other place where he finds it convenient.

6394. But you think that he should have a district large enough to occupy all his time?—Yes.

6395. In hearing appeals?—In hearing appeals, and in disposing of any other duties that may fall to him.

6396. Such as executive and magisterial duties?—Yes.

6397. Do you think there is any disadvantage arising from his attendance on the Court of Session, and pleading causes there?—Practically, we have not had experience of that, because none of our Sheriffs, though we have had great satisfaction from them, have been in extensive practice; but I understand from my brethren in counties that have Sheriffs largely engaged in business, that they do not find that it facilitates the progress of business.

6398. The Chairman.—You mean that their mind is distracted from their business by their practice?—Yes.

6399. Although they have not nearly enough of county business to occupy their full time?—Decidedly so.

6400. You say you have not experienced that in Aberdeenshire, because the Sheriffs you have had in your time have not been gentlemen in great practice?—They have not. They have discharged their duties to the satisfaction of the county; but they have not been gentlemen in large independent practice of their own.

6401. They have generally attended the courts in Edinburgh?—They have.

6402. And they see what goes on in the court; and they are in communication with their brethren?—No doubt.

6403. Have you considered any other mode of disposing of appeals? What would you say as to an appeal direct from the Sheriff-substitute to the Court of Session, without any intermediate court?—I do not think that would be at all satisfactory to the litigants, the expense would be so very great; and it is in very rare cases that parties wish to go further, unless it be to decide some principle, such as in the law of settlement and cases of that kind.

6404. The expense of an appeal to the Sheriff-principal is very small?—Very small.

6405. Do you think it should be continued in that cheap form?—Yes.

6406. Do you consider it also an advantage, that after the resident Sheriff has considered a case, and sifted it, and shaped it, and given his views, another mind should be brought to bear upon it, with the advantage of having before it the views of the Sheriff-substitute?—There can be no doubt that is a great advantage; and there is the further advantage, that the cases are more carefully debated after the views of the resident Sheriff-substitute have been got.

6407. The agents apply themselves to the points which have been indicated as the turning-points of the case, in the estimation of the judge who has considered it?—Just so.

6408. Have you considered any other mode besides that of having an intermediate appeal?—The plan of having two Sheriffs to sit in the appeal court has met with much favour. I cannot say that it has been very much considered by my brethren; but there can be no doubt that two judges would make a stronger court than one.

6409. Mr. Baxter.—At present you have an appeal from one judge to one judge?—Yes.

6410. And you think the appeal court would be strengthened if you had two minds instead of one?—No doubt of it.

6411. The Chairman.—Have you considered any mode of working out that principle?—I have not. I can see considerable difficulties; and it would require statistics and great consideration to devise a scheme; but I see no insuperable difficulty about it.

6412. Do you understand that those judges would be taken from the bar of the Supreme Court?—I presume so.

6413. And that they would have a certain district of the country assigned to them?—Exactly.

6414. And that they would travel about through that district?—Yes.

6415. Holding courts in different parts of it?—Yes.

6416. And disposing of the appeals at these courts?—Yes, at certain regulated periods.

6418. Entirely?—Entirely.

6419. Would you have them to review the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute both upon fact and upon law?—I can see nothing else for it, unless we are to have juries in the Sheriff Court.

6420. Would you approve of juries in the Sheriff Court?—I would.

6421. In matters of fact?—Yes; but only in certain cases; not in all cases, at first at least.

6422. In what cases?—Actions of damages.

6423. For assessing damages?—Yes.

6424. In other classes of cases you would rather have the judgment of the Sheriff?—I think in a great majority of them I would.

6425. You would have an appeal from the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute to the two ambulatory judges, if such a plan were adopted; and that appeal upon both fact and law?—Yes.

6426. Mr. Baxter.—Would you have a small jury?—I think five or seven would be sufficient.

6427. The Chairman.—Would you have the verdict unanimous?—No.

6428. How would you have it?—By a majority. Possibly it might be proper to allow them a certain time for deliberation before taking the verdict of the majority.

6429. You would prefer the verdict of the majority of a jury of five, to the verdict of the two judges sitting and considering the evidence?—I did not say so. If it were practicable, which I do not see that it is, that the two judges should take the evidence, I think that would probably be a very satisfactory court.

6431. Sir E. Colebrooke.—Are you speaking of two judges in the first instance?—No.

6432. The Chairman.—I meant the judgment of the two judges in reviewing the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute on the evidence?—Yes, I certainly would. I consider the jury would have had the evidence at first hand. The two judges have only the report of what passed, and they cannot judge from the appearance or manner of the witnesses.

6433. Then you think that unless the two judges heard the evidence taken, a jury would be a more satisfactory tribunal?—I do.

6434. Mr. Baxter.—But only in these cases?—Yes.

6435. The Chairman.—Do you limit it to these cases?—Yes, I think so.

6436. In other cases, not cases of damages, the two judges would review the opinion of the Sheriff-substitute upon the evidence?—Yes.

6437. And that, you think, would be satisfactory?—Yes. I do not approve of the present method of taking down evidence.

6438. What is your objection to it?—The notes are taken down by the Sheriff-substitute without the witnesses or the agents being at all aware of what he is taking down. I have no doubt it is taken down most conscientiously. Yet the parties have no means of checking an occasional error; and when the evidence is read over at the end of the examination, it is read rapidly, and it is impossible to follow it, and to detect at once any slight error that may be made; and a slight error or twist in the evidence is very often the turning-point of the case.

6439. What would be your suggestion to remedy that?—That the evidence should be dictated by the Sheriff either to a clerk or a shorthand writer.

6440. As in the old system of taking proofs by a commission?—The old system of taking proofs was unnecessarily lengthened, and it was taken down too much in detail. It might be a good deal shortened.

6441. To take down every question and every answer would be to load the record with a great deal of matter that had better not be there?—No doubt of it.

6443. Are there many advocations to the Court of Session from Aberdeen?—There have been in the last eleven years fifty-five bonds of caution lodged; but upon examination of them, I am satisfied that not one-half of them were followed out. I went through that carefully with the depute-clerk; and, judging from our knowledge of the cases and the reports, we could only make out that there was an average of not three a year. In my own experience in the time mentioned I have had two advocations against me, and only one of them was followed out. The other was abandoned.

6444. You said that the condition of matters in regard to the Aberdeen Sheriffs had been for a long time very satisfactory?—Very much so.

6445. Although the evidence was reviewed by a single judge?—Yes.

6446. He had the benefit, in reviewing it, of seeing what the views were that had been taken by the judge in the first instance?—Yes.

6447. I believe there are a good many appeals taken from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff?—It is very seldom that a case is not appealed.

6448. You have had the good fortune, I believe, to have very efficient judges both of the first instance and of appeal?—Yes.

6449. If counties were grouped in the way you suggest, so that the amount of business would occupy the greater part or nearly the whole time of the Sheriff, have you considered what kind of remuneration a gentleman of experience at the bar ought to have for being Sheriff?—I presume that the united salary of the Sheriffs would supply ample remuneration. £2000 a year or thereabouts ought to secure the services of experienced and good men.

6450. Has anything else occurred to you as to the constitution of these courts?—I think not.

6451. Do you think that the Sheriffs-substitute of Aberdeenshire are sufficiently remunerated for their time, and the position they occupy?—I understand that the salary of the Sheriff-substitute at Aberdeen is under £1000 a year, and probably for a man of his years it is sufficient remuneration; but I think there ought to be some prospect of it increasing. If he continues twenty years Sheriff-substitute, as he may do, it would be rather hard that he should not get an increase, when, if he had remained at the bar, he might have been looking for a much larger return. Apart from any reference to the present holder of the office, its duties are so important that I think we are entitled to the services of a man of considerable ability and experience, who would probably be insufficiently remunerated by the present emoluments.

6452. You think that should be put upon a more advantageous footing, either by immediate increase or by progressive increase?—Yes, where there is really work to do; but in many districts the Sheriff-substitute has so little to do that they are sufficiently paid as it is.

6453. Mr. Campbell.—I think the salary of the Sheriff-substitute in Aberdeen is only £900 a year?—Yes; but there are some fees from bankruptcy cases.

6454. The Chairman.—In some places the Sheriff-substitute has very little to do; but do you take into consideration that he is excluded from everything else?—So he is; but if a man is willing to accept an office at £500 a year, and enjoy leisure, he is quite sufficiently paid. I think it would be absurd to give him a larger sum.

6455. And you would not, perhaps, require a man of the same qualifications for a small place of that kind?—No, probably not.

6456. The questions might be as difficult as in larger places, but there are not so many of them?—No.

6457. Sir E. Colebrooke.—Is there more than one Sheriff-substitute in Aberdeenshire?—There are two—one at Peterhead, and one at Aberdeen.

6458. Mr. Campbell.—From your experience, do you think that the Sheriff-substitute at Aberdeen could satisfactorily discharge all the duties of the Sheriffs-substitute at Peterhead and Aberdeen?—I have no doubt that he would, when his duties permit him to remain in Aberdeen.

6459. Then you think it would be a reasonable and economical course in future to appoint only one Sheriff-substitute for the whole county?—I have no doubt of it. In consequence of communication by railways, it is much more convenient for many of the suitors to come to Aberdeen than to go to Peterhead.

6460. Mr. Baxter.—Do you mean the suitors in the Peterhead district?—Yes.

6461. Mr. Murray.—Would it not be inconvenient in regard to criminal cases?—I think it would be more convenient in these cases to come to Aberdeen. Peterhead is in a corner of the county.

6462. Would it be as convenient for taking declarations, etc.?—I see no difficulty in their coming to Aberdeen.

6463. The Chairman.—Is there any police jurisdiction in Peterhead?—The magistrates take the police cases, I presume.

6464. Sir E. Colebrooke.—But you speak with reference to the amount of work done by the two Sheriff-substitutes?—I think these duties could quite easily be discharged by one Sheriff-substitute.

6465. Do you speak from the number of the cases, or the extent to which their time is occupied?—When there are few cases, there is a great tendency to spin out those that there are.

6466. Mr. Murray.—Was there not a movement in

David Robert Morice.

Aberdeen at one time to have two substitutes resident in Aberdeen?—Yes.

6467. To bring the Peterhead substitute to Aberdeen?—Yes.

6468. Not to give up one of the substitutes?—There would be great advantage in having a supernumerary Sheriff-substitute of some sort or other, because the Sheriff is frequently from home on police business, and so forth, and on Circuit Small Debt Courts; and when that is the case, the whole business of a large town is left in the hands of gentlemen who are kind enough to act as substitutes without remuneration; and it cannot be expected that they should accept responsibility, or even devote much time to it.

6469. The Chairman.—You think the preferable course would be to remove the substitute from Peterhead to Aberdeen?—Yes, if two Sheriffs-substitute are to be retained.

6470. Sir E. Colebrooke.—Do you think that would be satisfactory to the practitioners at Peterhead?—I believe not.

6471. Mr. Murray.—Do you think the criminal business of the county could be equally well managed?—I have no doubt of it. I think it would be better managed. It would be in one hand.

6472. Mr. Orr Ewing.—You said that almost all the decisions of the Sheriff-substitute were appealed to the Sheriff?—Invariably.

6473. Are they often reversed?—Not very often.

6474. In what proportion?—It is impossible for me to say. During the last year, in my own practice, which is not very large, I had two reversals.

6475. Will a third of them be reversed?—No, nothing like that.

6477. But they are so satisfied with the decision, that they would never think of appealing it to a higher court?—They think it better to put up with it than to go to the Court of Session.

6478. Because of the expense?—Yes.

6479. Mr. Campbell.—If an appeal was as cheap, or about as cheap, to the Court of Session as it is to the Sheriff of the county, don't you think that the decisions of the Sheriff of the county would be as often appealed as those of the Sheriff-substitute?—I have no doubt of it. I think that most likely.

6480. It is the cheapness of the tribunal, and not its satisfactory results, that is generally the reason of the appeals?—The expense is so trifling, that at most it is only an additional £5 that the party loses in the highest class of cases, and it may cost only £2; and they just take the chance.

6481. Mr. Adam.—You said you would approve of the introduction of juries into the Sheriff Court. Have you yourself had any experience of jury trials?—I have had the conduct of several jury trials in the Supreme Court.

6482. Do you happen to know the opinion of your brethren about the introduction of jury trials?—The opinion of my brethren is very strongly against the present system of jury trials; so much so, that they resolved to represent that it should be abolished entirely.

6483. Is it a different system you want to introduce into the Sheriff Court?—Very different.

6484. A smaller jury?—A smaller jury, and avoiding the expense of counsel, and printing, and a great many other things.

6485. Then the objection they at present entertain is to the expense, and not to the jury as being the judges of the fact?—My own opinion is in favour of juries, even in the Supreme Court, in the class of cases in which they are generally used; but the opinion of a large majority of my brethren was against them altogether, not only on the ground of the expense, but on the ground of the uncertainty of their finding.

6486. But you do not share that opinion?—I do not.

6487. Mr. Baxter.—Have you had any experience of the expense of jury trial in the Supreme Court?—Yes.

6488. Can you give any instance of that?—I can. In a case which was tried before the present Lord President, at the sitting in April 1867, a verdict was given in my client's favour for £566. Of course that carried costs, and we recovered, of taxed costs from the other side, £476. The accounts of the Edinburgh agents for the pursuer, for whom I acted, came to £654.

6489. That was more than the sum recovered?—Nearly £200 more.

6490. Mr. Adam.—What was the name of the case?—Milne and Morison versus Bartolomeo.

6491. Mr. Baxter.—Had you an account of your own?—I had an account of £69, including outlay.

6492. Did you recover it from the opposite party?—Only the expense of the precognitions.

6493. Would that be a small part of it?—Very small.

6495. What was the nature of the case?—The case arose out of a collision between two ships.

6496. Lord Barcaple.—Do you remember how many witnesses were examined in it?—We had four pilots from the south country. I don't think there could have been a dozen witnesses on each side. The defender was an Italian, and the evidence of some of his witnesses was taken on commission.

6497. Where?—In Edinburgh.

6498. Did they not attend the trial?—They had gone away, and we accepted their evidence.

6499. You think there were only a dozen witnesses examined altogether on both sides?—No; on one side. Exclusive of the seamen, whose evidence was given on commission, there may have been six or eight others.

6500. The Chairman.—Were any of them men of skill?—Yes; some of them.

6501. Mr. Adam.—What part of the expense might have been saved?—I cannot say. When I get into an Edinburgh agent's account, I give it up as hopeless.

6502. Lord Barcaple.—How many counsel were there?—Two on each side.

6503. Mr. Baxter.—Do you know that clients are very much afraid of juries?—No doubt about it.

6504. Mr. Adam.—Then clients don't like jury trials?—They do not.

6505. Mr. Baxter.—Have you seen cases settled when they were just about to go to trial?—I was concerned in two cases last year, and both of them went off at the last moment: one after the case was opened, and the other before the jury was sworn.

6506. Was that from the terror and uncertainty of juries?—I don't know, but I presume it was, because they thought it better to settle.

6507. I suppose the whole expense had been incurred in these cases?—In one case the jury were not sworn, and we saved their fees, and probably a second day's expense.

6508. The Chairman.—Was it the terror of jury trial that made them settle after the case had commenced?—I cannot answer that. The case was settled by counsel in the Parliament House.

6509. Sir E. Colebrooke.—You are not apprehensive that jury trials would be conducted as expensively before the Sheriff Court?—Oh no.

6510. A number of witnesses would still be necessary?—Yes; but they would be near home. It is bringing the witnesses to Edinburgh that is one great cause of expense; and we are often obliged to keep them there for days and weeks. I had witnesses in Edinburgh last summer for a week.

6511. Lord Barcaple.—You think that a serious part of the expense?—Yes.

6512. Would that not be got over by having the trial at Aberdeen, whatever court it was before?—Yes.

6513. You used to have trials at Aberdeen?—Not for a long time in civil cases.

6514. But you used to have them?—I don't recollect any for twelve years.

6515. What made you give up having them there?—The court discourages them.

6516. How do you know that?—Our counsel tell us that they do not want to come. They say it is not convenient or desirable.

6517. That is not telling you that the court discourage them?—They say the court does not approve of it.

6518. Did any counsel ever tell you that?—I have a strong impression of that kind.

6519. Mr. Harrison.—Do you think the public will have more confidence in the decision of a jury than in the decision of the Sheriff?—Do you mean a jury trial in the Sheriff Court?

6520. Yes?—I think so; probably not at first. It would require a little preparation.

6521. The Chairman.—You said the opinion of your brethren was adverse to jury trial altogether?—Yes; of a large majority of them.

6522. They have not the same confidence in a jury that you have?—No.

6524. And your profession would be inclined to try that experiment?—They would rather have them there than in Edinburgh.

6525. Lord Barcaple.—Do you think the balance of expense would be in favour of that?—Yes.

6526. There would be additional expense for counsel?—Yes.

6527. But you think the balance would be in favour of having the trials in Aberdeen?—Yes.

6528. And you think it would be better on the spot for other reasons?—It would let people understand the working of the thing better.

6529. Sir E. Colebrooke.—You stated that you thought that the time of the Sheriff-principal should be fully occupied with his duties?—Yes.

6530. Is that the opinion of the body of procurators whom you represent?—Yes.

6531. Would not the Sheriff in that case have to reside in the county?—I think not. I don't think it matters whether he reside in the county or in Edinburgh.

6532. But if his full time were occupied, must he not reside in the county?—But his full time means a reasonable amount of time, and communication is very rapid now-a-days.

6533. He would not be able to continue his practice in Edinburgh?—No.

6534. Then you would expect that he should give up his practice?—Yes.

6535. But you have not had experience of the combination of considerable practice and the execution of the Sheriff's duties in your county?—Not in our county.

6536. Your opinion is given more with reference to what you have heard in other counties?—Yes.

6537. Mr. Adam.—Would you take away all original jurisdiction from the appeal Sheriff?—There are one or two Acts of Parliament where the procedure is directed to be taken by the principal Sheriff. I can see no advantage in that; but, at common law, I presume the Sheriff-substitute has the original jurisdiction in all cases.

6538. But at present the Sheriff may go down and sit in all cases in which the Sheriff-substitute can sit?—It is held not. They decline to sit in the ordinary courts; a party would lose his appeal in that case.

6539. Mr. Campbell.—Are you not aware that for a considerable time Sheriff Logan sat as a judge in the first instance in Forfarshire?—I am aware he did, but nobody has followed his example.

6540. But the competency of his doing so was never questioned?—It is questioned.

6541. Mr. Baxter.—I believe that he did so to assist a very aged substitute?—I forget the particular circumstances.

6542. The Chairman.—Does anything occur to you about the constitution of the court?—No.

6543. Would you extend the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Court in any respect?—My opinion is that the jurisdiction should be extended so as to be co-ordinate with that of the Supreme Court in all respects. I ought to say, however, that the majority of a meeting of our society, called for the purpose, objected to the extension of the jurisdiction to questions of legitimacy, marriage, and divorce. That was the only difficulty that was raised.

6544. Is it your own opinion that it should extend to these?—My own opinion is that it is quite unnecessary, and would lead to hardship, to exclude these cases.

6545. You include cases of declarator of marriage and of legitimacy, as well as questions of divorce?—Yes.

6546. Do you think that the Sheriff should have jurisdiction over parties who are co-defenders, though living in different counties, if one of them is within that particular county?—I think so, if the subject-matter of dispute arises in his county.

6547. Would you have the jurisdiction confined to the Sheriff within whose county the cause of action had originated?—Either that, or follow the party.

6548. In such questions, or in questions of great value—in matters of heritage, and so forth—would you give the defender a power to remove the case into the Court of Session?—Yes, I think so.

6549. At an early stage?—At an early stage.

6550. Mr. Baxter.—Would you do that above any limit?—I don't think it should be done in cases of trifling value; but I would be very reluctant to debar a party who considered that his interest was likely to suffer, from going to the Supreme Court if he chose. It should not be in very small cases, because that would lead to oppression.

6551. You don't allow the defender to remove the cause in actions regarding debt or moveables?—You may commence the action in the Supreme Court.

6552. But why would you allow a defender to choose in the case of heritage?—You are entitled to advocate for a jury trial if the value is above £40.

6553. That is when a proof is allowed?—Yes.

6556. £70 in all?—Yes; and my remuneration as factor was £13.

6557. The Lord Justice-General.—Does the £70 include the £13?—No.

6558. Lord Barcaple.—Was there any discussion at the discharge?—No, there was not.

6559. Can you tell us in what the bulk of the expense of the discharge consisted?—Principally in intimation to the parties, I suppose.

6560. That would be the same in both?—No; because some of the parties were petitioners. Then there was a remit to an accountant, and a fee to him; and there was printing.

6561. The Lord Justice-General.—Have you got the accounts which you paid in that case for the procedure?—Not here.

6562. But you could produce them?—Yes.

6563. Then be kind enough to send them to the secretary?—I will do so.

6564. The Chairman.—What was the name of the case?—The name of the man was Riach.

6565. The Lord Justice-General.—Do you recollect in which Division it was?—I do not.

David Robert Morice.

6566. About what time was it?—It must be about three years since I was appointed. It did not last above six months.

6567. Then it would be before the Lord Ordinary?—Yes. I do not think it was in the Division.

6568. Sir E. Colebrooke.—It was unopposed?—It was unopposed.

6569. Mr. Shand.—You are aware that in cases at present it is necessary to print papers and box them to all the judges?—There will be a saving in future, because under the new Titles Act the necessity for a petition to make up titles is abolished.

6570. It may be combined with the application?—Yes.

6571. Don't you think considerable saving might be effected if manuscript petitions were allowed, and if papers were not printed and boxed to the judges?—I don't think there would be great saving if you had to serve a number of copies. The expense of the copies, when the number is considerable, comes to more than the printing.

6572. And you have frequently to serve copies?—Yes.

6573. Sir E. Colebrooke.—Are the expenses which you have mentioned such as would be saved in the Sheriff Court?—I think a judicial factor might be very well appointed there for £5.

6574. Lord Barcaple.—You would have the same expense of service, I suppose?—Not quite, because the fees of messengers are higher than those of Sheriff officers.

6575. The Lord Justice-General.—Is there not a clause in the new Court of Session Act, allowing all services to be made by Sheriff officers?—No; I don't think so. I think that is only in the absence of a messenger.

6576. Lord Barcaple.—You would still have the same expense of a report by an accountant on the discharge?—Yes.

6577. But you are satisfied there would be a large saving notwithstanding that?—I am quite sure of that.

6578. Mr. Baxter.—The case you mention was that of a lapsed trust?—Yes.

6579. Have you any other instance?—I have another instance of the same kind, where the sum consisted of an heritable bond for £190, and the expense of appointing a factor was £28, 18s.

6581. What was the expense of that?—The expense of the discharge and the necessary petition came to £18.

6582. Mr. Shand.—If such appointments were made by the Sheriff, do you think it would be desirable that the factor should report his proceedings to the accountant of court?—Decidedly.

6583. You think it would be useful that an officer in Edinburgh should have a supervision of all these proceedings?—I think so; just like the accountant in bankruptcy, who superintends all sequestrations.

6584. Mr. Murray.—At present judicial factors are not under that control?—They are not under any control at all till they apply for their discharge. There is an old Act of Sederunt requiring them to lodge their accounts annually; but there is no officer to enforce that, or to see that they do it.

6585. Do you think it would be an advantage to bring all judicial factories under the supervision of the accountant of court?—I think it would be a very great advantage.

6586. The Chairman.—Do you think there is any greater publicity given to the proceedings in the Supreme Court, so that all having an interest may appear, than in regard to the proceedings before the Sheriff?—I think not. They never reach the public prints, and they are more likely to attract attention if conducted in a court in the neighbourhood of the parties.

6587. Have you any observations to make upon the procedure in causes before the Sheriff?—I think it would be desirable to abolish condescendence and defences, and to have the record closed by a minute, probably with the addition of a replication by the pursuer. There are very rare cases indeed, where condescendence and answers are really required in Sheriff Court processes.

6588. Lord Barcaple.—At present it is the exception to have condescendence and answers?—It is the exception even at present; still, whenever there is a case of any importance, there is almost always a condescendence.

6589. You think the exception is too frequently made in your court?—I think so.

6590. The Chairman.—Would you reserve the power to order condescendence and answers?—I am rather inclined to say No; because, when the Sheriff has the power to order it, if the agents feel in any way nervous about the subject, and urge it, it is very difficult for him to refuse if he has the power to allow it.

6591. Lord Barcaple.—Can he form any good judgment as to whether it is necessary or not?—I do not think he can,—not from the sort of statements that are made to him.

6592. You think that the parties and their advisers know better about their case in that matter?—Yes.

6593. Mr. Shand.—Would you give the Sheriff-substitute power to allow amendments at any stage of a cause?—Decidedly.

6594. Adopting the provision which we have now in the Court of Session Act?—Yes.

6595. The Chairman.—Amendments or additions?—Or additions, paying expenses if any expense has been occasioned.

6596. Have you any other suggestion?—I think we have reason to complain of the complication of the forms of process, there being three different Acts regulating it.

6597. Mr. Baxter.—You mean the small debt process, the debts recovery process, and the ordinary court process?—Yes; I think they ought to be simplified and reduced to one. I see no objection to one form of summons standing for the whole; and it would depend entirely on the value of the case what steps should afterwards be taken. We are quite clear for extending the small debt jurisdiction in all cases, and not only in the case of 'certain debts.'

6598. What would you do with regard to the Debts Recovery Act?—I would abolish it. The present Small Debt Court should take cases up to £25.

6599. And the cases above £25?—Above that, let them be in the ordinary court.

6600. Would the summons in the Small Debt Court serve for the ordinary court?—I think, with a very slight modification, it might.

6601. The summons in the ordinary court is rather an illogical writ?—No doubt of it.

6602. The Chairman.—You would bring the summons of the ordinary court more into conformity with the small debt summons?—Yes.

6603. Sir E. Colebrooke.—Can you state whether there is any large number of the causes that come before the Sheriff Court which are undefended?—Yes; there is a large number of decrees in absence.

6604. Could you state the proportion?—No.

6605. But there is a great number?—Yes.

6606. And therefore it is of importance that the first proceeding should be as cheap as possible?—Yes.

6607. Mr. Shand.—Under the Debts Recovery Act, it lies with the Sheriff-substitute to state the pleas for the defender, and practically to make up the record. Do you approve of that, or do you think that the agent for the defender should present his own defences?—Our Sheriff-substitute intimated to us that it was the duty of the agents to assist the court, and that he would expect that they should state the grounds of defence themselves; and they always do it.

6608. Does he write the defence?—No; it is handed in to him, and he revises and adjusts it.

6609. Is that the course that you propose should be followed in ordinary actions?—Yes. The theory of the present Sheriff Court Act is, that the Sheriff should frame the minute of defence; but we always do it ourselves.

6610. And that practice you propose to continue?—Yes. I do not think the form of the minute of defence is very successful, but that could be easily altered.

6611. Have you any suggestion to make about that?—I think some provision should be put in with reference to preliminary pleas. There is no provision made for preliminary defences at present.

6612. Lord Barcaple.—How do you deal in your court with preliminary defences when they are stated?—The Sheriff either reserves them, or appoints parties to be heard on them.

6613. But he minutes them?—Yes.

6614. You mean that there is not a stage appointed by the Act at which they are to be disposed of?—There is not; and it is apparently not contemplated in the table of fees. A case I had was thrown out on a preliminary plea, and we found there was no provision for a fee for a debate in the case.

6615. It was debated when the defence was stated?—Yes.

6616. Would it make any difference upon the expense of preparing the summons in an action where there is decree in absence, that it should be in the form of the small debt summons, rather than in the present form?—I do not think it would make any difference.

6617. You would prefer a better form of summons?—A form of summons that would do for all actions. The present form is particularly short.

6618. Mr. Campbell.—If you had one form applicable to all courts, it might be printed?—Yes. I admit that an expense of £2 for a decree in absence is too much. By making a printed form, and giving a reasonable fee for it, that would cover all the expense of it, and recover the debt at a trifling expense.

6619. Lord Barcaple.—You have various kinds of actions: could you very well throw them all into one printed form?—I think there would not be much difficulty in doing so.

6620. Could you have a printed form that would cover actions of divorce, and that would cover payment of a shopkeeper's debt?—The plan would be to cite a defender to appear on a certain day, with certification that if he did not appear, decreet would be given; and if he did not appear, I do not see why he should not be divorced.

6621. Then you would leave the blank to be filled up with reference to a divorce or with reference to a debt?—Yes; but if you get a man into court, you must explain the ground of the action.

6622. The Chairman.—You would not, in the first instance, give any statement of the ground of action?—No; merely enough to make it res judicata, so that the party should not be sued a second time for the same thing.

6623. Mr. Shand.—Suppose a party appears, should the pursuer give in any other writing?—The defender should state the ground of his defence shortly, and the pursuer should have a replication in the form of a short minute.

6624. But if the summons is in the very meagre shape that you propose, would that be enough, without more special statement by the pursuer?—I do not see why it should not be enough. It ought to be in the power of the judge to require particulars, so that a party should not be surprised at the proof. He should get an intimation of what is going to be proved against him.

6625. The Chairman.—In what form would these particulars be given?—Probably by minute, stating that so and so is to prove so and so.

6627. Whose fault is it that the condescendence becomes so long?—I suppose it is the fault of the agents.

6628. Mr. Harrison.—Is there a large proportion of the cases in your court which are actions for the payment of money?—They all, more or less, involve money, except questions of interdict.

6629. The Lord Justice-General.—Are they not chiefly actions for debt?—There is a very large number of them actions of affiliation.

6630. Lord Barcaple.—And a number of removings?—They are not so numerous now; there used to be at one time a great many of them.

6631. And there are a good many interdicts?—A good many.

6632. Mr. Adam.—Are agents paid according to the length of the condescendence?—Yes.

6633. Do you think that paying them so much for a condescendence, irrespective of length, might shorten these papers?—I do not believe it; an agent who is worth his salt won't spin out a paper for the sake of making a few shillings more.

6634. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestion to make?—I think not.

6635. What do you say as to the number of appeals which are competent from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff at different stages of a case? Do you think they might be abridged?—I think so. In point of fact, unless for purposes of delay, they are not used in our court.

6636. Lord Barcaple.—Have you any idea what is the average number of appeals which you have—one case with another—in each cause?—I do not believe that in the great majority of cases there is more than one.

6637. But will there be more than two on an average?—I am satisfied there is not.

6638. Mr Shand.—But in particular cases there may be five appeals?—I am told that is competent, but I have never seen any instance of it.

6639. Have you seen serious delay arising from the number of appeals in a particular case?—Not very commonly. In the hands of some agents, that may be resorted to for the purpose of delay, but not often.

6640. The Chairman.—In the course of leading proof there may be several appeals?—Yes, there are frequently appeals in the course of a proof, but not very many. I do not see why, as a rule, any appeal should be allowed at all during the progress of a cause. They should all be brought up at the end.

6641. Do you think that where a party has stated a defence which would go to throw out the action entirely, no inconvenience would result from his being compelled to go on and take a long proof?—That is the only case in which I can see that there ought to be an appeal, or that there would be any advantage in it.

6642. If there was one appeal allowed, bringing up both a preliminary defence and an order for proof, would that meet your view?—That would be quite sufficient.

6643. Do you think the mode in which appeals are directed to be taken to the Supreme Court under the recent Act satisfactory?—Yes; I presume it is satisfactory enough. I do not believe, however, that there will be many appeals.

6644. Lord Barcaple.—You mean you do not think it will increase the number of appeals?—Not materially. It will be used for the purposes of delay.

6945. Just as it was before?—Just as advocation was before. You could lodge a bond of advocation for a trifle.

6646. Sir E. Colebrooke.—What do you mean by saying that it is satisfactory, if it can only be used in the way of delay?—It is satisfactory as a mode of appeal. I do not mean that it is satisfactory in the sense that it will lead people to go from the Sheriff Court to the Court of Session with any number of cases.

6647. Do you think the mode of appeal should be simplified?—It is impossible to simplify it. It consists of writing two lines on the interlocutor sheet.

6648. The Chairman.—And no caution is required?—No.

6650. Lord Barcaple.—The mere form of taking an appeal for some time back, under the modern note of advocation, has been comparatively simple. There was no expense?—There was not much expense. The copies of the interlocutors that were often prefixed were unnecessary. All the formal interlocutors in the process were copied.

6651. Mr. Shand.—Do you approve of allowing parties, after having a case fully litigated in the Sheriff Court, to come to the Court of Session without finding caution?—I am not at all clear about that. I am afraid that it will tempt people to prolong litigation when they ought not to do so.

6652. The Lord Justice-General.—I think you said you did not expect the number of appeals to be large?—I do not.

6653. Then that temptation will not have much influence?—It will operate in cases of people who are desperate, who are not solvent, and cannot pay the costs; and they will run their adversary into unnecessary expense.

6654. The Chairman.—You think it gives too much facility to desperate and insolvent parties to litigate?—That is my fear.

6655. As to the costs of litigation in the Sheriff Court, do you think there is any mode in which they might be abridged, or do you think they ought to be enlarged?—I do not know any way in which they could be abridged at present. The expenses are not heavy, and we have not heard any serious complaint of them not being remunerative. There are many rules given in the table of fees in regard to taxation between party and party, which I think are not right; but nobody complains very much of it. For instance, there are the fees for precognoscing witnesses, which is a very important part of the agent's duty, and he is allowed only some 5s. a witness, though he may have to travel fifty miles; and he is allowed his bare travelling expenses, and no remuneration for the time occupied.

6656. You think that is too hard upon the agents?—I think so.

6657. Lord Barcaple.—How is that charged as between agent and client?—The Act of Sederunt regulating the fees, declares that that table is to be the rule as between party and party, and between agent and client too. If you choose to charge your client for that, he may pay or not as he likes.

6658. The auditor will not allow it?—He will not.

6659. Mr. Baxter.—Have you any objection to the mode in which agents are paid under the Debts Recovery Act?—They are not paid at all. It is not worth anybody's while, whose time is of any consequence, to go into that court.

6660. Mr. Harrison.—Have you had many cases under that Act?—Not a great many.

6661. You have not had much experience of it?—No; in most of the cases in which an agent goes into that court, his purpose is to throw them out on an objection.

6662. Do they then go into the ordinary Sheriff Court?—Yes, if the party chooses to go on with the case.

6663. The Chairman.—Do you object to the ad valorem principle, on which remuneration is given under that Act?—Yes. I think it is not a desirable way to put it; and practically, many of the smaller cases require more time and attention than the larger ones. So that it is not fair.

6664. The agent, you think, should be paid according to the work he does?—Decidedly. If parties do not choose to employ an agent, they may go into the court themselves.

6665. Mr Harrison.—Are you aware that the principle of ad valorem fees has been in operation in England for many years?—I believe it is in operation in the County Courts; but I understand that it is only between party and party, and that the solicitors charge their regular fees against their own client, and credit him with the amount recovered from the other side.

6666. The Chairman.—Have you anything to say as to the privileges of agents?—I would rather answer any questions which your Lordship may put.

6667. Do you think that agents ought to be admitted to practise in all courts?—I do.

6668. Including the Supreme Court?—Yes.

6669. How would you have their qualifications ascertained?—By some central body appointed for the purpose.

6670. Do you think they should be admitted by the Supreme Court?—Probably so.

6671. Would you have the same qualifications prescribed for all?—I think so. I think the country practitioners' qualifications ought to be even higher than those of the agents in Edinburgh, because they have to act for themselves without the assistance of counsel.

6672. Mr. Baxter.—Has your body any exclusive privileges?—Well, we claim them.

6673. And you exercise them, I suppose?—We were unsuccessful in an attempt to enforce them in the case of Peterhead.

6674. Before admitting a procurator to practise in the Sheriff Court of Aberdeen, don't you require that he shall serve an apprenticeship to one of your body?—Yes.

6675. For how long?—Four years in the case of a Master of Arts of a University, and five years if he is not so.

6676. Do you require anything before that?—He is required to pass the preliminary examination directed by the Procurators Act.

6677. Is he required to attend college?—Yes; he must attend the University for at least two years.

6678. And four years of apprenticeship to one of your body?—Five years, unless he is a Master of Arts.

6679. Has he to pay anything to a fund before he is admitted?—He pays ten guineas on being matriculated as an apprentice, and about £120 on admission to our body.

6680. You won't allow a party to practise in the Sheriff Court of Aberdeen without all that preparation and payment?—No; not if we can help it.

6681. Mr. Harrison.—You think all these provisions and fees should be abolished, if there was a central authority for admitting solicitors?—These fees are the price of admission to a large Benefit Society, a Widows' Fund, etc.

6682. Mr. Baxter.—But you make them necessary in order to practising before your Sheriff Court?—Yes.

6683. The Chairman.—If the system you suggest were adopted, of a central body to examine and find parties qualified to practise everywhere, your particular regulations of apprenticeship might be overruled?—No doubt; we could not expect to have a privilege in one way, and not give up privileges on the other hand.

6684. Then the privilege of admission to your body would be upon a different footing?—Yes.

6685. There are benefits derived from that, apart from the practising before the court?—Yes; we have funds to the amount of £70,000 or £80,000 accumulated.

6686. And you have a Library and Widows' Fund?—Yes.

6687. Lord Barcaple.—Assuming the system which you suggest to be adopted, how would you propose practically to take charge of your causes depending in the court in Edinburgh?—I should not take charge of them. It would never do for a man living at the distance that I do to attend to them personally.

6688. Then what benefit would result from entitling country agents to practise in the Court of Session?—It would enable me to get a portion of the profits.

6689. That is to say, your causes would be conducted by your correspondent here, by an arrangement by which you should get a portion of the profits?—Yes.

6690. But you do not think that you yourself could with any advantage come to attend the causes?—No; not at the distance from Edinburgh at which I live. Agents near Edinburgh might do so.

6691. Mr. Murray.—Would there be any advantage to the public from that arrangement?—I think there would. At present the public have to pay me in the country, and also an agent in Edinburgh; and supposing a party gains his case, he does not recover my account. He only recovers a small part of it.

6692. The Chairman.—If you are to participate in the agents' profits, probably the agents for whom the table of fees has been prepared as an adequate remuneration for themselves, would also require some increase?—Well, it is possible they might.

6693. Would that be beneficial to the public?—In some respects it would not; but the public would save paying me or any other country agent. In many cases we have the main conduct of the case, and the responsibility of it in some measure; but the auditor allows us almost no fees, and we get no part of the fees, on the principle of double agency not being permitted. The consequence is, that the expense of the litigation is not diminished, but it is put on the wrong party. It is put on the man who has gained the case, in place of upon the man who has lost it.

6694. The Chairman.—That is, he pays his country agent himself?—Yes.

6695. Do you think the fees of the Edinburgh agent should be adequate to pay both him and the country agent?—Not exactly that; the fees of the country agent and town agent should both go into the account. At present the auditor, under the directions of the court, excludes the country agent's account altogether.

6696. But if the fees of the Edinburgh agent at present are considered a fair remuneration for what he himself does, would you take from him a part of that?—No; but I would add my account as part of the expenses in the cause.

6697. But would that not be done simply by permitting the country agent's account to form part of it?—Yes.

6698. Without giving him the privilege of practising?—Yes.

6699. Then that does not arise out of the privilege of practising?—No; but it would come to the same thing.

6700. Mr. Murray.—That would make the expense to be paid by a party losing his case greater than it is at present?—No doubt; but I think he is the party who ought to pay, and not the man who gains the case.

6701. Mr. Shand.—Do you think, if that system were introduced, business would find its way to the Court of Session, as the court of first instance, which does not find its way there now?—Not a great deal more than at present.

6702. Mr. Murray.—You think the general effect would not be to increase litigation?—No; I do not think so.

6703. Mr. Baxter.—Does your Sheriff-clerk attend and do his duty in person?—The present Sheriff-clerk attends the court, and reads the motion roll.

6704. Is that all he does?—That is all he does in court.

6705. Has he a depute?—Yes; he has two deputes in Aberdeen.

6706. Does he carry on any business other than the business of the Sheriff-clerk?—Yes; he carries on a general and conveyancing business, and manages estates, and so forth.

6707. He is an agent in Aberdeen?—Yes.

6708. The Chairman.—He does not carry on court business?—No.

6709. Mr. Shand.—You have a very able depute in Aberdeen, have you not?—A very experienced one.

6710. Mr. Baxter.—But the Sheriff-clerk himself does very little?—So far as one can see from his attendance in the office. David Robert Morice.

6711. Has he a depute at Peterhead also?—Yes.

6712. Mr. Murray.—Are you aware of the mode in which Sheriff-clerks do their work in other counties?—Very few of the Sheriff-clerks, so far as I am aware, do their work at all.

6713. Then there is no specialty in the case of the Sheriff-clerk of Aberdeen?—By no means.

6714. Does the Sheriff-clerk not attend daily at the office?—No.

6715. Mr. Baxter.—Do you know what his salary is?—£1200 a year.

6716. Mr. Murray.—Out of that he has to pay all the expenses of the office?—Yes.

6717. The Chairman.—Have you any observations to make on criminal matters?—No; I am little acquainted with criminal matters.

6718. Is there a Justice of Peace Court held in Aberdeen?—Not a civil court.

6719. Is there not a Small Debt Court?—No.

6720. Does the court grant licences, or review the judgment of the magistrates?—Yes; the Petty Sessions grant licences for the county, and the Quarter Sessions review their decisions.

6721. Does that work satisfactorily in Aberdeenshire?—Well, I see complaints in the newspapers; but I suppose it is only disappointed people that complain. I do not think there are any serious grounds for complaint.

6722. Are there any Barony or Regality Courts in Aberdeenshire?—There must be a number of baronies; but I am not aware that they generally keep up any practice of holding a court.

6723. Is there no Baron Bailie holding a court?—There is a Baron Bailie holding a court in Fraserburgh.

6724. That is a considerable place?—Yes.

6725. Are there magistrates there holding a court?—I think not. I think there are Commissioners of Police.

6726. Sir E. Colebrooke.—What cases do the Barony Courts take cognizance of?—I really don't know. I suppose it is mostly police cases.

6727. You have heard no complaints of their jurisdiction?—No.

6728. The Chairman.—The magistrates sit in the Police Court in Aberdeen?—Yes.

6729. Does that work satisfactorily?—I think so. If a question of law arises on a point of evidence, they send for their assessor.

6730. Do you sit with them in that court when they send for you?—Yes, if I am required.

SATURDAY, 16TH JANUARY 1869.

Members Present:—

LORD COLONSAY.	JAS. CAMPBELL, Esq.
LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.	GEO. HARRISON, Esq.
LORD BARCAPLE.	JAS. ADAM, Esq.
SIR E. COLEBROOKE.	A. B. SHAND, Esq.
E. S. GORDON, Esq., Q.C.	J. B. BAXTER, Esq.
A. R. CLARK, Esq.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD COLONSAY IN THE CHAIR.

WILLIAM SHIRESS, Esq., examined. William Shiress.

6731. The Chairman.—You are a practitioner in the Sheriff Court of Forfarshire?—I am.

6732. At Brechin?—I practise in the court at Forfar. I reside at Brechin.

6733. Are there several procurators residing at Brechin?—Several; six or eight.

6734. Have they any society or faculty there?—Not in Brechin. We are all members of the Forfar body, but we have no separate Brechin society.

William Shiress.

6735. The ordinary Sheriff Courts in Forfarshire are held at Forfar and at Dundee?—Yes.

6736. And nowhere else?—Nowhere else—the ordinary courts.

6737. The Small Debt Courts are held in various other places?—In various other towns in the county.

6738. Is there any court under the late Act for the Recovery of Certain Debts held in other places besides Forfar and Dundee?—Yes; they are held at all the circuit towns fixed in the Small Debt Act.

6739. How long have you been a practitioner?—Forty years.

6740. Do you hold any official situation?—No; I hold no official situation just now.

6741. Have you any observations to make upon the constitution of the Sheriff Court, as consisting of a Sheriff and his substitutes?—I find that the appeal to the Sheriff-principal, as at present managed, in consequence of the Sheriff being bound to attend only four times a year in the county, is a great source of delay; and our faculty suggested that if the system of double Sheriffs were continued, it would be the best course to divide Scotland into several districts, and appoint a resident Sheriff over several counties: as, for instance, one residing in Inverness, having all the northern counties; one in Aberdeen, having all the counties in the neighbourhood of Aberdeen; and one in Perth, having Forfar, Fife, Perth, and the smaller counties of Clackmannan, etc.; and by devoting his whole time to his duties, he would be able to attend once a fortnight or so in the seat of every Sheriffship, and there dispose of every appeal which might be taken during the preceding fortnight or so. That is the suggestion which our body made for the improvement of the Sheriff Courts.

6742. Do you contemplate that the gentleman who would have that large district would review the judgments of the Sheriff-substitutes in the different parts of that district?—That was the view that our body entertained.

6743. Would you have him reside in the district, or in Edinburgh?—In the district, and consequently within easy access of all the towns in the district where the Sheriff-substitute sits.

6745. When you say easy access, do you mean access by him to the place?—Yes; he would then come just as our Sheriff does, sitting in the county town, or other town at which the Sheriff-substitute usually sits, and there hear the appeals in the same manner as the principal Sheriff does just now. The principal Sheriff is at present only bound to hold courts in the county four times a year. If he is resident in Edinburgh, practising in the Court of Session, he cannot conveniently do more; but if we had a man devoted to judicial functions, having no practice, and no other occupation for his time, he could, residing in the district, occupy his time in travelling to the various seats of the Sheriff-substitute's court, and despatch all the business there immediately, or nearly so, very much as the Sheriff of Glasgow does. There is a resident Sheriff-principal in Glasgow, and I understand that appeals are disposed of very rapidly there. Of course Glasgow has a large population, and it is reasonable that a resident Sheriff should be there. In the smaller towns we could not expect a resident Sheriff for each county; but taking a cluster of the counties, we think that a similar arrangement to that which exists in Glasgow would be the best method of having justice administered in the Sheriff Court. That was the view of our faculty when this Commission was first issued; but, since then, it has been suggested that the court should consist of two appeal Sheriffs, and I believe our general view is that that is an improvement, if it could be accomplished. We did not suggest two at the first, but we are inclined to yield to the recommendation of those gentlemen who do advocate the two. The one would be a great improvement in the way we suggest; but if two could be obtained, that would be still better.

6746. How often would you contemplate that the appeal Sheriff or the two appeal Sheriffs should sit in each place?—Once in two weeks, or once in four weeks during session time. Of course there would be the usual vacations, though there is not much vacation in Sheriff Court practice. We must have a resident Sheriff, and there are always summary matters requiring to be attended to, even in vacation.

6747. Would you have him to go to the different places where there are seats of Sheriff-substitutes, in order to dispose of the appeals there, or would the appeals be brought to one place?—We contemplate that he should sit at the seat of each Sheriff-substitute, and there hear the causes, in the same manner as the principal Sheriff does just now.

6748. The object you have in view in that is expedition?—Despatch.

6749. Do you contemplate that that gentleman should be a member of the Scotch bar?—We would expect that, but we don't think that he should necessarily be so. We expect that he would be of the same class out of which Sheriffs-principal have hitherto been selected, which has generally been from the bar, and from among the senior members of the bar; but we don't think it indispensable that he should be a barrister.

6750. Have Sheriffs-principal been selected from any other body but the bar?—Not within my experience.

6751. You said generally?—I believe a writer to the signet may be a Sheriff, or even a Lord of Session, though in practice it never occurred. I believe a writer to the signet, and probably also a practitioner in the inferior court, might be appointed to these high offices. We, the procurators in the inferior courts, don't think we get justice in regard to promotion, and we have some grumbling amongst us that all appointments, even of Sheriff-substitutes, are now given to the bar, rather to the prejudice of our body. We think our experience in inferior court practice entitles us sometimes to be promoted to such offices.

6752. Sheriff-substitutes are sometimes appointed from local practitioners, and from the writers to the signet?—They are, sometimes; but, generally speaking, it is members of the bar that are appointed to all these offices.

6753. Recently?—Recently.

6754. Mr. Campbell.—Have you considered the appointments made within the last ten years in reference to that remark, because there have been a good many appointments of gentlemen as Sheriff-substitutes within the last ten years who were not members of the bar?—Not in our neighbourhood at all events. I cannot say that I have scrutinized the appointments in other counties very much; but we have had no Sheriff-substitute in our county who was not a member of the bar since the late Mr. Robertson, who was an Aberdeen agent. The first Sheriff-substitute appointed at Dundee was an advocate; and all the Sheriff-substitutes since appointed, both at Dundee and Forfar, have been barristers.

6755. In Fife you are aware that the Sheriff-substitute is not a member of the bar?—Yes; I believe at Cupar that is the case.

6756. In Tain the gentleman recently appointed, Mr. Taylor, is not a member of the bar?—I am not aware of that.

6757. In Stirling the present Sheriff-substitute, appointed a few years ago, is Mr. Sconce, who was a Procurator-fiscal?—I am not aware.

6758. The Chairman.—Are you aware of any statute that regulates the qualification of a Sheriff-principal?—I understand there is a statute.

6759. You had overlooked that?—Probably so.

6760. Would you allow appeals to the Sheriff whom you suggest, or the two Sheriffs, whichever it might be, in all cases?—In all cases, after final judgment at any rate.

6761. By the resident Sheriff?—Yes, from the resident Sheriff to the appeal Sheriff or Sheriffs after final judgment in all ordinary actions; of course not under the Small Debt Act.

6762. Would you allow these appeals upon matter of fact and upon matter of law?—If the matter of fact was ascertained in the present form upon the Sheriff's notes of the evidence, then I would allow it on matter of fact as well as on matter of law; but if the facts were ascertained by a jury, or in any other manner than by the Sheriff himself, I should say there was no occasion for appeals on questions of fact.

6763. You say by a jury or in any other manner. What do you allude to?—I have always maintained that the best method is to have the facts ascertained by a jury; but part of my neighbours maintain that it is best, where the facts can be ascertained, and the sum is of a limited amount, say under £25, that the judgment of the Sheriff taking the proof should be final and conclusive. That is what I allude to, that if there was any enactment to the effect that the finding of the Sheriff taking the evidence shall be conclusive upon the import of the evidence, then there would be no room for an appeal.

6764. Do you think it would be expedient to have the judgment of the judge in the first instance final upon fact?—I think that in small cases that would be the better way, on the whole. I don't like the idea of an appeal on questions of fact, because the appeal Sheriff, unless he were to re-hear the evidence, cannot appreciate the value of it so well as the judge who takes it; for evidence is not merely the words spoken, but the manner in which they are spoken, the gesture, the appearance, and the character of the witness. There are so many ingredients that go into the value of testimony, which only a judge taking the proof can ascertain, that I have always great hesitation in saying that a judge reviewing facts on mere notes of evidence, can arrive at so good a judgment as the judge who takes the evidence.

6765. You have expressed an opinion with reference to small debt cases; would you extend it to cases of large value?—There is great demur to doing that, certainly.

6766. Do you think that in cases of large value, the risks that you refer to of a miscarriage by the review of a judge who has not heard the evidence is of less consequence than in cases of small value?—I cannot say it is of less consequence; at the same time, it never appeared to me a satisfactory method of ascertaining facts, to have a review of the facts on the mere notes of evidence taken by the judge. I cannot see any reasonable method of making a finding on facts final unless a jury is interposed, and then they must see that the judge does not do gross injustice to either of the parties litigants.

6767. What number of jurors would you have?—From seven to nine. Seven or nine would be the number that I would recommend for the trial of causes in the Sheriff Court.

6768. Would you require unanimity from these jurors?—No, I would not; I would say two-thirds of them, at all events, should be sufficient to return a verdict.

6769. Would you have any mode of correcting an erroneous verdict upon fact?—You must have leave to move for a new trial on any such ground as new trials may be moved for just now—that the verdict is contrary to evidence, or that the judge has misdirected the jury, or any other causes that are reasons just now for a new trial.

6770. You would extend that to the Sheriff Court?—Yes, that is my own view; but my view is not popular among my neighbours, and I can find very few gentlemen in the county who adopt it.

6771. Mr. Baxter.—Would you extend jury trial to all cases of disputed fact?—I am very much disposed to extend it to all cases of disputed fact. Then the facts are finally determined. If they are wrongly determined, it is a pity; but if finally determined, there is no more litigation on questions of fact. Questions of fact are so difficult to determine, that I think it highly important that the fact should be fixed at as early a stage as possible.

6772. But you find yourself in a minority in that opinion?—In a very decided minority.

6773. The Chairman.—Supposing jury trial not to be adopted in the Sheriff Courts, you think it would not be satisfactory that in important cases the judgment of the court in the first instance should be final?—No, because the judge of review may order further evidence. If it is a case nearly balanced, the other party asserting that further evidence should be adduced, the judge of review might allow further evidence.

6774. But suppose the judge in the first instance happens to take an erroneous view of the true import of the evidence, either from misapprehension or throwing the balance in the wrong way, and that the judge to whom the appeal is made takes a different view, and points out his reasons so clearly as to make it plain that there has been an error on the part of the judge in the first instance, would you not allow that to be corrected?—Certainly I would, but I would leave it optional to the party then losing the case to adduce further evidence if he can.

6775. But what I am referring to is not the want of sufficient evidence, but an erroneous conclusion from the evidence?—Well, probably an erroneous conclusion from the evidence may be a sufficient cause for upsetting the verdict; but it has occurred to me in practice, that the judge has clearly indicated in the course of taking the evidence, at least shown sufficient indications to enable us to judge, that he considered our case was then fully proved, and that therefore we were loading the record with unnecessary evidence when we were examining more witnesses; and then, of course, we take the hint from him, and don't lead more evidence. But the judge of review takes a different view, and says this fact is not made out; and then we lose the benefit of all the evidence, which we might have adduced, but for the presiding judge at the time having indicated his opinion. That is a hardship; and when a judge overturns a judgment on matters of fact, I say, if the party who is losing the case has further evidence to give, he should be allowed to adduce it.

6776. Upon matter of law, you would have an appeal to the single judge, or to two judges?—Yes, on matters of law.

6777. Would you have their judgment final?—Up to a certain amount, I think it should be final; up to £50 in value, at all events.

6778. And above that, you think the dissatisfied party might appeal to the Court of Session?—Yes.

6779. Mr. Campbell.—At present the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute is final as to fact, in cases under the Certain Debts Act, up to £25, where he has not been asked to take a note of the evidence?—Yes.

6780. Is it common, in the practice of your court, that the Sheriff-substitute is not asked to take a note of the evidence in these cases?—He is asked to take a note of that evidence in every case now.

6781. The Chairman.—That is done as a matter of precaution?—Yes; we ask it as a matter of precaution.

6782. Mr. Baxter.—Do you ask that uniformly now?—Yes; we made a mistake at the first in not doing it, and the Sheriff said he would not make a note of the evidence unless we asked him to do so. We always ask him now.

6783. Mr. Campbell.—You gave your opinion as to the propriety of dividing Scotland into districts; but you commenced by saying that that was on the assumption that the double office was to be preserved. Did you come to the conclusion that it ought to be preserved?—Yes, for the sake of this appeal. We consider it of the utmost importance to have an appeal within the Sheriff Court.

6784. Mr. Shand.—Do you not think it would be satisfactory to the country, that the appeal should be direct from the resident Sheriff to the Court of Session?—I don't think that would be satisfactory.

6785. Why?—In the first place, because going to the Court of Session necessarily involves the case going out of the local agent's hands. The local agents, we think, should have the opportunity of first debating the case before the appeal court. He has to debate it before the Sheriff-substitute in his court; and then we apprehend it is of the utmost importance that the two local agents shall have the debate also before the appeal court. When it goes to the Court of Session, it goes wholly out of our hands; we are obliged to employ a new staff of agents and counsel, which we want to avoid if we can.

6786. Is it the expense to the litigant that you wish to avoid?—That is one very great consideration unquestionably. We cannot get a case discussed in the Court of Session without a great deal more money than we can do it for in our own court.

6787. Do you think that if an intermediate appeal was not to be had in some shape, it would be a denial of justice in a great many cases, on account of the expense.—Yes.

6788. You think the appeal Sheriff should reside in the district?—That is my opinion. Still I ought to say that a number of other gentlemen think there is no occasion for that; and that if the necessary number of appeal Sheriffs are appointed, they may equally well reside in Edinburgh and travel over Scotland, sometimes in one district and sometimes in the other. It is thought that that would produce a more equal administration of justice than if the same two were always presiding in the same court.

6789. Don't you think it would be an advantage to the appeal judge to reside in Edinburgh, and see the daily practice of the Court of Session?—No, I don't think it is of the least moment now-a-days, when all the cases are duly reported; and we understand the proceedings of the courts of law, by means of the legal publications, as well as if we were on the spot.

6790. Mr. Baxter.—But you have no objection to their residing in Edinburgh?—No; if it can be done with equal economy and despatch.

6791. Mr. Shand.—You contemplate that they shall give up practice?—Yes; we expect that the Sheriff shall devote his whole time to his judicial functions, and that he shall be paid adequate remuneration, and that he may be still in the way of higher promotion if such should occur.

6792. The Chairman.—You mean promotion to the bench?—Yes; we think that an appeal judge, after having satisfactorily discharged such duties as an appeal judge would have to do for a number of years, may be very fitly promoted to the bench.

6793. You said you thought these appeal judgeships should be open to members of all the professions—writers to the signet and procurators in the Sheriff Courts?—Yes, I think so. I think they should be open to all members of the profession.

6794. Sir Edward Colebrooke.—You said it was your opinion that the Sheriff-principal should be resident. Is that opinion not shared by the other members of your faculty at Brechin?—It is, at Forfar; we generally came to that conclusion, that it would be proper to have a resident Sheriff; but at that time the idea of two Sheriffs had not been started. Our view at that time was, that one Sheriff only was the proper appeal court.

6795. Mr. Baxter.—In an enlarged district?—Yes.

6796. Sir Edward Colebrooke.—The other view, of having the appeal to two or more Sheriffs, has not been under the consideration of your faculty?—We have not discussed it at any meeting.

6797. Is there any reason to complain that under the present system the Sheriffs-principal don't devote their full time to the cases before them on appeal?—I cannot say that I have heard any complaint of that in our county.

6798. What is the advantage you think there would be in having the principal Sheriff always resident, instead of a person who is a practitioner in the Supreme Court?—The reason is that of despatch. At present the Sheriff is only bound to come to his county four times a year under the statute, and he may fix his own periods for that purpose; consequently, supposing him to divide the year into equal quarters, we have to wait three months sometimes for the determination of an appeal. That is a great obstruction to justice. If we could get a case decided in ten days or a fortnight, as I am told they do in Glasgow, all that time would be saved to the litigant.

6799. The Chairman.—Do you think the discussion on appeals ought to be entirely oral?—I do.

6801. Mr. Baxter.—You would anticipate, I suppose, that a written debate would be very exceptional?—I should think so. In matters that involve figures and accounting, it might be sometimes necessary to have the view of the parties stated in writing. Sometimes you cannot understand figures so well from an oral statement as from a written statement. I can imagine such cases to occur, as that it would be highly satisfactory to the judge to have the statements in writing.

6802. Mr. Shand.—If it were provided that the Sheriff should go to his county to hold sittings once in four weeks, would that meet your view so far as despatch is concerned?—It would; but in summary cases that is hardly enough perhaps, and sometimes delay is a temptation to a man to take an appeal.

6803. How many cases would be waiting the Sheriff as a rule, suppose you had sittings once in four weeks at Forfar?—If an appeal was confined as I suggest, it should be to the final judgment, there would not be very many—not perhaps above two or three, or perhaps not so many, at the end of four weeks.

6804. You think three would be the outside of it?—Yes, I fancy so, of final judgments.

6805. And that embraces a pretty large district, does it not?—Yes, it does. We count that we have 180,000 inhabitants in Forfarshire, 90,000 of whom are in the Dundee district.

6806. Mr. Adam.—Are many of the cases appealed in your court?—Almost every case is appealed. At one stage or another, almost every case in which there is any serious litigation goes to the Sheriff.

6807. Mr. Baxter.—Would you confine your appeal to the decision on the merits?—Yes, or to the interlocutor allowing a proof. You may save a proof by taking an appeal at that stage.

6808. Suppose a good preliminary defence, which might dispose of the case?—Well; if the Sheriff dismisses the case, the pursuer must have an appeal.

6809. But suppose he repels it?—If he repels the preliminary defence, I don't know that it is of much consequence to have an appeal at that stage.

6810. It might decide the case, and save a proof?—It might.

6811. The Chairman.—If there were two judges in the ambulatory court, do you think there would be any inconvenience as to their having the papers before them? Would it not require a copy of the papers for each of them?—I think that might be arranged without having copies of the papers for each of them. Probably, however, it might be convenient to have copies of them.

6812. Copies of all the important papers?—Yes.

6813. Would you expect them to decide the case before they left the town?—They could not well do that in all cases. I think they must have leave to take the case to avizandum, because there may be authorities referred to in a debate, which they could not at the time refer to.

6814. You would not expect a case to be so well disposed of instantly in the court, as by a judge who had time to consider it deliberately in his library, and to refer to authorities?—I should say not. He should have time to make up his mind deliberately.

6815. He would probably like to have the papers with him?—Yes; of course he must.

6816. And that would make it desirable that he should have a copy of them?—Yes.

6817. Copies would be required for each of the judges, if there were two, if they had to take the case to avizandum and consider it carefully?—Yes.

6818. Would you have counsel practising before these judges?—Not usually. Our object is to exclude counsel as far as we can, and to manage all our matters ourselves, unless we are obliged to go to the Court of Session, in which case we are obliged to have counsel.

6819. Your object is to keep things to yourselves as much as possible?—As much as possible.

6820. Would you extend the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Court to other classes of cases than those which are now competent in it?—We consider it an absolute denial of justice in many cases, that we have no opportunity of bringing actions in the Sheriff Court as to husband and wife, and in regard to heritable rights. An heritable right of small value is often lost, simply because the parties cannot afford to risk the expenses of a Court of Session lawsuit.

6821. You would extend the jurisdiction to questions of heritable right?—Yes.

6822. Would you extend it to questions of heritable right of any amount?—Yes; but I would give the defender an option to take the case to the Court of Session. I would not say that a pursuer has a right in every case to choose his court. Supposing there to be two courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction, the Sheriff's Court and the Court of Session, the pursuer selects the Sheriff's Court; but I should say the defender has an equal right to choose the court; and if he can show the Sheriff that the value is considerable, say £500, then I think he ought to have a right to ask the Sheriff to remit the case to the Court of Session.

6823. With what object?—To have it tried, because the defender chooses that court. There are two courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction provided by law: the pursuer selects one, but that may be an unfavourable selection, and the defender may think so; and he says, The other court of co-ordinate jurisdiction is a better court for the decision of this case, and I ask you, the Sheriff, to remit it there at once. I think that is reasonable.

6824. Would he have to show cause to the Sheriff why it should be remitted?—If it were of a certain value, I should say no.

6825. Then that is allowing the defender to choose the court as against the pursuer?—Yes; I think he has as good a right to select the court as the pursuer.

6826. He would have the sole right to select in that case?—Yes.

6827. The pursuer begins, and the defender says, 'I won't have that court; I choose the other,'—is that not giving the defender the selection of a court?—Yes, it is enabling him to decline the Sheriff's jurisdiction.

6828. It is giving the defender the selection of the court?—He has that just now.

6829. You talked of it as if it were giving the parties equal right to select the court. Is it giving them an equal right to select the court, if one of them can take it to another court?—I don't mean to say that it is. I am pleading for an alteration of the law. At present the parties have only the Court of Session to go to in such cases. I say, if anybody thinks it a hardship to be obliged to go to the Sheriff Court, let him still have the power to go to the Court of Session if he prefers it.

6830. Then it comes to this, that if both parties choose to have the Sheriff Court, you would let the Sheriff have the jurisdiction?—Yes, it comes to that. I would only give that option to the defender when the case was of a certain value.

6831. What value would you suggest?—£500 was the sum talked of in our body at Forfar. We said that it appeared to be reasonable to allow the defender in cases above £500 to go at once to the Court of Session. We may debate the case in the Sheriff Court; but I have made up my mind not to be contented with the Sheriff's judgment, and therefore we will go to the Court of Session at once. That is the argument used, that where a party sees he will be driven in the long run to the Court of Session, the right being of importance to him, and a question in which he would not be content with the Sheriff's judgment, he says he will go to the Court of Session at once.

6832. That would be in cases of large amount?—Yes.

6833. In cases of smaller amount you would not allow that option?—Not, in cases which did not exceed £500 of value.

6834. At the close of such case not exceeding £500, would you allow him an appeal to the Court of Session?—I would.

6836. Mr. Baxter.—In regard to giving the defender the power of going to the Court of Session, why would you restrict that to cases of heritage?—I am moving for an alteration of the law; and when we are doing so, we must meet half-way the views on the other side. I wish to take what is practicable if possible, and I am showing that it is no hardship; because, if the party still prefers the Court of Session, he can have it.

6837. The Chairman.—Are there any other classes of cases to which you would extend the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Court?—I would extend it to the conjugal actions particularly, and to protection of a wife's earnings under the Conjugal Rights Act, to actions of separation, and I think also actions of divorce. I don't see any reason why we should not have actions of divorce in the Sheriff Courts, and actions of legitimacy. The law of Scotland, prior to the Acts of 1830 or 1831, was that actions of divorce were tried in the Commissary Court, and it was the inferior court practitioners that practised in that court. Till the Commissary Court was abolished, actions of divorce were not competent originally in the Court of Session. There is no reason to doubt that a practitioner in the inferior court could conduct actions of divorce as well as they are conducted in the superior court.

6838. Would you allow actions of declarator, of legitimacy or bastardy, or marriage, to go on in the Sheriff Court?—I would; we have agreed that that would be desirable.

6839. Rescissory actions, and actions of reduction?—Actions of reduction, which are accessory actions. If you extend the Sheriff's jurisdiction to questions of heritage, these are merely accessory actions.

6840. Reduction of a settlement?—Reduction of a settlement on the head of deathbed, or any other ground involving heritable right.

6841. Declaratory actions?—Yes; these are accessory actions.

6842. Are there any actions to which you would not extend it?—Yes; there are actions against judges and magistrates, against church courts, and against Officers of State, and actions of that sort. I would not like to have anything to do with the presbyteries.

6843. That is the class of cases to which you would not extend the Sheriff's jurisdiction?—Yes.

6844. But to questions of debt, or right of property, or declarator of right,—to all such classes of cases you would extend the Sheriff's jurisdiction?—All cases coming under the term of common pleas, relating to rights of property, and forming questions of claim by one man against another. We excepted from the cases which we said the Sheriff's jurisdiction should be extended to, cases against the Sovereign or Officers of State, against judges or magistrates, including Church Courts, and against foreigners, or persons residing beyond the territory of Scotland.

6845. Do you concur in that resolution?—I do. In regard to the question about foreigners, I think it would be indispensable, for the purpose of explicating the Sheriff's jurisdiction, that he should have the right of reconvention against foreigners suing in his court. I happen to have seen lately, that there is a great inconvenience from my not being able to raise an action against a foreigner in the court of Forfar, while he could raise an action against me there. I cannot constitute a claim against him there, and I think the right of reconvention should be granted to the Sheriff's Court against a person resident abroad, if he is suing in that court.

6846. Would you extend the jurisdiction of the Sheriff territorially, to parties connected with actions in his court?—We had that matter under consideration, and the resolution we came to was:—'It would be improper to admit of a single defender or a set of defenders all resident beyond the territory of the Sheriff, being cited to a Sheriff Court. But if there are three or more persons whom it is necessary to call as defenders in an action, and one or more of these resides beyond the Sheriff's territory, your committee are of opinion that it should be competent to call the non-resident as well as the resident defenders into any Sheriff Court. If these non-resident defenders, however, shall be able to show to the court in which they are called, that they are put to any disadvantage in their defence by being called into the court of that particular county, and that their co-defenders would not be put to disadvantage by the case being tried in another county, then the Sheriff should remit the case to the court of that other county. In cases of actions upon contracts, the locus contractus is generally the most suitable for the case being tried; and though, where all the parties concerned are resident in another territory, it may be suitable and convenient to have the case tried in that territory, yet where other parties are interested, it should belong to the judge to determine in what territory the case should be tried. At present, where a number of defenders resident in different territories must necessarily be called to an action, the action must be raised in the Court of Session, however small the value at issue, and however suitable in other respects the case may be for the determination of the Sheriff. But there is no greater hardship in citing a defender to another county town than in citing him to Edinburgh; while, under the provisions suggested by your committee, it would always be in his power to get his case remitted to his own County Court, if he can show that a trial there would give him any facility in making good his defence, without injury to his pursuer or to his co-defenders.'

6847. If you have appeal judges who exercise appellate jurisdiction over a large territory, would you allow the party to remit it from one part of that territory to another?—If the judge saw cause—if cause was shown—certainly.

6848. And you would allow persons not residing within that district of Scotland to be cited within it if there were several defenders?—Yes.

6849. Mr. Adam.—Who are the 'we' whose opinions you are representing?—The Faculty of Forfar—the eastern district of Forfarshire.

6850. The Chairman.—Including Montrose?—Including Montrose, Arbroath, Brechin, Kirriemuir, and Forfar; it includes the professional men resident in all these towns.

6851. Mr. Campbell.—Can you tell us the number of members of that faculty?—About sixty.

6852. The Chairman.—Would you extend to the Sheriff the power of appointing curators and factors?—We think it highly desirable that that should be done in the Sheriff Courts.

6853. And trustees on lapsed trusts?—Yes.

6854. Mr. Campbell.—You said that you did not think the judgment of a Sheriff should be final in any case except in small debt cases?—Yes.

6855. Do you think that the present provision, which renders the judgment of the Sheriff final in cases under £25, ought to be abolished?—Yes, I do. I think an appeal should be allowed in such cases. Formerly we could advocate such cases, and we had also a very convenient appeal to the Circuit Court of Justiciary in such cases.

6856. Mr. Adam.—Do you think that requiring the judge to grant leave to appeal would be sufficient protection against improper appeals?—Do you speak of appeals to the Court of Session?

6857. Or to the principal Sheriff, even under £12, under the Small Debt Act?—You suggest an appeal with leave of the judge. That would be quite a sufficient protection; and if the judge saw that the matter was a difficult one, it is reasonable that he should allow an appeal.

6858. You would not object to an appeal in small debt cases where the judge certified that it was a proper case for an appeal?—No, I would not. That would indicate that he himself was doubtful of the judgment; and in such a case it is quite right that he should allow another judge to apply his mind to the case.

6859. Mr. Harrison.—Do you think your opinion in favour of the right of appeal is shared by the people of Forfarshire, or is it only your personal opinion?—I am satisfied that the bulk of the people of Forfarshire, who understand the question, would like an appeal from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff-principal, or some other appeal judge.

6860. Even in cases under £25?—Yes.

6861. Lord Barcaple.—Under £12?—Under £12, with leave of the judge.

6862. The Chairman.—Have you any suggestion to make upon the style of pleading in the Sheriff Court?—I have always had great hesitation in coming to the judgment which the Court of Session came to in regard to the Act of 1853, by which they found it was necessary to libel a relevancy. I consider that the Act of 1853 enabled us to libel our summons without necessarily including relevant grounds of action. At the time the Act was passed, we framed our summons in the same manner in which a Court of Session summons is framed, containing merely the conclusions, and adding a condescendence containing the reasons. This Act abolished the condescendence annexed, and I don't think that necessarily inferred that we were to put the condescendence into the body of the writ. Therefore I thought that, when the Act was passed, we should have no longer occasion to libel a relevancy in order to get the summons into court; and that, if the case was defended, we had to state, in the shape of a condescendence, the ground of action. But it was determined by the Court of Session, in the case of Cameron, that we were obliged to put the relevancy into the summons, even under the new law; and when the Court of Session fixed the fees for framing the summons, they gave a high fee—much larger than we formerly had for framing a summons—which virtually nullified the effect of this Act, as far as the mercantile community was concerned, by making the expense of decrees in absence a great deal larger than before; and consequently the mercantile community, finding that the Act had proved abortive in reducing the expense of law proceedings, chiefly in decrees in absence, agitated and got the Debts Recovery Act passed. I think that Debts Recovery Act is a very awkward Act. If it be determined that the relevancy must be libelled, of course the present forms of summons must remain; but I should think the better method would be to bring an action into court, specifying merely the sum concluded for, without assigning the reasons; and if decree passes in absence, there is no further allegation. If appearance is made, then a condescendence may be lodged, and the fees in consequence would be much modified for a decree in absence.

6863. You complain that the fee is too high at present for libelling a summons?—I think so, unless we are obliged to put the relevancy in. If we are obliged to put the relevancy in, our fee is not too high.

6864. At whose instigation was the fee fixed, do you know?—I do not know.

6865. Mr. Adam.—You don't think that the fees are too high for the work, but you think that the work is unnecessary?—I think the work is unnecessary.

6866. The Chairman.—What would you put into the writ?—It should just be a formal writ, containing the conclusions specifying the amount of money or demand, and generally the ground—the amount of account or bill.

6867. You would state the amount of account or bill?—Yes; or the sum due upon a bond.

6868. Would you describe the bill?—I would not make that indispensable, nor the title on which the parties acquired it.

6869. If there was an account, would you indorse it on the writ?—Yes.

6870. Mr. Campbell.—Some care would be required to identify the debt, so that a dishonest pursuer might not twice take decree for the same sum?—Yes.

6871. The Chairman.—Does not that come very near a small debt summons?—Very near it. The small debt summons appears to me to be unnecessarily cumbersome. It might be considerably shortened and made much more purpose-like, and much more information given to the defender in regard to his course of defence, if he intended to state such. In the County Courts Act in England there are instructions printed in the notice served on the defender, giving him notice what course he is to follow in case he wishes to settle the debt. He is warned that if he pays before the case comes into court, he will only have so much of expenses to pay; and if he intends to take a defence of such and such a character, he is bound to give notice. I think these are very valuable instructions, and that similar instructions ought to be printed in our small debt summons.

6872. Would you assimilate the small debt summons to the summons under the Debts Recovery Act, and the ordinary action summons?—Yes, I would assimilate them, but I think they are all capable of improvement; and one improvement I certainly would put in all summonses—viz. specifying the amount of expenses to be decerned for in case of decree passing in absence. That should be indorsed on every writ, in case of the defender failing to make appearance. The writ should make him acquainted with the whole sum, principal, interest, and expenses, which he shall have to pay.

6873. Would you still preserve three forms of summons?—There is no occasion for that; one form should be enough.

6874. You think one form should suit all questions of debt?—Yes.

6875. But you have ordinary actions which are not mere questions of debt. Do you approve of the present form of procedure as to these?—I approve of the form of procedure to a certain extent, but I think it might be amended. For instance, in an ordinary case where defender enters appearance, the Sheriff is required to take a note of the defence. 'If satisfied that no further written pleadings are necessary, he shall cause a minute to be written on the summons setting forth concisely the ground of defence.' It does not say the ground of any reply to that defence. In all cases where compensation or payment is set up, the pursuer has a reply or explanation of the ground of defence. The Sheriff is not ordered, nor apparently permitted, to make any memorandum of that; and when a case of that kind occurs, he must either order the record to be made up by condescendence and defences, or he puts the pursuer to the injustice of his pleas not being recorded. The defender's pleas are recorded, and not the pursuer's; so that we are driven to make up the record by condescendence and defences.

6876. You would allow the pursuer to make a statement which would be minuted in like manner as the defender's statement?—Yes.

6877. At what stage would you allow that?—The rule of the statute is, that the defender shall state his defence at the first calling of the cause, or at an adjourned calling not more than eight days after. If a defence is stated which the pursuer heard of for the first time at the calling of the cause, his procurator could not reply to that; and he must have an adjournment of six days if he asks it, to enable him to do so.

6878. And that would dispense in many cases with condescendence and answers?—Yes.

6879. And it would save expense?—Yes.

6880. And time?—Yes.

6881. Is there any other improvement on the form of pleadings that you would suggest?—I would suggest that, in all cases in which interdicts are applied for, they shall not be granted except on caution found, or such other precautions as are adopted in the Bill Chamber in Edinburgh. I think interdicts are too hastily granted in the Sheriff Courts. I think a man is as much bound to give caution in the inferior court as in the Supreme Court. Before an interdict is granted, the Sheriff should order caution to be found, unless he saw special grounds for not doing so.

6882. Would you apply that to an interim interdict?—Yes, or any interdict.

6883. It may be very urgent?—Yes; and if cause is shown, I would allow the Sheriff to grant it without caution; but, as a general rule, I should say that he ought to exact caution before granting interdict.

6884. Have you any further suggestion?—I think that actions of removing, in all cases where the rent is under £30, should be brought in the Small Debt Court, in the same manner that removings from temporary occupancies are brought just now. I don't see the use of having a formal summons of removing in the ordinary court, for the purpose of having a man removed out of a house or small possession. The expense of removings is generally money thrown away.

6886. You would adopt that form?—I would adopt that form, whether the occupancy be a temporary occupancy or a permanent occupancy. The form attached to the Act of 1838 is applicable only where the party occupies for a shorter period than a year; but I see no reason for not extending it to occupancies for the whole year. All actions of removing under £30 should be brought in the Small Debt Court under that form. There is no other improvement in the form of process that I am prepared to suggest.

6887. The Chairman.—Have you anything to suggest as to the costs of litigation in the Sheriff Court? Do you think there is any mode of abridging them?—There is not very much expense of law proceedings in the Sheriff Court, if the condescendence and defences are carefully framed. In regard to the costs of condescendence and defences, we are allowed a particular specified fee for a summons, no matter what length it is. We get no additional fee for making a long summons, and I don't think we should get any additional fee for making a long condescendence either. I think a fee should be fixed for condescendence and defence, and let the agent make them so long as he likes; but the length should not add to the cost of them. My idea is, that matter is unnecessarily spread over a number of pages in condescendence and defences; and I don't think the agent should get any profit out of it.

6888. You don't think the fees should be affected by the length of the pleadings?—No.

6890. But you think it should be a fixed fee for each of these three classes of cases?—Yes; just the same as it is for the summons. At present it is a fixed fee for the summons under £25, under £100, and above £100. If we have got that fee for our summons, the pursuer's agent has not much pretence for asking a fee for a condescendence which ought to be just a repetition of the summons.

6891. In a question of heritable right,—of large property,—the condescendence may require to be considerable?—It may, and consequently some discretion must be left to the judge in such cases; but, as a general rule, I should say that a man should not be paid by the length of his pleadings.

William Shiress.

6892. You would put the exception in the power of the judge?—I would.

6893. Do you think that if that change is not adopted, the fees as they are at present regulated are proper fees?—Yes; I think the fees as at present regulated are fair enough. There is a matter, certainly, in which the agents suffer some hardship in discussing preliminary defences. Unless the Sheriff orders a debate, the agent has the whole duty of discussing the preliminary defence, and that without any fee being provided. He only gets the fees for attendance at closing the record, and the record may never be closed if his preliminary defence prevail. He gets no fee in that case at all for debating a good defence. If he prevails, he cuts himself out of his fee.

6894. You think that is not a sound principle?—I think there is a defect in the Act of Sederunt in that particular. The fee for debating a preliminary defence should be allowed where the preliminary defence prevails.

6895. Has your attention been directed to the principle on which costs are regulated under the Debts Recovery Act?—It has.

6896. Do you approve of the scale and the principle, or do you disapprove of either of them?—I disapprove of the principle. It is impossible to say that a fixed sum can be reasonable compensation in a case where there may be half-a-dozen diets of proof, and twenty or thirty witnesses to precognosce. To say that you are to get the same for that as for precognoscing only one, and attending the diets of court throughout, is unreasonable. But at present there is just a slump sum allowed, no matter what the trouble may be. You may have a lengthy and intricate proof, and you get no compensation for it; while, on the other hand, you may for a very trifling amount of trouble get just the same.

6897. Mr. Gordon.—Are there many cases of that kind in which there are four or five diets of proof?—No; I suppose there are not many cases. But there are occasionally cases occurring in which we are obliged to have adjourned diets of proof.

6898. Have you known of one case under the Debts Recovery Act, in which there have been four or five diets of proof?—I knew only one case in which I had to attend the court at least half-a-dozen times before I got a judgment, owing to proofs, and debates, and adjournments of one kind or other. I cannot give the details from recollection, but I had a great amount of trouble before I got the judgment.

6899. Do you adjourn proofs in your court, or do you exhaust the proof of one or both parties before adjournment?—We exhaust the proof if we can before we adjourn, but cause is sometimes shown for adjournment quite unexpectedly. The witnesses may be unable to attend, or a witness may become necessary in consequence of something which has been brought out.

6900. In the case you mention, was there any adjournment for proof?—There was one adjournment of proof, because the pursuer showed he could not attend on that particular day to give his evidence. That was the only adjournment, I think. I went to Forfar to attend the proof, and it was not led because the pursuer could not attend. I was for the defender, and he was with me, but I don't think I had any other witnesses. I would have got the expenses of the witnesses, but I would have got nothing for my own fee. It appears to me impossible to regulate the fees by a slump sum. They must bear some proportion of the trouble bestowed, particularly where you are to lead proof. You can fix fees for formal judicial proceedings, but you cannot do so for proof. It depends on the amount of evidence necessary.

6901. The Chairman.—That must be paid by time?—That must be paid by time, or by the number of witnesses, or by some other criterion different from a mere slump sum. At present we are just allowed a certain sum for precognoscing witnesses. It may be a short precognition or a very lengthy precognition. Some of my brethren say that we should be paid by the length of the precognition; but I think the present rule operates, on the whole, nearly fairly, and that no benefit would be attained by making long precognitions any more than long papers in other cases. Therefore I maintain that a slump fee for precognoscing a witness approaches as nearly to justice as we can expect.

6902. Mr. Adam.—Do you think the principle of that Act in assessing costs might be applied with advantage in all cases where there is no proof? Your objection to it is, that in cases where proof is led, you can have no estimate of the cost of them. Do you think the principle of giving a certain fixed sum, where the litigant knows exactly what he has to pay, might be applied with advantage in cases where proofs were not required?—Probably it could. I don't see so much objection on that ground. I think the litigant is quite entitled to know what a law-agent's fees are to be, and to be able to say that they cannot exceed a certain sum supposing no proof to be taken.

6903. Your objection to that system of taxing the costs would not apply to cases where there is no proof?—No, I think not.

6904. Mr. Harrison.—Have you had many cases under the Debts Recovery Act in your own practice?—Not many; but I have had several.

6905. You mentioned one exceptional case; but in the other cases has the remuneration been sufficient?—Oh yes; in several cases I have had, I should say the remuneration was sufficient.

6906. Are you aware that a principle very similar has been in operation for a number of years in the English County Courts?—I am aware that something similar to it has been in operation; but I am not familiar with it.

6907. I believe there is a provision in the English County Courts Act, by which, if a client under his hand agrees to pay further costs or charges in exceptional cases, such as you have mentioned, it is legal; would you think such a provision a proper one to introduce into Scotland, by which, where there is extra labour, a client may agree to pay further expenses?—I don't see any objection whatever to that.

6908. The Chairman.—Does anything further occur to you as to costs?—Nothing further.

6909. In regard to privileges of agents, have you anything to suggest?—We complain of our services being entirely ignored by the Auditor of the Court of Session. He does not recognise our charges as any part of the expenses of a Court of Session lawsuit. Necessarily we have to gather the information out of which the action has to be raised in the country, where the cause of action has arisen, and we must communicate that to our Edinburgh agent. The fee for that is not recognised as any part of the expense of the case in the Court of Session.

6910. You think that is a hardship upon your client?—We think it is; and, of course, it deters us from recommending parties to go to the Court of Session. We have no temptation to do so, because we are obliged to tell our client that it is to be a sure loss to him. He cannot recover from the other side any part of our charges at all events. There is always a hardship in such a case, and we have a feeling of reluctance to put him to an obvious expense which he cannot possibly recover from the other side.

6911. Your suggestion would be, that the country agent's account should be allowed as part of the costs of the suit in the Court of Session?—The necessary expenses of getting up the information for raising the action should be allowed as part of the expenses in the Court of Session.

6912. The theory is, that the party can give that information himself, is it not?—The theory is so; but the practice is very seldom that.

6913. If he can give it to his country agent, he can give it to his town agent?—Yes.

6914. Is that an unsound theory, that if he can give it to one agent, he can give it to another?—I am not prepared to say that it is. There is certainly ground for concluding, that if he is able to instruct his country agent, he is able to instruct his town agent too. But in general, country people are not able to instruct either; and the country agent has to ferret out the information partly from his client, and partly from other sources.

6915. And it requires some one near the spot to accomplish that?—Yes, on the spot.

6916. And it would be more expensive to the client, if the Edinburgh agent had to ferret out that information, than if he employed the country agent to do it?—A great deal more.

6917. That is the ground on which you think expenses should be allowed?—Yes. In point of fact, it is the cheapest method of doing it.

6918. Have you anything further to say as to the position of agents?—Nothing further on the privileges of agents, so far as I am aware.

6919. Do you think agents should be allowed to practise in all courts?—I don't see any objection to that; at the same time, I am not maintaining it. The matter has not been under the consideration of our faculty. It would be a facility; but I don't know that it would be of much practical benefit. It is obvious that I could not practise in the courts of Aberdeen or Glasgow. I have enough to do practising at home; and if I require business to be done in another county, I must employ another agent there, the same as I must do in Edinburgh.

6920. Supposing you had not been so successful as you have been, and wished to transfer yourself to another Sheriffdom, to try your fortune there, would you consider it a hardship that you could not commence business there?—No, I would not. I would say I should not be allowed to practise elsewhere without first being admitted by the Sheriff of the county. The Sheriff must have some voice in the appointment of the procurators of his own county; and because I choose to leave Forfar and go to Perth, I would not say that the Sheriff of Perth would be bound to recognise me, unless I can show him that I am a person of good character, and qualified to practise.

6921. But supposing the Sheriff has no objection to it, and that there is a qualification prescribed by the general body of procurators in Scotland, do you think that, in that case, the procurators of the other town should have a right to exclude you?—No; if I can satisfy the Sheriff of the county, that having been admitted a procurator in another county, I am qualified to practise in his county, he should at once admit me, and he would do so as matter of course. But if I had misbehaved myself in the county in which I originally started, and am obliged to change my residence, and go, say to Ayrshire, and I produce my admission as a procurator in Forfarshire as giving me a right to practise in Ayrshire, that might be a great abuse.

6922. I am not putting the case of misconduct, but that of right,—whether stamping a man as a procurator by passing the examination required by the Society of Procurators should entitle him to go and practise in any court he likes?—I don't think it.

6923. You are not favourable to that?—No. I think the head of every court should have a certain amount of discretion in regard to who should practise before it. The Sheriff of every county should have that discretion, and therefore a man admitted in Perth has no right to go to the adjoining county and say he has a right to practise there.

6924. Mr. Baxter.—Supposing you went to Aberdeen, and wished to be admitted a procurator there, do you think it would be right that the Corporation of Solicitors at Aberdeen should be entitled to say to you, that because you had not served an apprenticeship with one of their body, they would not allow you to practise?—No. I object to all these monopolies. There are just the Aberdeen and the Lanarkshire procurators that have monopolies of that kind, which are undoubtedly grievances.

6925. You object to them?—Decidedly. I would leave the admission to the discretion of the head of the court. But I don't see that anybody has a right of monopoly.

6926. Mr. Harrison.—It is only to the head of the court that you would give the right to object?—Yes.

6927. The Chairman.—Do you see any good to be attained by authorizing the procurators in the country districts to follow their causes into the Court of Session, and be the agents in them there themselves?—I think that would be quite satisfactory. I don't know that practically it would be operative, except perhaps in the counties immediately adjoining Edinburgh; but in counties at a distance, I believe it would not do much good. Still it would be satisfactory if we had the right to do so.

6928. In what respect would it be satisfactory? Is it unsatisfactory that you have not the right?—A number of my brethren complain of it. They complain that, when they are forced into the Court of Session, they have to employ an Edinburgh agent. If we were able to attend the case ourselves, I believe that we would all employ Edinburgh agents in the long run; but being obliged to do so is the thing we complain of. It would come about, I think, that the Edinburgh agents would be employed, probably under some arrangement for a division of the fees.

6929. That would be the object?—And that would be the result. If we were entitled to practise in cases in the Court of Session which we had previously conducted in the Sheriff Court, we would say to our Edinburgh correspondents, 'We are not to give you the whole of these fees; we are entitled to have them.'

6930. That would be an indirect mode of compelling a distribution of the profits of the business?—It would.

6932. In that view, would not the town agent's remuneration be smaller than was contemplated when it was fixed by the court?—I presume it would.

6933. Then should it be increased to meet that?—I should hesitate very much about that; for the general complaint throughout the country is that the expenses in Edinburgh are so large that we cannot afford to increase them.

6934. I am assuming that the table of fees for the Edinburgh agent is a suitable table. You say the country agent ought to be entitled to abstract from the Edinburgh agent a portion of these fees?—Yes.

6935. Would that not leave the Edinburgh agent with a remuneration less than was contemplated as sufficient for him?—It would.

6936. Do you think that would be a fair thing towards him?—It would remove so much of his responsibility. He would not have the responsibility of conducting the case; he would not have the same responsibility as he would have without the country agent.

6937. Responsibility in what respect?—In the proper conduct of the case. He gets his fees just now, not so much for his own services, as for the order and regularity with which he conducts the proceedings.

6938. You would leave him to conduct the proceedings?—We would instruct him to do so. He would be our hand, doing it on our behalf. If we had a clerk resident in Edinburgh, he could do a great deal of the work for us which an Edinburgh agent does.

6939. But do you think the Edinburgh agent ought to be merely a person to do what you desire him, and to exercise no judgment of his own?—Yes, if we made the arrangement to that effect.

6940. He is responsible to the court before which he practises for the regularity and efficiency of his performance?—But on the supposition that I was entitled to practise in the court in Edinburgh, I would be responsible to the court also.

6941. Though you left him as the nominal agent?—I would not leave him as the nominal agent; he would do the work in my name.

6942. Then it would be this, that you would be entitled to the fees which he now gets, and you would allow him a portion out of them?—That would be the way of it.

William Shiress.

6943. You think that would be a good arrangement?—I understand that some such arrangement as that is practically in use in England. I understand that the local agent in England communicates with his London agent, and the London agent must do the work at the seat of the court; but the fees are divided betwixt them in certain proportions. I am not familiar with the practice, but there is a division of fees between the country agent and the town agent in England; and I don't see why the same rule should not prevail in Scotland.

6944. Mr. Shand.—That applies to the gross fees for the business in the town and in the country?—Quite so; but we are speaking here merely in regard to such cases as have originated in the Sheriff Court, and have been appealed to the Court of Session. I am not claiming the right to practise in the Court of Session in other cases.

6945. Do you think that if the privileges of agents were extended, so as to enable country agents to practise in the Court of Session, it would promote arrangements of that kind?—I do.

6946. Do you think it for the benefit of the public that there should be such arrangements?—It would certainly relieve clients, to a certain extent, of the country agent's account. We can get no part of the fees in this court, and in that case we would be entitled to them, and would have no further claim on our client.

6947. You don't propose to add to the expense of litigation by allowing charges in future which are not allowed now?—No.

6948. Lord Barcaple.—You limit that to cases that have begun in the Sheriff Court?—I am not claiming a right to practise in the Court of Session in other actions.

6949. Not in cases brought by clients of yours who have consulted you, where you have been the medium of communication with the Edinburgh agent whom you have selected for your client?—I think the Auditor of the Court of Session ought to recognise our services in getting up the information necessary for the institution of the action; but if that is allowed, I don't want to begin to practise in the Court of Session.

6951. Mr. Gordon.—What is the amount of the fee?—15s. for a summons under £25, £1 between £25 and £100, and £1, 10s. for a summons above £100.

6952. The Chairman.—Would you consider that sufficient remuneration in reference to a cause in the Court of Session?—Much depends upon the nature of the cause. It is impossible to say whether that is sufficient remuneration or not. I might have to go ten miles to the country to make inquiry.

6953. It is the remuneration at present in the Sheriff Court?—Yes, unless I can show special cause to my client. It is the remuneration between party and party, but it is not the remuneration between agent and client. If I am called on to go ten or twenty miles away from home to inquire into the facts, I must have an extra fee.

6954. If the Auditor of the Court of Session allowed you that sum, he would allow you the sum you would have got if you had brought the action in the Sheriff Court?—Yes; the sum I would have got from the other side.

6955. Do you think that the present division of the county of Forfar is a good arrangement—the one Sheriff-substitute being at Forfar, and the other at Dundee?—Yes; I think it is about as convenient as could be well adopted. I am aware that the people of Arbroath and Montrose say that these towns are larger than Forfar, and that the court ought to be held in one or other of these towns.

6956. Which of them?—The Arbroath people claim it for Arbroath, and the Montrose people for Montrose.

6957. But you don't claim it for Brechin?—No.

6958. The communication between Brechin and Forfar is not difficult?—No; it is quite easy.

6959. The communication between Arbroath and Forfar is not difficult?—No; it is quite easy.

6960. Is there any reason why you should go to Montrose rather than to Forfar?—None, except that the population is larger at Montrose and Arbroath.

6961. But when you have to go to attend court, is it equally convenient for you to go to Forfar?—It is as convenient for me to go to Forfar as to Montrose, and it is much more convenient for the interior of the county; it is much better served by having the court at Forfar. I think Forfar is quite a suitable place for the seat of the court.

6962. As to criminal matters, have you anything to say?—We think the Sheriff's jurisdiction should be extended; and if a principal Sheriff was appointed, having a large district such as we alluded to, he would virtually be nearly in the position of a Lord of Justiciary, and might take all or most of the cases which the Lords of Justiciary at present take. The quorum of the Court of Justiciary is just one judge, and he would be that one judge representing the Court of Justiciary. We therefore came to the result that, if a principal Sheriff such as we suggest were named, having a considerable district attached, he should have criminal jurisdiction in all causes which did not involve capital punishment or penal servitude for life.

6963. Mr. Clark.—What do you mean by not involving capital punishment?—Capital crimes; crimes for which a man may be sentenced to death.

6964. A man can be sentenced to death for three acts of theft?—Then he would be tried before the Court of Justiciary.

6965. You mean all cases where the legal punishment is a punishment of death?—Yes.

6966. Would you not limit the jurisdiction of the proposed judge very much in that view?—We would limit him, of course, to the inferior class of crimes, and we don't intend to abolish the Circuit Courts of Justiciary. We contemplate that these would be required.

6967. Lord Barcaple.—Does he not at present exercise as large a jurisdiction as you propose to give him?—He does not sentence anybody to penal servitude.

6968. Was your first answer not rather to the effect that you would give the Sheriff jurisdiction in all cases which are not practically capital?—Yes, certainly; it comes to that.

6969. Excluding murder, and high treason, and such other crimes?—Yes; such crimes as involve capital punishment.

6970. Mr. Shand.—Excluding pleas of the Crown, I suppose?—For high treason you have a special law.

6971. Lord Barcaple.—You would not exclude robbery?—No.

6972. The Chairman.—What is the benefit you would expect to derive from that extension of the power of punishment to the Sheriff?—The benefit would be, that the great bulk of the crimes would be tried in our own county, not requiring the witnesses to come to Edinburgh, or to go to Dundee or Perth. The trial would take place at Forfar, and not at the seat of the Circuit Court; and they would take place in every county.

6973. You think that would save the expense of the witnesses?—It would save expense of witnesses to the Crown, and save trouble to jurors attending from a distance.

6974. Mr. Baxter.—And the trial would be more speedy?—Yes.

6975. Mr. Gordon.—Would it not be likely to cause more expense to take the witnesses from Dundee to Forfar, instead of giving their evidence at Dundee, where the great bulk of the crime of the county is to be found?—The Sheriff would sit in Forfar for the crimes in the Forfar district, and at Dundee for the crimes in the Dundee district.

6976. The Chairman.—And the Circuit Court would sit at Dundee for what?—For such crimes as the Sheriff could not try.

6977. For cases of murder and treason?—And fire-raising and other serious offences.

6978. Have you any other suggestion to make in regard to criminal business?—It occasionally occurs in Forfar that a jury is summoned where there is only one case to try. Forty-five men are called from various parts of the county, though there is only that one trial. I was instructed to suggest that, where only one trial is set down and a jury requires to be summoned, the jury shall be balloted at the first diet. A list of the jurors is always served on the panel before the first diet, and it would be no hardship to him that the jury should be balloted on the first day, and then only the necessary number summoned to form the jury, with such a margin as to meet contingencies. I think the 15 who are to try the case should be summoned, and 2 or 3 more, to avoid any risk of any of the 15 not attending. That would not be practicable if there were three or four trials set down for the same day; but it frequently occurs at Forfar that there is just one jury trial, and there is no necessity for 45 men being brought, while only 15 are required.

6979. That would be an advantage also if the number of causes to be tried by the Sheriff was increased?—Yes; if he had three or four cases to try at the same time, the necessary number of jurors must be summoned.

6980. But if the number of cases to be tried by the Sheriff, by extending his power of punishment, was increased, jurors would be more frequently summoned to attend?—Yes.

6981. And in contemplation of that also, you would suggest this mode of relieving them from the additional trouble which they would then have?—Yes.

6982. Mr. Clark.—Is there any advantage in having so many jurors as 45 summoned? Could the panel be diminished advantageously?—It depends upon the number of parties. You may have three men accused of one crime: each has a right to challenge 5 jurors; and if each exercised that right, there would be 15 jurors challenged by the prisoners, and 5 might be challenged by the Crown. That cuts off 20.

6983. But take the ordinary case of there being a single prisoner to be tried under the indictment; do you see any advantage in having so large a jury as 45 summoned?—No; I think the panel might be reduced.

6984. What number would you suggest, or have you considered that?—I have not considered the question very much; but if the jury is to consist of 15, as hitherto, you have 15 to provide, and 5 for peremptory challenges by the panel, and 5 for peremptory challenges by the Crown, besides the other contingencies of non-attendance, and so on. It appeared to us that the best method was to ballot the jury at the first diet without their attending, with a sufficient margin to cover any contingency, or ballot 20, and let it be understood that the first 15 shall serve; but if any of them are unable to attend, then take the next in order, or allow the judge to make up the necessary number by a tales, if any one was not able to attend.

6985. What is your opinion as to the number of a jury that should sit in the Sheriff Court in criminal cases?—I think 9 in the ordinary case is quite enough.

6986. Is there to be one number for all cases of one class, and another for a certain other class of cases?—I should say one jury for one class, and another for another class, would be nearer the justice of the case. I don't think you could make an equal number for all cases; 15 is an unnecessarily cumbrous jury, but there may be instances in which it may be an advantage to have a large jury.

6987. The Chairman.—Do you think the distinction between special jurors and common jurors is of importance?—We had a general impression that the jury are summoned from a class rather too low in life. A liferenter to the extent of £5 a year is liable to serve as a juror. Now we thought a man in that position is hardly fit to be a very intelligent juror in the common run of cases, and we think the qualification of jurors should be raised; but we did not contemplate doing away with the distinction between special and common jurors. We would rather have it, that a man should not be liable to serve unless he is owner of heritage to the extent of £10 a year instead of £5, or in possession of personal property of the value of £300, or something more, instead of £100 or £200, which I think it is at present. But we think the qualifications of common jurors should be raised, and that they should not be taken from so low a class of society as at present.

6988. You would retain the special jurors?—Yes.

6989. Giving a certain infusion of people of a higher class?—Yes.

6990. Lord Barcaple.—Would you propose to raise the qualification of the special jurors?—We did not contemplate that.

6991. Mr. Clark.—Do you find the jury list in your county well made up, so as to divide the labour equally among the jurors liable to serve?—So far as I am aware, it is pretty well made up for that purpose.

6992. Both as applicable to the Circuit jury and to the Sheriff's jury?—Yes.

6993. Is it done by the Sheriff-clerk?—The Sheriff-clerk nominally does it, but it is the schoolmasters in the country parishes that do it, and in the town it is a Sheriff-officer or constable generally.

6994. He gets the names to be inserted in the list?—Yes, and reports them to the Sheriff-clerk.

6995. The Chairman.—Have you anything further to suggest as to criminal matters?—We complain very much of the fees of the Clerks of Justiciary in suspensions and appeals in criminal cases as being very oppressive; and we think the rule of the Act 9 Geo. IV. cap. 29, by which no fees are payable to clerks by accused persons, unless they form part of the sentence of the court, should apply to cases where the panel becomes appellant or suspender in the Justiciary Court.

6996. Mr. Shand.—Can you tell us what these fees are?—I think the Clerk of Justiciary claims £1, 14s. for lodging an appeal with him, and he claims something for attendance during the discussion. His fees are heavy. It is a considerable time since I paid them, but another gentleman told me he had paid them within the last twelve months. I never could find any authority for exacting these fees.

6997. The Chairman.—Is there any Justice of Peace Small Debt Court held at Brechin?—There is.

6998. Frequently?—Once a month.

6999. Is that a jurisdiction that gives satisfaction?—There is very little business in it generally now.

7000. It is convenient, is it?—Very convenient for the recovery of small debts.

7001. Is it the magistrates of Brechin that sit on the bench?—Occasionally the magistrates of Brechin, but we have generally local Justices. Several of the principal inhabitants of Brechin are on the Commission of the Peace, and attend in the Small Debt Court.

7002. Do they discharge any other judicial functions?—There are occasionally applications made to them under the Master and Servants Act, and they have a good deal of duty to do in judging of road offences and poaching, and other statutory crimes. Occasionally they have to determine questions as to frauds on the revenue. A good deal of business comes before the Justices of the Peace.

7003. Is it, upon the whole, satisfactorily done?—Yes, I think it is.

7004. Is there any part of it you think ought to be taken away from them?—I have some doubt as to whether they are the best judges under the Master and Servants Act, but I don't see that it is possible to remove that jurisdiction from the Justices of the Peace. I think it must be maintained for the sake of the police of the country.

7005. Poaching cases?—Poaching questions under the Night Poaching Act are not brought before the Justices of the Peace, though they have jurisdiction in them to a certain extent; but under the Day Poaching Act cases are constantly brought before the Justices of the Peace.

7006. Are these considered to be well-decided cases?—There is some grumbling about them, but I don't think it is of any material consequence. I don't know that it would be any material relief to the country to transfer them all to the Sheriff, as has been proposed.

7007. Do they grant licences for public-houses?—

William Shiress.

Yes, certificates to enable the parties to keep public-houses.

7008. Do they sit in Petty Sessions to do that?—Yes.

7009. That is reviewable by the Quarter Sessions?—Yes; that applies to the country district. The magistrates of Brechin grant certificates within the burgh, but for the country the Justices of the Peace do so.

7010. Is that duty satisfactorily done?—Yes, on the whole I think it is.

7011. You think the review by the Quarter Sessions is a good check upon the jurisdiction exercised by the magistrates and by the Justices in Petty Sessions?—Yes, I do. I think there must be some review, and the Quarter Sessions seems a suitable enough review of the licensing system.

7012. There are other revenue cases that come before the Justices of the Peace in Quarter Sessions—evasions of statutes?—Yes, evasions of revenue statutes occasionally.

7013. I believe that is satisfactorily done?—I think it is. They are generally small fines for keeping dogs without licences, and so on. They are trifling offences generally, though sometimes there are pretty heavy penalties attached to the evasion of revenue statutes.

7014. Do the magistrates of Brechin exercise criminal jurisdiction in any matter?—Except in the Police Court, I don't think any criminal jurisdiction has been exercised in Brechin since the Police Act was adopted. Prior to that they used to exercise jurisdiction.

7015. They have no separate Police Act of their own?—No; they have adopted the General Police Act.

7016. Is that duty satisfactorily done?—Yes; there is no complaint about it, that I am aware of.

7017. Are there a Provost and Bailies?—Yes, a Provost and two Bailies.

7018. Do they hold a Civil Debt Court?—They have the usual jurisdiction of the Burgh Court in civil cases, but practically it is inoperative. No actions for debts are brought before them, but there are numerous actions of removing. They have a form of summons for removing tenants which is practically adopted, and very useful. They remove tenants at very small expense.

7019. Have you a Dean of Guild?—We have.

7020. Does he exercise any jurisdiction?—He does. No buildings can be pulled down or new buildings erected without the Dean of Guild's warrant. He has to examine the plans of all buildings that are proposed, and he has to sanction their being erected, or any building fronting the street pulled down. He holds Building Courts for that purpose.

7021. Does he exercise any superintendence over buildings, to see whether they are ruinous or dangerous, or not?—He does, at the instance of the police. The surveyor of the police watches the chimney-tops and dangerous houses; and if, after he complains to the proprietors, a remedy is not applied, the Dean of Guild is called on to interfere.

7022. Have you any Barony or Regality Courts?—None at Brechin. There is a Barony Court at Kirriemuir. The chief magistrate of Kirriemuir is the Baron Bailie of Kirriemuir, and he exercises police powers, but no other sort of authority that I am aware of.

7023. Does your Sheriff-clerk reside in the county?—He does.

7024. Does he do duty in person?—He does occasionally. He sometimes acts in Dundee, and sometimes in Forfar. He has two offices, one in Dundee and one in Forfar; and he sometimes appears at the one, and sometimes at the other.

7025. Has he a deputy at each?—Yes.

7026. Mr. Baxter.—The deputy mainly does the duty?—He does, and must necessarily do so, because the Sheriff-clerk cannot be in two places at once.

7027. The Chairman.—Is the duty satisfactorily done at Forfar?—Yes, generally speaking, I should say it is. I don't recollect any reasonable ground of complaint.

7028. You cannot speak as to Dundee?—No.

7029. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Was the Burgh Court at Brechin formerly very much frequented as a civil court?—It was a good deal frequented, and cases were frequent in it prior to the Act of the first of the Queen—the Personal Diligence Act. Prior to that time we could not enforce a Sheriff's decree except by horning, when the party was beyond the Sheriff's territory; and we cannot enforce a magistrate's decree yet, except by horning. We have frequently resorted to the Burgh Court for the purpose of obtaining decrees in absence, and even in foro in litigated cases, where their decree was as good as the Sheriff's decree against the party. But now the Sheriff's decree is so much better than the magistrate's decree, in consequence of its being enforceable in any county, that the Burgh Courts have virtually become inoperative.

7030. You attribute the falling off of the business in these courts?—To the greater facility of carrying Sheriff's decrees into execution.

7031. Would you recommend that a similar facility should be given for carrying the decrees of magistrates in Burgh Courts into execution?—If it be desirable to continue the Burgh Courts, and to render them operative and useful in the administration of justice, that could be done.

7032. Is it your opinion that that should be done?—In ordinary civil cases I should say not. There are certain cases in the Dean of Guild Court in which he has a privative jurisdiction: questions of possession in regard to buildings must come before him. According to the existing law he has a privative jurisdiction, and the Sheriff has not a cumulative jurisdiction with him in that respect. We so interpret the law, and we must have decrees of the Dean of Guild; and in local and possessory questions the magistrates' decrees may be important. But in ordinary actions for the recovery of debts, we are better before the Sheriff.

7034. Then you don't attribute anything to the Act of 1853 as altering the resort to these courts?—No; I think the business of the Burgh Courts, not in Brechin only, but in Arbroath and Montrose also, died away after the Act of 1838, rendering the Sheriff's decree so much more easily operated upon, giving it execution all over Scotland on simple indorsements and warrants of concurrence.

7035. The Chairman.—And that you consider a great facility and advantage?—Yes.

7036. Have you any other suggestion to make?—There are two matters which my brethren recommended me to mention. Persons in custody applying for liberation on bail should in like manner be liable in no fees to the clerks or officers of court in respect of their petitions or bail-bonds. Poor prisoners applying for the benefit of the Act of Grace should in like manner be exempted from all fees to clerks or officers of court. An applicant for the benefit of the Act of Grace should be dealt with as on the poor's roll ab initio, in the same manner as an applicant for parochial relief under the Act of Sederunt of 12th February 1846.

7037. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Are the fees paid in those cases, and the fees you spoke of as payable in cases of suspension in the Court of Justiciary, paid into the pockets of the clerks?—If the application for bail is made in the Sheriff Court, the fees are paid to the Sheriff-clerk, but he accounts for them to the Exchequer; if the application is made for bail, or for the Act of Grace to the Burgh Court of Forfar (the prison being within the burgh), they go into the pocket of the town-clerk.

7038. In what way are the fees in the suspensions and in the Circuit Court disposed of?—I do not know. I should have said, in regard to the form of process in the Sheriff Courts, that we find the clause in the Act of 1853, declaring that an action becomes dismissed if parties do not move in it for three months, to be a great obstruction in practice, as many classes of cases require to be brought in the Sheriff Court in which we cannot reasonably move for three months. For instance, a sequestration for rent currente termino, if we bring it in December in respect of the rent falling due at the previous Martinmas, and to fall due at the ensuing Whitsunday, we cannot reasonably move in it till after Whitsunday. Consequently the three months have elapsed before that time, and it is dismissed. We don't think that produces any practical good. It is a mere trap and pitfall. Of course it keeps us alive, and makes us take care to get in some formal way the case moved in; but if there is no necessity for actually proceeding in it, these are mere additional expenses for no purpose.

7039. Lord Barcaple.—It causes additional expense either by moving when there is no practical object in doing so, or by taking steps to get the process revived?—Yes.

7040. Mr Adam.—Has it any effect in making cases be faster proceeded with?—I don't think so.

7041. Mr. Shand.—Does the judge not object to these renewals from time to time?—He does.

7042. Has that no effect?—I don't know that it has very much. There is always some excuse for the case lying over. If there really is delay in the case, it has effect; but where the delay is inevitable, it is of no benefit. William Shiress.

7043. The Chairman.—If the delay has been mutual, then the parties agree to some step?—Yes; to save the nominal dismissal of the action.

7044. Do you find there is much delay in the Sheriff Court of Forfar, from parties accommodating each other with time in implementing orders?—We find a good deal of delay on that account.

7045. Unnecessary delay?—Sometimes we reckon it unnecessary. I cannot say that I think there is much unnecessary delay. I think that, unless one agent satisfies the other that there is really some reasonable cause, he does not consent to the delay.

7046. Would it be a reasonable cause that the agent making the application had once consented to his getting delay?—I daresay there is giff-gaff in that way, but there is not much of that.

The Right Hon. LORD COLONSAY in the Chair.

Robert Neill, Esq., examined. Robert Neill.

7047. The Chairman.—You are a practitioner before the Sheriff Court of Renfrewshire at Greenock?—I am.

7048. I believe you have considerable acquaintance with Admiralty and maritime causes?—I have. I have been a procurator since 1846.

7049. Your attention has been a good deal directed to the subject that I have alluded to?—It has.

7050. Have you any suggestions to offer to the Commissioners with reference to such causes?—I may explain that we have always had great doubts as to the extent to which the maritime jurisdiction was transferred to the Sheriffs with regard to foreigners, owing to the expression that was used in the amending Act, that the Sheriff was to have jurisdiction, provided the defender was amenable to the jurisdiction upon any legal ground of jurisdiction. The main question was this—Did the statute authorize the Sheriff to entertain actions against foreigners where the jurisdiction was created solely by arrestment of the debtor's effects? Up to this time we have never been certain whether or not the Sheriff had that jurisdiction, although there have been two decisions by Lords Ordinary—one by Lord Ormidale, and the other by Lord Barcaple, sustaining the Sheriff's jurisdiction where arrestment was so constituted. I have looked into this question pretty narrowly, to see if I could find any authorities from the Supreme Court bearing upon it; and I find that, in the case of Bernard v. Connor, 11th June 1811, F. C. 275, the Court of Session sustained the jurisdiction of the River Bailie, who had inferior Admiralty jurisdiction, where the jurisdiction had been constituted solely by arrestment of the ship. From that time there seems to have been no case bearing on the inferior court's jurisdiction until the year 1836, when I found, on looking into the authorities, the case of Kennedy v. Muir, 10th March 1836. That case was one regarding the jurisdiction of the Sheriff in cessio matters, where the creditors to a certain extent resided furth of Scotland. The objection was taken in that case, that the Sheriff could have no jurisdiction over foreign creditors, as these were subject solely to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session. The case came before Lord Medwyn, I think, on a suspension, and he ordered cases on the point; and with the leave of the Commission I would read a short passage from his opinion on the cases, showing where the difficulty lay, and what he thought of it. He said in his note: 'When the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court as a separate court was abolished and transferred to the Court of Session and to the Sheriff Courts, considering the nature of that court, having reference chiefly to foreigners, it was necessary that they should be made subject to the new jurisdiction, as by the law of nations they had been to the old and original jurisdiction, and accordingly the jurisdiction is expressly conferred on them.' The case was considered by the First Division of the court, which at that time consisted of Lord President Hope, Lords Gillies, Mackenzie, and Corehouse; and they consulted the five Lords Ordinary—Lords Fullerton, Cockburn, Moncreiff, Jeffrey, and Cunninghame; and the First Division decided that the Sheriff had the jurisdiction over the foreigners in the cessio case; and they said: 'As there is a large class of mercantile cases (Admiralty causes), in which, by the 1st Will. IV. cap. 69, Sheriffs have an undoubted jurisdiction over foreigners, that example alone is sufficient to show that Sheriffs ought, even under a literal construction of the above clause (in the Cessio Act), to have jurisdiction in cases of cessio.' Then I found that in 1837 there had been a case before the Sheriff Court of Ayr, where an Irish vessel was arrested.

7051. What do you bring all this to?—It is just to show this, that, according to the decisions as they have been given, there is a tendency in favour of the Sheriff having jurisdiction over foreigners, where the jurisdiction is created by arrestment; but still there is an uncertainty hanging over the matter, because the decision of the Lords Ordinary lately have not been taken before the Inner House.

7052. But the uncertainty is not caused by these decisions of the Lords Ordinary; on the contrary, these decisions go in the same direction?—Yes.

7053. Well, they don't raise any uncertainty?—No. But we have waited for a decision of the Inner House to confirm these decisions; and then, of course, we should feel satisfied that we may bring the case before the Sheriff, where the jurisdiction has been constituted by arrestment. In the meantime, we feel that there is a doubt, and that there would be a considerable responsibility resting upon an agent who arrested a vessel upon such a jurisdiction.

7054. Might you not have had such a decision as you wish if that case you have referred to, or if any other case, had been brought before the Inner House?—No doubt; but the cases were not appealed.

7055. Mr. Baxter.—Have you confined your observations at present to maritime causes?—I have. There is one reason why this matter should now be settled with regard to such arrestments; and it is this, that the number of foreign vessels coming to our Scotch ports is very much on the increase. In my own experience as a notary, I find that from June 1850 till June 1862, out of 1030 protests I noted, 230 were of foreign vessels; but from 1865 till December 1868, three and a half years, out of 683 protests, 304 were foreigners, or about one half. Under foreign I do not include either English or Irish, or, of course, Scotch vessels.

7056. You refer merely to continental vessels?—Yes.

7057. Mr. Gordon.—Should English vessels not be included?—Yes; but as they are nearer home, we do not find so much necessity with regard to the arrestment of these vessels.

7058. The Chairman.—Do you mean that you do not proceed so frequently to arrest them?—We are not in so much doubt as to the recovery of our debt; because in the case of a Spanish, or a Portuguese, or an Austrian vessel, they may happen to come to this country only once; and if they are not arrested at the time, it is probable they will never be here again.

7059. Mr. Gordon.—Were these arrestments used chiefly for claims at the instance of inhabitants of this country, or were any of them used at the instance of the crews of the vessels?—In the cases I have referred to, the first was at the instance of a seaman; and the others were at the instance, partly of members of the crew, and partly of home subjects.

7060. Were there several foreign creditors who pursued in this country, or were the foreign creditors entirely members of the crew?—They were members of the crew.

7061. Then there was no foreign creditor who pursued in this country?—No.

7062. What I refer to are the arrestments which were used by you, and not the particular cases to which you before referred?—I have used arrestments at the instance of persons belonging to this country, and also, it may be, of foreign creditors who have happened to have claims against their debtors in this country.

7063. That is, for foreign creditors who have claims against ships belonging to foreign debtors?—Yes; for example, I have arrested a vessel belonging to subjects of Hamburg, at the instance of creditors residing there.

7064. Are there many such cases?—No; I could not say that there are many. The chief cases are cases at the instance of residents in Great Britain, against the subjects of foreign countries.

7065. Mr. Baxter.—Have you a good many of these?—Yes.

7066. Mr. Gordon.—Were they for claims of debt contracted within Scotland, for furnishings to the vessel; or for what kind of claims were they?—They were generally for furnishings to the vessel in British ports. Where the debt is of large amount, I usually advise the parties to go at once to the Court of Session; but when the amount is small, we would like to have the privilege of going to the Sheriff Court.

7067. Mr. Baxter.—Is it your opinion that it should be competent to prosecute such claims in the Sheriff Courts?—Yes.

7068. Would you confine that to maritime claims, or would you extend it to all kinds of debt?—I would extend it to all cases, of any amount. I think, with regard to all matters of common debt, the Sheriff Court jurisdiction should not be restricted more than it is just now; but I do not agree with the opinion that the Sheriff should have universal jurisdiction.

7069. My question was confined to actions against foreigners founded upon arrestment: would you give the Sheriff jurisdiction in these cases, whether the cases were maritime or not?—I only spoke of maritime cases.

7070. But what about cases other than maritime—other claims for debt?—I don't think there would be any danger in giving the Sheriff jurisdiction, where the jurisdiction was created by arrestment for any kind of debt. Then I wish to bring before the Commissioners this fact, that just now, in order to effect security for the debt, there must be two arrestments: one arrestment, first, to constitute the jurisdiction, and then the arrestment of the vessel, or the subject to secure payment of the debt sued for. Of course, in any case of a debt for a large amount, supposing the doubt was to remain, I would certainly feel that I was bound, in order to keep myself safe, to apply to the Court of Session for the summons; but I think that, in order to expedite matters, the constitution of the jurisdiction and the securing of the debt should be effected by one writ—by a petition to the Sheriff setting forth the debt shortly, and stating that the petitioner intended to sue the debtor, and that the debtor had effects within the Sheriff's jurisdiction, and craving a warrant to arrest jurisdictionis fundandæ causa, and also in security of payment of any debt that might be found due in any action to be raised within a certain time after the date of the arrestment.

7071. The Chairman.—Then one arrestment would be all that would be used?—One arrestment would be all. Just now, supposing we have to sue before the Court of Session, we have first to apply to the Sheriff, by petition, to issue a precept. Then, having got his warrant, we have to get a precept from the Sheriff-clerk. Then the vessel is arrested. We get the execution of the arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa from the officer; send it on to Edinburgh with the account; then we get the summons signeted; and having got it thus to the place where the vessel is lying, we then put it into the hands of the messenger to arrest. That may involve two or three days; and just now the common belief is, that the vessel is not arrested in such a way under the first arrestment as to secure payment of the debt.

7073. Would you keep a vessel lying for two months before raising an action, supposing you arrested her? Would it not be better to have the warrant of arrestment in the conclusion of the summons?—Well, that would serve the same purpose, if it was declared that the arrestment on the summons was also to comprehend arrestment to found jurisdiction. Just now, also, when the vessel is arrested under a Court of Session warrant, the arrestment is not loosed except under an application to the Court of Session. Now that involves considerable delay; and I know a case, within the last month, where there was a delay of nearly fourteen days in discussing as to the arrestment. That was a case of arrestment ad effectum. I have found a copy of the commission in favour of the Admiral Depute who held authority at Greenock under the old court. It is dated in 1815; and I find in it that the local Admiral Depute had power not only to loose arrestment laid on under his own warrant, but also arrestments laid on under warrant of the High Court of Admiralty. I think, therefore, that if the power was extended to the Sheriff to loose arrestments laid on either by himself or by the Court of Session, you would simply be following out the practice that was followed before the transfer of the jurisdiction. The words are these: 'The power of loosing arrestments of vessels and goods at sea or in the harbour, the said arrestments being on depending actions, and being loosed always on sufficient caution found to make the subject arrested forthcoming; and this power is given whether the said arrestments have been laid on by the High Court of Admiralty, in virtue of precepts authenticated and issued from that court, or have proceeded on warrants granted by the said Judge Admiral-Depute himself upon summary applications.'

7074. The Chairman.—What is the authority by which that is issued?—It is a commission granted by the Right Hon. James Wolfe Murray, Judge of the High Court of Admiralty in Scotland in 1815, to Claud Marshall, who was then his depute.

7075. That is an authority which he gave to his own depute?—Yes. I have further to explain that it is a great necessity that summary power of arrestment should be given to the local judge, not only where a debt is sued for, but where there is a conclusion in an action for delivery of a subject. For example, where goods have been shipped, and the master of the foreign vessel, or the vessel, refuses to give bills of lading, except, perhaps, on his own terms. I have known cases where we have obtained an interdict against the master of the vessel, against his sailing, until he did give the bills of lading; but although the interdict was served upon him, he just went away, and paid no attention to it. In these cases, just now we don't know of any recognised or sanctioned form by which the judge is authorized to stop that vessel; and I think that he might be authorized, on a summary application, to grant a warrant to arrest the vessel, and to dismantle her, until the goods were delivered up, or until the bills of lading were signed; otherwise a foreigner may just steal away, and leave the merchant without the proper voucher for his goods. I have also known a case of a vessel lying at Glasgow under an interdict of the Court of Session, but removed from Glasgow and taken away to an English port, and thus the proceedings against her were defeated.

7076. Mr. Paterson.—The power of dismantling is not understood to attend an interdict as it does an arrestment?—No.

7077. The Chairman.—Have you any further suggestion to offer on this matter?—I wish to refer to a change that I would suggest with regard to the mode of trying actions arising out of collision, or for salvage, or for shipmasters' wages, and my remarks under this head may, perhaps, apply both to the forms in the Sheriff Courts and to those in the Court of Session. Just now, actions of damages for collision are generally—I believe invariably—tried before a jury, and there is considerable dissatisfaction felt with regard to the decisions of juries on such questions. The change I would suggest would be this, that actions of collision should be tried by the judge himself, assisted by two experts, as the judge of the Admiralty Court in England tries such cases there.

7078. That is with the assistance of the brethren of the Trinity House?—Yes. I would also suggest that only the question of liability should be tried in the first instance, and that the details as to the amount of damage which the injured vessel has sustained should be left to be ascertained by one of the clerks of court, assisted by two experts, as is done in the Admiralty Court in England, because I think that greater justice would be done to all parties by a quiet ascertainment of the amount of damage in that way than by having a number of witnesses brought up before a jury, and their evidence taken under the present system. Then, with regard to salvage cases, I think that they also should be tried before the judge, with the assistance of two experts, and that the judge should have the power to decide not only as to whether it was a salvage service, but also as to the amount of salvage payable. Just now the Sheriff or two Justices have the power, by the latest amendment of the Merchant Shipping Act—that of 1862—to try all questions of salvage up to the value of £1000. At first jurisdiction was given to the Sheriff and to the Justices only up to the extent of £200—that was in 1854; but when they amended the Act in 1862, they extended it to £1000, showing that the policy of the law just now is to extend the jurisdiction of the Sheriff in such cases. Then, with regard to actions for the payment of wages claimed by masters, and for the balance of their disbursement accounts, I think that these would be very well tried also by the judge, if the employment is admitted, and it is only the amount that is disputed, by his remitting to the clerk of court, or to a special commissioner or other person who may be named, to be assisted by two persons well acquainted with shipping accounts, who would go over and check them, and have the matter speedily disposed of. Under the present system there is a great deal of delay in getting payment of shipmasters' wages and disbursement accounts, because they involve so many questions regarding payments at foreign ports; while generally you find that shipowners who have had vessels in the same trade are so well acquainted with the usual charges that they are able, by a careful examination of the items, and by comparing them with the vouchers, to know at once whether the accounts are fairly stated or not.

7079. Mr. Paterson.—Before you leave that question of collisions, you point at having separate trials I think, one to settle the merits of the collision, and the other to assess the damages?—Yes.

7080. Would you apply that to all cases of collision, or do you not think it would be better, in order to save time and expense, that you should limit that to collisions above a certain amount?—I would prefer that, in all cases, the amount of damage should be ascertained in the way I have suggested.

7081. Supposing a case involving no great amount of money, would it not be a hardship on the parties to dispose of the case at two diets if one would suffice?—Of course it might be. But looking at the matter as a whole, I think, by having the investigation as to the amount before the clerk of court, and two persons acquainted with the items that form the claim, it could be settled very cheaply and very expeditiously.

7082. Do you find that there are cases of collision which are not complicated, and do not involve much money?—In any cases of collision that we have had, I think the most expensive witnesses we had to bring to the court were those to speak to the extent of the damage.

7083. The Chairman.—With reference to those experts who are to sit with the judges in trying the merits of the case, do you mean that they should be entitled to vote on the merits of the question?—No; simply to sit with the judge, in order that he might have their advice and assistance on any matter with which he is not so well acquainted as they are.

7084. Would you have them paid for their services?—I think so; a rate should be fixed by the auditor of the court.

7085.—Would you have them to be fixed officers of the court?—Yes.

7086. So that they would be the same persons coming in in various cases?—Yes.

7087. Then, with regard to an examination of the accounts, would you have them to decide anything, or would it be the clerk of court who should decide?—I think the clerk of court would be the person to decide; but I should have added that his report should be subject to the review of the judge, on any question of principle, the same as is the practice in the Admiralty Court in England. I think the rule there, with regard to the costs, is, that if there be one-third deducted, the claimant must pay the costs of the remit.

7088. Then, as to damage, would these experts have any voice as to the amount of damage to be fixed?—I think the clerk of court should be the judge, assisted by these experts, with regard to the question of the value of the ship that was lost.

7089. But you think the clerk of court should be the judge?—Yes; or whoever might be the person to whom the remit was made.

7090. What would be the purpose of making a remit?—I mean a remit by the court to the clerk of court, or to any special commissioner, to examine and to decide that point.

7091. You say the most expensive witnesses in a trial of collision generally are those as to damage; would these witnesses be all called before the clerk of court then?—No, I think not. You would require to have merely one or two witnesses to speak to any point that might arise; but then, these experts being there would be able to test the value of the evidence given, in a much better way than the clerk of court or the judge could do.

7092. Do you not think the experts, who have sat at the trial of the merits and heard the case, could do it with as few witnesses, and as well, as if it were to come afterwards before the clerk of court?—I think not.

7093. Mr. Gordon.—Probably you anticipate that the attendance of many of the witnesses necessary at a jury trial could be dispensed with if there was an investigation before the clerk, assisted by these experts?—Yes, I do.

7094. You think that their skill would enable them to estimate the amount of the different articles, and that parties would rest contented with their estimate?—I think they would very generally do so.

7095. Therefore they would only call for the attendance of witnesses in matters upon which they were not able, in point of skill, to form an opinion themselves, or where it was a matter of fact more particularly requiring the examination of witnesses?—That is my opinion of the matter.

7096. The Chairman.—Would you have the experts dealing with the damages to be the same persons who had heard the case on the merits?—I think they would require to be of a separate class. The experts on the merits would be shipmasters.

7097. Then you think a different kind of skill would be required in questions relating to accounts?—Yes, a different kind of skill would have to be brought to bear there; and I may say that I have often cases of collision, in which we endeavour to choose a person who is not only acquainted with nautical affairs, but who also has a knowledge of the cost of repairs, and the value of vessels. When such a person can be got, we like to have him as the sole judge, in order that we may, in that way, have his skill brought to bear upon the question of liability and the question of amount at the same time, without requiring to call many witnesses.

7098. It must be a very particular case where you can get such a man?—Yes. There is one question regarding the jurisdiction in maritime cases that I have experienced a little trouble with, and that is where the owners of a Scotch vessel reside in different counties. If the case is of small amount, of course we would desire to have it brought in the Sheriff Court; but in such a case, according to a decision of both our Sheriffs, we cannot bring it in the Sheriff Court, however small the amount may be. We must go to the Court of Session, even for a £50 or £60 debt. Now, I think that jurisdiction should be conferred on the Sheriff of the county, either where the contract has been made, or where it is to be executed, or where the majority of the owners may happen to reside. There is a provision in the Act of Parliament which transferred the jurisdiction, to the effect that where any of the defenders reside out of the Sheriff's jurisdiction, these defenders might be cited under an indorsed warrant; but that provision was thought not to give the power of such citation, unless these defenders were amenable to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff otherwise.

7099. Mr. Adam.—Do you mean the majority in numbers or the majority in value?—The majority in value is what the law treats of.

7100. Do you not think it enough that if any one owner resides in any county, the others should be bound to come there too?—I should be quite satisfied with that.

7101. Mr. Paterson.—Would there be any practical hardship in citing owners by leaving a copy with the shipmaster on board the vessel?—There would not be any hardship in that; and I may say that in the Merchant Shipping Act there is a provision to that effect, which only applies, however, to cases brought under it.

7102. Is not the shipmaster very often a contracting party on behalf of the owners?—He is.

7103. And yet at present you find that contracts he has undertaken for the owners cannot be enforced without going to the owners in different counties?—Yes.

7104. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Have you not generally what is called a ship's husband who contracts for everything?—There is a ship's husband also. Sometimes he takes charge, and sometimes the shipmaster does so. The ship's husband is generally the managing owner.

7105. Mr. Gordon.—Is it not generally the case that, where the vessel belongs to a particular port, you have the ship's husband at that port?—Yes.

7106. For foreign vessels there are no ships' husbands?—No; but with regard to foreign vessels we have now got this advantage, that it has been decided by the Supreme Court that the master may be sued as representing the foreign owner, and that has relieved us from a great difficulty which we used to experience. We were always a little uncertain as to whether we could sue the master as representing the owner, but now that has been decided.

7107. Mr. Paterson.—Is not the ship's husband virtually a factor doing the ship's business on shore?—Yes.

7108. He does not frequent the ship or belong to the ship?—No, not in the sense of the section to which I have referred. With regard to other questions, as to extending the jurisdiction of the Sheriff, my impression is, that in questions regarding heritable title, that jurisdiction might be extended up to cases of the value of £1000. I would not say that the Sheriff's jurisdiction should be extended to questions of all amounts. I think when the change is to be made, it should be made by degrees, to see how things will work under the altered system.

7109. Mr. Baxter.—Is that your reason for limiting it?—It is. Then I think also that all declarators of marriage or legitimacy, and actions of divorce, should still be reserved to the Supreme Court.

7110. What is your reason for that?—Because they are of so great importance.

7111. Don't you think it a very important thing for a poor man, who cannot pay the expenses of an action in the Court of Session, to get a cheaper remedy?—Yes; and I think that some provision might be suggested to meet the cases of poor persons. The provision I would suggest would be this, that if the judge, in any of these cases, found or was satisfied that either of the litigants, from his or her poverty, was unable to bear the expenses of a case, he should have power to call upon the counsel and procurators for the poor to conduct the case for the poor litigant, even although the litigant was not suing in forma pauperis. I think, also, that with regard to the evidence to be taken in these cases where either the pursuer or defender is poor, the court should have it in their power to remit to the judge ordinary of the bounds to take the evidence, because I believe that the great hardship to poor persons, with regard to such cases, lies chiefly in getting their witnesses forward.

7112. Do you think there is any peculiar difficulty in the questions that arise in divorce?—I think there is.

7113. What is that peculiar difficulty?—It is a very important thing to annul a marriage, and therefore I think that such a matter as that should be one for the court which is supposed to possess, and which I believe does possess, the greatest knowledge of the laws of the country.

7114. Do you know that at present, in consequence of the expense of divorce being so great, the remedy is not sought by poor people, but that they take the remedy into their own hands, which is productive of considerable immorality?—I may say that I never knew a case of that kind in all my experience.

7115. Mr. Adam.—Would you extend the jurisdiction of the Sheriff to cases under the Conjugal Rights Act?—I think, with regard to applications by married women for the protection of their estates in cases where they have been deserted by their husbands, the Sheriff should have power to grant the protection, because those who most need the protection are generally those in humble circumstances.

7116. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think the Sheriff should also have power to make provision for her in case of desertion?—Yes.

7117. The Chairman.—Though you would not give the remedy of divorce in the Sheriff Court, would you object to giving the minor remedy of divorce a mensa et thoro?—I would be inclined to keep the divorce cases in the Court of Session altogether. I may mention, with regard to the question of protection, that the expense as I have found it amounts to about £30 or £40. I had a case recently where the sum was £200, and the expense of obtaining the protection was between £20 and £30. That included the expense of witnesses.

7118. Mr. Baxter.—Was that for the protection of a wife's earnings?—It was for the protection of a small sum she had succeeded to.

7119. Have you had any experience as to the expense of divorce in the Court of Session?—I have not. I have had only one case in my experience, and it was abandoned.

7120. Do you know that among the first things done in such an action there is a decree against the husband to pay his wife's expenses?—I know that a decree may go out against a husband, but I am not aware that it is the first thing. Another matter which I wished to mention is this: we often find that in contracts of copartnery and other such deeds, there has been an agreement between the contracting parties that in case of any dispute, where the referees have not been named, the Sheriff or some other court should name the referees; and I think it would be useful that the Sheriff in such cases should have that power. I believe, under the present state of the law, the Sheriff has not power to name arbitrators or an oversman where the parties have not named them themselves; and I think it would be very useful and beneficial in practice if the Sheriff or the Court of Session had that power vested in them.

7121. The Chairman.—Do you mean that where parties have agreed to refer, there should be a power in the Sheriff to make that an actual reference, by himself naming the arbiters?—Yes, where either party refuses.

7122. Mr. Baxter.—Do you mean that should be so in such cases as those of leases?—Yes; leases, contracts of copartnery, and such like.

7123. The Chairman.—Would the decision of such arbiters named by the Sheriff be final, as if the parties had submitted their case to them themselves?—Yes.

7124. Mr. Paterson.—Do you see no difficulty in deputing to the Sheriff power to select arbiters without the parties having selected them for themselves?—No. I think the Sheriff's selection would generally be one that would be satisfactory.

7125. And you would only give him that power where there was a foundation for it in the contract?—Yes; only in that case.

7126. Mr. Baxter.—That is, where parties had agreed to settle certain matters by arbitration?—Yes; where parties, before the dispute arose, had agreed to settle it by arbitration, but had not named the referees. I think the party who so binds himself should not be allowed to get out of that agreement by the effect of our present law. Then I wish to make another suggestion. Just now, the Act 1 and 2 Vict. cap. 114, allows a poinding creditor, or any other creditor, to purchase poinded goods; and, of course, just now there is no limitation as to the extent to which goods may be poinded, showing that the Legislature have given the selling creditor power to buy the goods himself—it may be £100, or thousands of pounds worth.

7127. The Chairman.—That is at a public sale?—Yes, at a public sale. But at present the mortgagee of a vessel, or the mortgagee of land, or the creditor in the action of sale of a vessel, cannot buy the subjects sold. In an action of sale, the sale is a public one, conducted in open court, by a person authorized by special warrant of the court; and yet, in that case, the creditor is not allowed to purchase the vessel; and it often happens that the vessel is sacrificed, and goes for a much less price than the creditor himself would have been disposed to give. Then, again, under mortgages of ships, the mortgagee cannot buy although the sale is public in most cases. I think in such cases it should be in the power of the court to grant warrant to authorize the sale in a public manner, and to allow the creditor or the mortgagee to buy at that public sale. I think the warrant of sale could be so fenced as to prevent any suspicion that the vessel or the subject was sold at a less price than could have been otherwise obtained for it.

7128. Do you say the same as to land?—I think the same provision might be extended to land.

7129. May there not be some room for this distinction between poinded effects and such subjects as you mention, such as a ship or land, that in the case of poinded effects the creditor generally wants his money, and does not covet the subject; but in the other case he may be coveting the subject, and may be harsh and unkind to the owners in order to drive them to a sale?—That might be said; but I think that any suspicion that the creditor would act unfairly, or could act unfairly, could be removed by proper precautions, by the sale being put under the management or the conduct of a neutral person. I think in many cases the creditor, in order to have the transaction wound up in a satisfactory way, would be willing to sacrifice the cost of such a sale in order to have the privilege and the power of competing with ordinary buyers.

7130. Do you think that by enlarging the sphere of competition, it would probably result in bringing a higher price?—I think it would.

7131. Mr. Paterson.—Would you empower that neutral person, who should manage the sale, to fix the place of sale and also the upset price?—Yes, I would; either the person who is conducting the sale or the court.

7132. You would never think of combining the creditor's permission to purchase in such an action with a power to fix the time, the place, and the upset price?—No; I would take the place, and time, and advertising entirely out of the control of the person interested.

7133. Mr. Baxter.—That is to say, you would take the articles of roup out of his control?—Yes; the conditions of sale generally.

7134. The Chairman.—Have you any further suggestions to offer?—Another suggestion I have to make is: according to the law, as I understand it to be at present, where goods have been bought, and the purchaser refuses to implement the contract, the seller must raise his action before he can obtain warrant to resell the goods that have been refused. I know from my own experience that that has been found to be a hardship, in this way: it may be that the subject sold is one of great value, it may be sugar, or cotton, or anything else—say a commodity of the value of £10,000. Well, the seller may not be disposed all at once to make up his mind to go to law against the repudiator, but he would wish to have the goods turned into money, because he may not be in a position to spare £10,000 locked up for any time; yet, just now, he would require at once to bring his action, and then incidentally in that action apply to the court for leave to sell the goods. Now I think the course should be altered in this way, that the seller should be allowed to apply to the court for a warrant to sell the goods, and then that would enable him to get his money back to a certain extent, and put him in the position of being obliged to sue only for the loss on the transaction. I know that in many cases where goods were repudiated in that way, the seller, rather than run the risk of having his money locked up for a time through the litigation that may ensue, and the opposition that his application for sale may meet with, has just chosen to pocket his loss and let the repudiator away. Now, I think, that if the seller were permitted to apply to the Sheriff or to the Court of Session for warrant to sell the goods publicly, and thereafter to sue for the loss, that would do justice to the parties and put things on a better footing.

7135. Would you not require some evidence of the transaction, before you allowed the party to get such a warrant?—I think not. If I say that I sold to A. B. £10,000 worth of sugar or cotton, and that A. B. refuses to implement that contract, and that I intend to raise an action for payment of the loss, but wish in the meantime to sell the goods, and if notice is given to A. B. to attend and hear the application, then I think that the seller is entitled to obtain his warrant. If the buyer intimates his readiness to take the goods, and admits the bargain, of course the application would be refused; but if he still maintains that he has not made a bargain, then he is out of court.

7136. Mr. Adam.—Would you think it necessary to take means for preserving evidence as to the state of the goods before they were sold?—I think, supposing the dispute was as to conformity to order, the pursuer, for his own safety in future proceedings, would do what has been suggested; he would have a survey of the goods, and a report obtained and kept as to their state at that time, so that it might be produced in evidence when the question came to be settled.

7137. But would the defender not require a similar power to keep evidence as to the state of the goods?—Of course the defender, on getting notice of the application for sale, would also have the power to get such an inspection made.

7138. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Would you have the goods to be sold then by public auction, or by private treaty?—By public auction.

7139. Mr. Paterson.—Is it not the case in practice just now, that a party interested in repudiating goods takes means to have the goods seen by witnesses, and to ascertain their condition without any judicial proceedings?—Yes.

7140. Then, as I understand it, the object of these applications to the Sheriff to sell repudiated cargoes would accomplish two objects—the one is that the goods are realized and turned into money, and on comparing the proceeds of the sale with the invoice cost, the probable loss is ascertained?—Exactly.

7141. With regard to the first of these—to sell the goods, in order to turn them into money,—is it not the practice that you in Renfrewshire, as in other sheriffdoms, can present an application to the Sheriff for a warrant to sell?—No.

7142. Is it not so, supposing the goods to be perishable, or about to be subjected to great charges?—If the goods are of a perishable nature, the Sheriff has power to grant such an application; but that leaves open the question for an obstinate litigant to dispute that averment, and to say the goods were not perishable, and do what he can to keep up litigation. My proposition is just to prevent a defender being allowed to stop the sale when he repudiates.

7143. But supposing repudiation to have taken place of a cargo of sugar, and that these sugars are put into store, and they incur storage rent, and insurances, and other charges, and supposing you to apply to the Sheriff at Greenock for a warrant to sell, does he not in these circumstances give you a warrant before inquiring into the facts? Do you require to aver that the goods are perishable?—We would require to aver that, and that, as I have said, would leave the question open. Besides, the Sheriff might think that the cost of storage, and the cost of insurance on the sugar was of such a small amount as compared with its value, that he might be inclined to say, I will not give you a warrant just now.

7144. Do you know any defect in the Sheriff's jurisdiction to entertain an application of that kind?—No; I know of no defect where the subject is perishable. When the subject is perishable, he has the power to grant the application; but, as I have stated, the question is open to dispute—what is perishable, and what is not.

7145. Suppose the averment of perishable to be out of the case, and that you have a cargo which the purchaser won't take, and which the seller won't resume, do you know any defect in the Sheriff's jurisdiction in these circumstances to entertain an application to sell before an action is brought?—Yes; it has been decided in the case of Jackson, 20th June 1848, that the Sheriff could not grant such an application.

7146. Mr. Baxter.—Would you enlarge the Sheriff's jurisdiction in the case of suspension of charges on bills?—There might be no harm in enlarging it to questions of greater value; but I may say, from my own experience, I have had only one suspension under the present Act. I know most of the cases that happen in Greenock, and I don't believe there have been half a dozen altogether since the Act passed.

7147. What do you say with regard to actions of reduction of deeds and titles, and of declarator? Would you give the Sheriff the same extent of jurisdiction there that you would give him in regard to heritable rights?—With regard to reductions, I would keep all actions of reduction based on allegations of fraud, or lesion, or such like to the Court of Session.

7148. Would you keep provings of tenor there also?—Yes.

7149. Are you much in favour of jury trial?—I think it should not be allowed in the Sheriff Court in civil cases. In the Court of Session, I think it should still be preserved for cases of slander, and libel, and actions for breach of promise of marriage and seduction, and questions of insurance on either life, or fire, or marine policies.

7150. The Chairman.—That is where these arise upon questions of fraud?—Yes; but all questions of ordinary contract debt might, I think, be well tried by the judge, the evidence being taken by a shorthand writer.

7151. Mr. Baxter.—What do you say as to the appointment of factors, and curators, and tutors, and such matters as that, on small estates?—I think the jurisdiction should be extended to the Sheriffs—perhaps to estates under £500.

7152. Would you not be inclined to go beyond that?—I think not, not at the beginning.

7153. The Chairman.—Have you anything further to suggest with regard to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff?—No; I think these exhaust the points I have to mention with regard to the constitution of the Sheriff Court. My opinion as to the Sheriffs is in favour of the present system, because I think it affords, on the whole, a satisfactory mode of appeal, suitable to the class of cases that usually come before the Sheriff Courts. You may say that the Court of the Sheriff-principal is always open.

7154. Do you find the system to work well?—As far as my experience goes, I have always been satisfied with it, and have always found that in any case requiring great despatch the Sheriff was as ready to hear the parties, and to dispose of the cases, as they were to be heard.

7155. Mr. Adam.—Does that observation apply to the Sheriff-principal as well as to the Sheriff-substitute?—It is the Sheriff-principal I am referring to just now.

7156. Mr. Baxter.—Do you not experience any delay in appeals to the Sheriff?—There is no doubt there is this delay—that the cases have to abide the Sheriff's hearing; but I have never found, in my experience, that where delay was allowed, it was attended with any inconvenience. If in any case, as I said before, there was to be a loss by delay, we have simply to make an explanation to that effect, and the Sheriff is ready to do justice to us. I may give an instance of that. In an application for the delivery of the engines of a steamer under a contract, where the Sheriff-substitute granted a warrant to the petitioner to get the engines upon consigning a certain sum, the opposite party appealed. I was for the respondent, and was anxious to acquiesce in the interlocutor; and upon that being made known to the Sheriff, he fixed the hearing at once. The appeal was heard within, I think, a very short time—I suppose within a week or so, and the matter ended there.

7157. The Chairman.—Are the appeals in your court heard by the Sheriff orally, or does he consider them upon written argument; or is it sometimes the one way and sometimes the other?—It is sometimes the one way and sometimes the other. The Sheriff can generally form a very good idea from the interlocutor that has been appealed against whether the case is one requiring instant attention; and when he sees that it requires summary action and immediate attention, he orders a reclaiming petition, particularly if he can discover from the case that the party is appealing for delay.

7159. Mr. Paterson.—Does the reclaiming petition generally tend more to expedition than the oral hearing?—In certain cases it does. If the interlocutor happens to have been pronounced shortly after the Sheriff has been down at his usual sittings, a reclaiming petition does tend to expedition; and, in my own experience, hearing by petition and answers generally brings us much closer to the case than when we have to argue it orally.

7160. Is the written argument had more recourse to in Renfrewshire than oral hearings on appeal?—No. I would hardly think it was more; but our present Sheriff has more hearings by written argument than our former Sheriff had, because whenever he sees that delay will be injurious, he orders a reclaiming note.

7161. Mr. Baxter.—How often does your Sheriff come down to hear appeals?—I could not be positive as to whether he comes oftener than the statutory number of times or not, but I rather think he does.

7162. Are you satisfied with the manner in which the Sheriff-substitute takes down evidence just now?—On the whole I am satisfied that the Sheriff-substitute does take down the evidence very fairly; but I am greatly in favour of the evidence being taken by a shorthand writer, because, as the day gets on, the Sheriff, of course, gets a little more tired, and he generally inclines to cut the evidence a little short. I think, on the whole, it would be a right thing to do, both for the Sheriff and for the parties, that the evidence should be taken by a shorthand writer. In that way I believe that the evidence would be gone through much more quickly and more satisfactorily for all parties.

7163. The Chairman.—Would you have the Sheriff to dictate to the shorthand writer, in the hearing of the parties, what was to be put down?—I would prefer the shorthand writer taking it down himself. I may mention that, under the Certain Debts Act, we have had several proofs taken by shorthand writers, and in these cases the Sheriff has dictated the evidence. I have found that it is a great advantage to the litigants to have the evidence taken in that way.

7164. If the Sheriff did not dictate, but if the shorthand writer took down every question and every answer, would not that make a most voluminous record?—It would.

7165. Would it not also cause great additional expense by the fees for writing it out afterwards, and for the time?—In return for that, we would have the advantage of having the very words of the witness, while, by the other mode of the evidence being dictated, we have only a kind of diluted evidence.

7166. But additional expense would be caused in that way?—Yes, there would be additional expense.

7167. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think that instead of the Sheriff simply taking down his notes and reading them over at the end as a whole, it would not be more satisfactory if he were to dictate the answers as they were given in the hearing of the agents, so that they might know what was going on?—There is no doubt that what you suggest would be an advantage. It would be well that we should hear what was being written down as the proof went on; but of course we are taking notes all the time ourselves, and when we hear the evidence read we can generally detect if anything of importance has been omitted; and if we ask the Sheriff to read any particular part of what he has written, of course he is quite ready to do so.

7168. Have you considered the proposition that has been made of grouping the Sheriffs into two, and making the appeal court consist of two Sheriffs—two minds instead of one?—I have read of the suggestion, but it is not very definite. It is suggested that there should be a moderate number of Sheriffs. If I knew the number of Sheriffs that were proposed, I would be better able to answer the question.

7169. My question was, whether you would have an appeal court of one Sheriff, or of two?—Certainly, in matters of review, two Sheriffs would be better than one; but if the present system is to be changed, I should like to know what the change is that is to be proposed before I could say whether the one was preferable to the other. I may remark that at present in England the Lord Chancellor singly reviews the Vice-Chancellor's judgment.

7170. The two Lords Justices also review the Vice-Chancellor's judgments?—I know they have a concurrent jurisdiction with the Lord Chancellor; but I know that the Lord Chancellor, a single judge, also reviews the Vice-Chancellor's decisions.

7171. But you consider the Lord Chancellor to be the very highest legal officer?—I do.

7172. But what do you say of the Sheriffs of our counties?—I consider the Sheriffs, so far as I have had experience of them, to be very able lawyers.

7173. Would you think the appeal court would be strengthened or improved by having two minds instead of one?—There is no doubt that two minds would be better than one.

7174. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Suppose the two were to differ, how would you arrange to have the case settled?—I suppose the rule would be followed, that where the two differed, the judgment would stand.

7175. The Chairman.—It would then stand, because the court had no power to alter it?—Yes.

7176. And then it would just be as it was before?—Yes.

7177. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Would three not be better in such a case?—I think that three would be still better.

7178. Mr. Baxter.—In the case of three appeal Sheriffs, might you not have two minds to two, while in the case of two appeal Sheriffs, there would only be two to one?—I go upon this, that if we think the Sheriffs are going wrong, we have got the Supreme Court to fall back upon.

7179. Mr. Adam.—Do you think that in your district the present system gives satisfaction?—I believe that in our faculty a change is desired to the two Sheriffs.

7180. Mr. Baxter.—Have your faculty had that matter under their consideration?—They have; but I was not present at the meeting, and my own opinion is what I have stated.

7181. Mr. Adam.—Do you know what the opinion of the community is, apart from the profession?—I think the community have never considered the question.

7182. You think they know nothing about it?—I think so.

7183. Mr. Murray.—Are they finding fault with the present system?—I have never heard any fault found with the present system.

7184. Mr. Baxter.—Do you not know the judgment to which your faculty came upon this matter?—I believe it was in favour of a change, something like the views that have been expressed by the General Council of Procurators.

7185. Mr. Paterson.—In your own experience, which I believe has been pretty extensive, have you ever found a client, where he really felt aggrieved by the Sheriff's judgment, deterred from taking it to the Court of Session by the matter of expense?—Yes.

7186. Does that frequently occur?—I cannot say frequently. Where the case was of small amount, the disappointed litigant in the inferior court would hesitate before he took the matter to the Court of Session.

7187. What has been your experience in cases where the amount was considerable?—Where the amount was considerable, I think the party would not hesitate.

Robert Neill. I may say, with reference to my own experience, that since I began to be a practitioner, I have had only one advocation. That occurred recently, where both Sheriffs decided against me. I was instructed to advocate the case, and the advocation was raised; but I was afterwards told to withdraw it.

7188. Mr. Baxter.—I believe you consider you have a very excellent Sheriff?—Both of them are good Sheriffs; but there is no doubt that the expense of the Court of Session is feared.

7189. The Chairman.—Especially by a person who has already incurred the expense of the Sheriff Court?—Yes. I have one or two remarks to offer on the forms of process in civil cases. With regard to the summons, I think that, as it at present stands, it is as short as it can very well be. I think the inducicæ should be made shorter. At present it is six days. In orders for intimation for appearance in summary causes by our Sheriffs, the inducicæ is forty-eight hours, and we find not the smallest difficulty in having appearance entered within that time. I therefore think that the inducicæ, in ordinary cases, might very well be shortened to three days.

7190. The Chairman.—Do you think that would do in all parts of Scotland?—Perhaps it would not do far north.

7191. Would it do far west?—I don't know whether it would do in Jura.

7192. There is an exception just now with regard to Orkney and Shetland, but only with regard to Orkney and Shetland, and there has been a uniformity as to all other places. Do you think that that is a proper thing?—Perhaps in the Highland districts, where the distances are very great, the time might be extended; but in our own town, and in other large towns, I think the inducicæ might be much shorter.

7193. Would you have a dissimilarity in the rules applicable to different districts, or would another exception serve the purpose you have in view?—There is at present a dissimilarity with regard to the times at which the Sheriffs are to attend in their counties. In the Highland districts I think they require to go three times in the year; to our county they must come four times. Then with regard to the citing of parties in other counties where the Sheriff has jurisdiction over them, or where arrestments are being used in different counties, I do not see the necessity for the warrant being indorsed. I do not know any good purpose that is served by getting the warrant of the Sheriff indorsed. I think the warrant of the Sheriff of Renfrewshire could be very well executed in Lanarkshire, or Argyleshire, or Ayrshire, without requiring the Sheriff-clerk to put his marking on the back of it.

7194. Would you have the Sheriff-officers of every county empowered to give effect to the warrant of the Sheriff of any county?—Yes; because we get the indorsation as a matter of course. We simply go to the Sheriff-clerk's office, and he marks the concurrence, and we pay the fee. It simply causes delay and expense, although the expense is not great.

7195. Mr. Baxter.—Is there any use in the concurrence at all?—I do not see any necessity for it. Then with regard to the time for lodging condescendence and defences, the pursuer just now is allowed 6 days. The inducicæ is 6 days, and the Sheriff may call upon the party to state his defences within 8 days—that is 14 days altogether. Then if a condescendence and defences are ordered, the pursuer has to lodge his condescendence in 6 days, and the defender his defences in 10 days, being 16 more, or about 30 days altogether, before you get the defences in. Now I think that 4 days would be quite sufficient for each of these, unless the Sheriff-substitute should see it necessary to extend the time in any particular case. For example, supposing the defender was living in the Highlands, or the pursuer was living in England or Ireland, the agent might wish time to correspond with his client, after hearing from the defender the nature of his defence, and to get a little information from him in order to meet the case set up by the defender; but I think that matter of the extension of time should be left to the Sheriff-substitute, and I do not think he would be likely to allow the parties too much indulgence, thereby causing delay. Then with regard to the section in the Sheriff Court Act about actions falling asleep: I think that should be abolished, because it really does not expedite the case a bit. We generally manage to have them awakened before the end of the six months. I think that that provision has done no good, and it has been decided that consent of parties is cause within the Act of Parliament. I think that provision might very well be abolished, and the matter left in the hands of the court and of the procurators. If an agent is found to be at all of a dilatory disposition, and is not pushing on his cases sufficiently, his clients will very soon find that out, and will be apt to seek a more diligent agent.

7196. The Chairman.—That was an enactment for the purpose of preventing delay in cases, but you think it does not practically accomplish that object, and that it entails other evils?—I think it does so. Then with regard to the power of appealing against a Sheriff-substitute's decisions, I think the limitations of the present Acts of Parliament are sufficient. Such appeals are limited just now to appeals against interlocutors repelling or sustaining dilatory pleas, interlocutors sisting process, interlocutors allowing proof, and interlocutors with regard to the admissibility of evidence. I think that, on the whole, these are sufficient limitations, and that we are the better of having the power of appealing to the Sheriff-principal with regard to these points.

7197. It has been suggested that the appeal disposing of a preliminary defence, and the appeal allowing a proof, which is probably the next step in a case, might be taken up and argued together in one appeal, and thus you would get the preliminary defences disposed of without incurring the expense of the proof, and you would save the time of an intermediate interlocutor. What do you say to that suggestion?—I would be quite disposed to adopt that suggestion, for this reason, that so far as our own court is concerned, we almost always have any dilatory pleas reserved until the record is made up, and in the way your Lordship has suggested, the two things could be done at once.

7198. Mr. Paterson.—Supposing the preliminary plea to involve the fate of the action, would you still postpone the appeal upon that point until the appeal came up upon the allowance of proof?—Is that with regard to the question of title or competency?

7199. You may take either, or jurisdiction?—I do not think there would be much harm done if the interlocutor repelling a dilatory plea was kept over until the first interlocutor after hearing parties on the closed record.

7200. If the action is fatally bad, why should the parties be kept in pain about it longer than is necessary?—They would not be kept very long in pain.

7201. Mr. Baxter.—In doubtful cases, would you give the Sheriff-substitute power to allow an appeal?—It would be a delicate thing to ask the Sheriff-substitute to allow an appeal against his own interlocutor.

7202. Mr. Paterson.—What is the benefit of the intervening delay and the intervening cost, if the preliminary plea is such that if it be decided one way or the other, the fate of the action is involved?—In a plea of that importance I don't think the Sheriff would decide it until once he had obtained the pursuer's answer to the defender's statement of facts. He would then close the record, and would hear the parties upon the preliminary plea, and his interlocutor at that time would not only be repelling the plea, but he would likely pronounce an interlocutor either for or against proof.

7203. The Chairman.—Do you think there would be no intervening expense?—I do not think that in practice there would be any. A case might happen in which the Sheriff might say, Well, I will dispose of this plea at once, before I ask the pursuer to answer the defender's statement of facts, and before I proceed to consider the case on the closed record. But I think in most cases, if the plea was of great importance, the Sheriff would hold over the discussion of the preliminary plea until once he had got the record closed, and in that way I think there would not be much delay.

7204. Mr. Paterson.—He might in some cases get assistance where the preliminary plea happened to be mixed up with the facts of the case; but there are a variety of other preliminary pleas. Suppose a landed proprietor is the pursuer, and the defender says he has no title to the land, and he is unable to produce an infeftment, what is gained by postponing the appeal upon that judgment?—In a case of that kind, of course, there would not be any gain to the party; but I think there would not be much loss by letting the matter wait over till the interlocutor after the record was closed.

7205. Mr. Adam.—Do you think the loss in the one case would be counterbalanced by the gain in a large number of cases?—Yes, I think that, taking the thing on the whole, it would be so; and just now our invariable practice is to reserve the discussion on the preliminary pleas until the record is closed. Then I think a very good check upon appeals which are brought simply for delay would be, if the principal Sheriff were to find the unsuccessful appellant liable in the costs of the appeal. If he was to make that a rule, it would make an appellant for delay hesitate before he appealed simply for that purpose.

7206. Do you mean that in disposing of the appeal, the Sheriff should find expenses due?—Yes, in disposing of the appeal.

7207. The Chairman.—If the appeal is disposed of without written pleadings, what would be the expense?—The expense to the opposite party would be about £2 in a case above £100.

7208. Do you think that would be a check upon useless appeals?—Yes, I think it would be a check.

7210. Mr. Adam.—In practice, in disposing ultimately of the expenses of the action, does the party who has lost an appeal, but who has gained his case, have to pay the expenses of the appeal in the end?—The practice of the auditor in our court is, that if the party who has been found entitled to expenses generally has been unsuccessful on any particular point of the litigation, the expense of that is deducted.

7211. Mr. Baxter.—Who is your auditor?—The Sheriff-clerk.

7212. The Chairman.—Have you any further suggestions to make?—I have no remark to make about the review of civil causes by the Court of Session, except this, that I think the mode established by a recent Act will work well enough.

7213. Do you think it is an improvement?—It is an improvement with regard to the lessening of expense. I have had no cases under it myself, but I consider that it is an improvement on the former practice. Then with regard to review in criminal matters, I have had a good many cases of suspension to the Justiciary Court; and while I have always been satisfied with the manner in which the cases were dealt with by the court, I think the proceedings just now are rather costly.

7214. What is the cause of that?—I believe it is said that the court fees are pretty high.

7215. Where does the excessive cost lie; is it in fees that are exacted by clerks, or where is it?—I have always been led to understand that it was so.

7216. Have you never been able to understand that from accounts furnished to you?—I never see the taxed accounts. I have had accounts, but I never examined them carefully to see where the expense lay. I may say that I have been successful in a case where the expenses found due to my client amounted to about £32 of taxed costs. I had a suspension, where I was unsuccessful, and had to pay both sides, and the expenses came to £80. But the review always gave satisfaction; we were always satisfied with the painstaking way in which the matter was dealt with by the court.

7217. Mr. Adam.—Do you think that the present mode of taxing country agents' accounts in the Court of Session is not fair to them?—I think it is not fair.

7218. Mr. Baxter.—Why?—Because we get nothing.

7219. Mr. Adam.—Do you think there are expenses taxed off which should fairly be paid by the losing party?—Yes.

7220. Are these expenses incurred in preparing the case?—Yes.

7221. Mr. Paterson.—Are you prepared with any specification of the costs which ought to be allowed to the provincial agent?—I am not. I have not looked into the matter so carefully.

7222. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think it is essentially necessary for the client's interest in most cases to have a country agent, or could he do without one?—I think he could not.

7223. Mr. Adam.—Would the business be more expensively done if done only by the town agent?—I don't know that it would be; but I think the client in the country generally likes to have a person near hand him, with whom he can converse, and from whom he can get information about the case, and whom he can assist in the preparation of the case.

7224. I suppose, if the country agent did not do that, the town agent would have to do it?—Yes.

7225. He would have to go to the country for that?—Yes.

7226. And that would be more expensive?—Yes.

7227. Mr. Paterson.—Has it happened in your own experience that your attendance in Edinburgh has been suggested by the counsel in the case?—Yes.

7228. Did you get anything for that?—Nothing. With regard to the Sheriff Court expenses, I think that where the sum involved, or the value of the subject is great, the fees should be very much increased. Just now they are very small for cases of any real value.

7229. The Chairman.—Do you mean the fees of the agents?—Yes, the fees of the procurators. In a case where there was a summons for slander, a condescendence and defences, a hearing of the procurators upon the closed record, and an interlocutor pronounced disposing of the action, my account, as taxed, for all the business I did was £5. In another case, where the sum was £250, where there were summons, condescendence and defences, and hearing, and then a remit to a person of skill to decide on a question that happened to be involved—it was a question as to the sufficiency of centrifugal machines for a sugar manufactory—my expenses only came to £11.

7230. Mr. Baxter.—Was there any proof in that case?—No.

7231. But there was a remit?—Yes. The sum involved there, as I have said, was £250; but we get no higher fees, although the matter comes up to £2000, or £3000, or £4000. I think that a case of large amount always requires greater attention and greater research at our hands, and in these circumstances the fees for such cases should be larger. At all events the Sheriff-substitute, or the Sheriff who has tried the case, might have power to enlarge the fees should he think that the importance of the case entitled the agent conducting it to greater remuneration. Just now we are allowed a fee of only 20s., 30s., or 40s. for debating a case on its merits, either before the Sheriff or the Sheriff-substitute—that is, an oral debate on the concluded proof. Well, it often happens that the Sheriff-substitute's day for debates is a Friday. On that day he has his motions for orders, and then he has also his Certain Debts Court; and before he can begin the debates, we have to wait perhaps for two hours. That takes us on to about one o'clock; and after we have been heard for a short time, the Procurator-fiscal may come up and say that he has some criminal business for the Sheriff to attend to. Of course the Sheriff considers that the Crown has the precedence, and he sends us away. We are then obliged to wait over for perhaps some weeks, until the case comes up again in the debate-roll in its turn, because the Sheriff's intermediate days have been filled up by previous orders. We have to make preparations again for the debate, and to be heard again, and this is all done for one fee. I think, therefore, that, on the whole, we are entitled to greater remuneration than is allowed by the present table.

Robert Neill.

7232. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Does not the cheapness of an article generally increase its consumption?—That is not the case with law.

7233. Mr. Baxter.—Does it frequently happen that you have to wait for your case from day to day?—I cannot say from day to day; but it happens sometimes in important debates that the cases are postponed. I may say that the time of our Sheriff-substitute is very much taken up with criminal business, because, since the General Police Act was passed, which prevents the magistrates in the Police Court from trying any person for assault after two convictions, a great many of these cases have been sent up to the Sheriff by remit for trial. Of course such cases require immediate attendance, and he is obliged, not from his own will, but simply from the necessity of the case, to adjourn our hearing. Of course I do not at all complain of the Sheriff-substitute in that respect, because he is always most anxious to meet the convenience of the agents in every way, and to save time to them as much as possible.

7234. Have you anything to say with regard to the Debts Recovery Act? Have you had any experience under it?—I have not had a great deal of experience, but I have had some, and I find it works pretty well.

7235. What do you say as to the costs under it? Do they afford adequate remuneration?—No; they are very small. They are not adequate remuneration at all. I had a case where the amount given to me was 40s. in all, and I am sure I attended the court ten times with regard to the case.

7236. Do you approve of the principle of a slump sum, or would you rather be paid according to the amount of work you do?—According to the work I do.

7237. Mr. Adam.—Do you think that, in cases under that Act, if the proof were paid for separately, the other fees would be sufficient?—I think so. There should be a fee allowed for the time during which the proof lasts.

7238. You mean that, in the case of a proof, it should be paid by time?—Yes.

7239. You think the other fees would be satisfactory and sufficient?—Yes.

7240. The Chairman.—Have you any further remarks to make with reference to inferior courts?—With regard to our Police Courts and our Dean of Guild Court, I think it would be an improvement were we to have a stipendiary magistrate to preside in them. Our Police Court now has jurisdiction not only with regard to police offences, but in all nuisance cases, in all cases under the Forbes Mackenzie Act, and in all weights and measures cases. The Dean of Guild Court has been recently established, and has very important duties vested in it with regard to the making of new streets and drains, and looking after the construction of new buildings and the alteration of old buildings. The Dean of Guild Court is constituted thus: The Dean must be one of the magistrates; three of his council must be elective members of the Police Board, and the other three must be members of the Town Council. None of the council require to be tradesmen. The whole are members of the Police Board, and the court is chiefly for the purpose of carrying out the resolutions of the Police Board. In fact, the Police Board, of which these seven persons are members, are generally the prosecutors in the court, and they have first to resolve that certain things shall be done, and that certain proceedings shall be taken in the Dean of Guild Court. They come to these resolutions as members of the Police Board sitting in their council. These matters next come before them sitting as judges, and then, after judgment has been given, they, as members of the Police Board, can have it in their power to suspend the decision of the judge. I think that is a very anomalous state of matters indeed.

7241. Would you suggest that a stipendiary magistrate should take the charge of the whole of that business?—Yes; and take the Police Court too.

7242. Would the burgh of Greenock be disposed to provide a salary for that stipendiary magistrate?—I would not be disposed to answer for that, although I happen to be a member of the Board. But I think it is of great importance for the public that there should be a stipendiary magistrate, particularly as the magistrates have the power of licensing; and I think it is not a right thing that the elective magistrates should have so much power as they have now.

7243. Do you think the Sheriff could not discharge these duties?—Not in Greenock. He has so much to do otherwise.

7244. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Do you think a stipendiary magistrate would be better for granting licences than the bench of magistrates?—Yes, I think he would; because we find that the same gentlemen who sit in court granting licences, go about in election times canvassing the people who afterwards come before them.

7245. The Chairman.—That is for municipal election purposes?—Yes.

7246. Mr. Paterson.—I suppose the persons whom they canvass include the spirit dealers?—Yes, they do.

7247. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Do you think that is the opinion of the community generally, or is it only your own?—That is my own impression.

7248. What is your impression as to the opinion of the community generally?—There is great dissatisfaction just now as to the administration by the magistrates of the licensing system in Greenock.

7249. But they have never proposed to elect a stipendiary magistrate for that purpose?—No; they have never discussed that subject in the council.

7250. Mr. Shand.—What is the evil that is felt in Greenock at present under the licensing system; do you say there are too many licences, or too few, or that they are granted to wrong persons?—The belief is that licences are granted from favouritism just now.

7251. Are they granted to persons who should not hold them?—Yes.

7252. Mr. Baxter.—Do you know the number of public-houses in Greenock?—There are upwards of 200.

7253. What is the number of your population?—It is under 50,000.

7254. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Is Greenock not in an exceptional condition at present as to political feeling?—I don't think so. I may say that in 1863 the question as to the propriety or legality of the magistrates who granted the licences canvassing the publicans was brought under the notice of the Lord Advocate at the time, now Lord Mure, and he gave it as his opinion that there was no illegality in such canvassing, although he thought it was a very improper thing.

7255. Mr. Shand.—Does the present system not secure that the licences shall be granted, to some extent, according to the public opinion of the district?—Just now I believe there is a general impression that there are too many licences granted.

7256. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Have not the public a right to appear before the bench, and to petition?—They have.

7257. Do they take advantage of that power?—They do.

7258. Is no attention paid by the bench to their representations?—Of course the magistrates think they decide the cases according to what is right; but the evil is this, that these magistrates, being elected it may be through the influence of those who are applying for licences, are supposed to be under a certain amount of influence.

7259. The Chairman.—Of unconscious influence?—Yes, unconscious.

7260. Mr. Orr Ewing.—But that has reference not to political feeling, but to matters connected with the election of the magistrates and Town Council?—Yes; I mean that that influence is felt in municipal politics.

7261. Mr. Shand.—Admitting the existence of an evil of that kind to some extent, do you think that if the licensing were in the hands of a stipendiary magistrate the public feeling would exercise the same influence as it does at present?—I think it would; perhaps more so.

7262. Do you think that such a magistrate would be amenable to public feeling to the same extent as the magistrates?—I believe he would.

7263. And do you think that system would be an advantage?—Yes; I think nothing could be worse than the present system.

7264. Mr. Paterson.—Do I understand you to state, as a fact, that there is corruption existing just now?—No.

7265. It is rather that the existence of the present system induces the risk of it?—Yes; the risk and the suspicion, and that detracts from the value of the decisions which the magistrates give.

7266. Mr. Orr Ewing.—But you have stated that the administration of the Licensing Court at present is not properly conducted, and that you think the magistrates are under influence?—Yes; I think the present system involves the risk of the judges being unconsciously influenced by persons with whom they have recently come in contact on political matters.

7267. Do you think the court at present exercises its power well, and that there is only such a risk, and not a reality?—I cannot say that.

7268. As to the Dean of Guild Court, I think you got the Dean of Guild established in Greenock two or three years ago?—In 1865, by special Act of Parliament.

7269. Therefore the feeling of the community of Greenock, and of the Town Council, does not agree with your own, when the Act was got so recently?—I may say that the Police Board have already appointed a committee to consider what change ought to be made, believing that some change should be made in the constitution of that court; they are already dissatisfied with its present constitution.

7270. And they wish it modified in some degree?—They wish it altered.

7271. But they do not propose to do as you have advised—to have a stipendiary magistrate, for the purpose of discharging the duties at present discharged by that court?—The Board have not come to any decision on the point. Some would like the Chamber of Commerce to elect the Dean of Guild, and that the Dean of Guild should be a person outwith the Police Board altogether, in place of being a member of it, as he is just now; but there has been no decision come to.

7272. Mr. Murray.—Is there an assessor to the Dean of Guild?—Yes; a paid officer.

7274. By whom is he appointed?—He is appointed by the Town Council.

7275. Mr. Adam.—In Greenock is it the practice, before a person begins to build, that he should apply to the Dean of Guild for a warrant?—He must do so under the new Act.

7276. Does he require to exhibit plans?—Yes; you cannot make a door in an old building, or a new door, or a new window, without applying to the Dean of Guild.

7277. Mr. Paterson.—Who elects the Dean of Guild in Greenock?—He is elected by the Town Council, and he must be a magistrate.

7278. In the burgh or of the burgh?—Of the burgh.

7279. What is the avocation of the present Dean of Guild in Greenock?—He was a fish merchant, but he has now retired.

7280. Is he not now in business?—No.

7281. For what period is the Dean of Guild elected?—It is an annual election.

7282. Is he the sole judge in his court?—Yes.

7283. But he is assisted by six other gentlemen, three from the Police Board and three from the Town Council?—Yes; three elective members of the Police Board and three Town Councillors.

7284. Are the Police Board, or the magistrates, as representing the community, ever before the court as proprietors of property or otherwise?—They are not often before it as proprietors of property, but they are very often before the Dean of Guild Court to enforce the opening of streets, the fixing of levels, the extent of drains and sewers, and the making of streets generally.

7285. Do these matters which you have just mentioned originate in the Police Board?—Yes.

7286. And it is after they have gone through the Police Board, or through committee, that you go to the Dean of Guild Court for authority?—Yes. Robert Neill.

7287. And you meet there three of the members of the Police Board on the bench?—Yes.

7288. Did you say that after the Dean disposes of the matter, it goes back to the Police Board?—Yes; the Police Board have then to carry out the warrant, and they may find that the expense of carrying it out would be too great, and so they won't do it.

7289. Do you mean that the Police Board are the first adjudicators upon the matter; then, that it goes to the Dean of Guild as the second; and that then the Police Board review the Dean of Guild's judgment?—They review the carrying of it out.

7290. That is to say, they suspend it?—Yes.

7291. Although there may be other parties outside who have been called to the Dean of Guild process?—Yes, that may be so.

WILLIAM LAW, Esq., examined. William Law.

7292. The Chairman.—You are Dean of Guild of Edinburgh?—Yes.

7293. How long have you been so?—I have been so for about two and a half years.

7294. By whom is the Dean of Guild elected?—By a corporation called the Guildry.

7295. What is the duration or continuance of the office?—It is by annual election. I have been sent three times to the chair.

7296. You are a member of the Town Council?—Yes.

7297. Are you necessarily so?—Yes, necessarily. The Dean of Guild is always a constituent member of the Council.

7298. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Are you an ex officio member of the Council?—Yes.

7299. The Chairman.—Of whom does the Guildry Corporation consist?—Almost all the mercantile people in Edinburgh are members of it. No one can be admitted into the Merchant Company without being a Guild Brother, as it is called, and it is the same with all the trades. Persons must be all Guild Brethren who belong to the trades.

7300. It is the aggregate body of the Guildry who elect the Dean of Guild?—Yes.

7301. And he is the head of that aggregate body?—Yes, for the time being.

7302. Mr. Harrison.—Must the members of the Guildry be persons carrying on business in Edinburgh when they are elected?—Yes; they are not eligible without that.

7303. Mr. Baxter.—But they have no exclusive privileges? Any man can begin business without becoming a member of the Guildry?—Yes, that is not contested now.

7304. The Chairman.—The exclusive privileges of corporations are very much removed by an Act that was passed some twenty years ago?—Yes.

7305. What are your functions as Dean of Guild?—They are very multifarious. In the case of every alteration of property, of any kind, an application must be made to the Guildry Court to have that alteration sanctioned.

7306. Of whom does the Guild Court consist besides the Dean of Guild?—Of three other gentlemen, who are builders or architects, and who are called trades members, and three merchants, who are called merchant members; the court consists of seven members altogether.

7307. Do these six members sit along with the Dean?—Yes.

7308. And is it necessary that there should always be a certain number of them present?—Yes, there must always be three or four.

7309. Do they vote upon any question?—There is necessarily never a vote in the Guild Court.

William Law.

7310. How do you mean there is necessarily never a vote?—The applications being for the alteration of property, we are supplied with plans and descriptions of what is wished to be done. These are pronounced upon by the trades members and the merchant members; the trades members taking the builder's view, and the merchant members view the matter as shopkeepers, and there is not anything like a vote. Everything is talked over, and we come to a unanimous conclusion, either to permit the alterations or to refuse them.

7311. Or to permit them with modification?—Yes.

7312. But you always contrive to have a unanimous judgment?—We have done so ever since I have had anything to do with it.

7313. The three builders apply their professional skill to the matter, looking at the plans, and the merchants apply their skill to the question whether the alterations are suitable for the purpose for which they are proposed, and in that way you are so fortunate as to come to a unanimous judgment?—Yes.

7315. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Supposing your council were to differ in opinion, would you be obliged to give effect to the decision of the majority, even although it was contrary to your own opinion?—I cannot conceive such a case.

7316. Then you look upon yourself as supreme?—Decidedly.

7317. The Chairman.—Do you mean that you cannot conceive the case of your differing from these six gentlemen, or that you cannot conceive the case of these six gentlemen differing from you?—That is the way of it.

7318. Mr. Orr Ewing.—In other words, you are supreme, and you could give your decision although you differed from the whole six?—No, I would not do that.

7319. But what is the power under the constitution of the court?—I never saw the case tried, and I could not imagine it.

7320. But from the constitution of the Guildry, is the Dean of Guild not the head of the court, and could he not decide even though the other six members of council were opposed to him?—Yes, he could in a case of last resort.

7321. Mr. Paterson.—Is it not he alone who signs the judgments of the court?—Yes.

7322. He is the sole judge?—Yes.

7323. The Chairman.—The others are mere assessors or assistants to him to enable him to arrive at a right conclusion?—Yes.

7324. Mr. Adam.—Have you a legal assessor?—We have two. We have Mr. George Young and Mr. John M'Laren.

7325. Mr. Shand.—Then you have a member of the bar to assist you when you desire his services?—We have two, to decide all questions as to rights of property.

7326. When legal questions arise, are these in use to be discussed before the assessors, or discussed by written pleadings which are laid before the assessors?—The assessor peruses the papers, which must be prepared for him, and he considers the whole case, and decides what is the rights of the parties as to the property.

7327. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Does he sit in court with you?—He does.

7328. Does he do so daily?—No; only when he is asked in some extraordinary case.

7329. The Chairman.—Have you a clerk of court?—Yes.

7330. Is he a legal gentleman?—I don't think it. His name is Mr. Morham. He has been for thirty years connected with the court.

7331. But you don't take his opinion on points of law?—No; we dare not do that on rights of property.

7332. Mr. Murray.—By whom are the assessors appointed?—By the Town Council. They are the city assessors. They act for the Town Council also; but they act for the Dean of Guild Court as well when it is necessary.

7333. In all cases where you think it necessary to take the opinion of the assessors, do you take it?—Yes.

7334. Do you always decide according to their opinion?—Yes.

7335. Have you never differed from that opinion?—Never. But there is an appeal from the Dean of Guild Court. If the parties are not satisfied with the assessors' opinion, they can take an appeal.

7336. But without going beyond the Dean of Guild Court, is it the fact that the assessors' opinion is invariably acted upon?—It has been so since I knew the court.

7337. Mr. Orr Ewing.—But supposing you were to differ from your assessors, is not the Dean of Guild supreme, and could he not give a different judgment?—It would be a risk to do that.

7338. Have you the power to do so?—I believe I have. There was a case lately with regard to Charlotte Square, where a man applied for leave to put a great building on the top of his house, and I refused it. We consulted the assessors on the subject, and they said they did not think we had very much to go upon. Lord Neaves was of that opinion; but I took the risk of refusing the warrant. I would not have a hand in spoiling Charlotte Square, if I could help it; and I said, if the Court of Session choose to give liberty to spoil Charlotte Square, let the Court of Session take the odium.

7339. Mr. Harrison.—Have you had frequent occasion to consult the assessors during the time you have been Dean of Guild?—I should say three times a year, or so.

7340. Mr. Murray.—Do you mean that there are only three cases in the year with regard to which you go to the assessor?—I would give that as about the average. Mr. M'Laren has been consulted oftener than that; but we do not trouble Mr. Young more than we can help, because he has so much to do. I may say that Mr. M'Laren pays great attention to anything that is submitted to him, and we have great confidence in him.

7341. The Chairman.—Is there any appeal to the Court of Session from the Dean of Guild Court?——There is.

7342. You have told us that all alterations of property come before you by an application from the party?—Yes.

7343. Do you exercise any jurisdiction with regard to tenements that are dangerous?—Yes.

7344. How are these brought before you?—The Procurator-fiscal of the city has inspectors constantly going about the town, and if they see any house, or if a complaint is sent to the office with regard to any tenement that is in a dangerous or ruinous condition, I visit it at once with the trades members of the Guild Court; and if we see that the house is decidedly dangerous, we order the people out there and then, and the house to be taken down. Several cases of that kind have occurred. The last was one in the Cowgate, down near Hope & M'Lean's brewery, where a piece of a wall fell in. A three-storey house stood upon the top of it, and a piece of the under storey fell right inside. We went down to look at it, and I could have kicked all the rest of it down with my foot. The storeys which were above were made of wood and plaster, and they were set upon an old garden dyke at the back of the house where there had once been a green. We ordered the people out instantly, and they were all out within six hours.

7345. Is there any officer in Edinburgh of the nature of an inspector, whose duty it is to see whether there are any dangerous buildings in the town?—Yes; we have the burgh engineer, Mr. Macpherson.

7346. Does he make inspections in different parts of the town of himself, without being ordered to a particular place by you?—He has inspectors going about constantly, and they report to him anything that they see wrong.

7347. How often does your court sit?—Every Thursday morning.

7348. Have you always something to do when you sit?—Yes, we have always something. There are certain times in the year when there is a great deal more to do than at others. From Whitsunday, on through the summer, there is always a great deal more to do than during the winter.

7349. That is, at times when building operations can be conveniently carried on?—Yes.

7350. Mr. Harrison.—What are the territorial limits of your jurisdiction in Edinburgh?—The ancient and extended royalties positively; but we do not confine ourselves to them, and our authority is recognised anywhere.

7351. Do you derive your authority from statute, or from use and wont?—Chiefly from use and wont.

7352. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Are many of your decisions appealed from?—There have been none that I know of, unless that Charlotte Square case; and I am not sure whether it is appealed yet or not.

7353. Your court must therefore be presumed to give satisfaction to the community?—I think it must.

7354. And to the proprietors of property?—Yes. There was a case in Princes Street, at the Caledonian Hotel, where there was a dispute between Burnett and Mrs. Gregory, and steps were taken to appeal that case; but before it came into the Court of Session they compromised it.

7355. Mr. Shand.—Was there not also a case about the Balmoral Hotel?—It must have been before my day.

7356. Mr. Paterson.—Is there a large proportion of the cases brought before your court that are contested?—Yes, with conterminous proprietors.

7357. Is that so in the majority of cases?—I should say it is.

7359. Are there not a great number of cases brought into court which are not contested?—A great many.

7360. But these are the minority in number?—Yes, they are the minority, certainly.

7361. The Chairman.—When parties come before you, do they not sometimes bring with them the consent of the conterminous proprietors?—Yes, very frequently. They get the conterminous proprietors to sign their plans, and that is enough.

7362. Mr. Harrison.—Have you power to impose fines, etc., if alterations are commenced without application to the court?—Yes.

7363. Have you frequently had occasion to impose these fines?—I have done so to the extent of perhaps £5 or £6 a year, but that is all.

7364. What is the limit to which you can fine?—I can go the length of £10, but I never exceed £1.

7365. Mr. Paterson.—Has your court statutory jurisdiction?—I think it is statutory; for in every local Act that has been passed during the last twenty years, the authority and jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild and of his court have always been maintained along with the Sheriff Court. There has not been the slightest attempt to modify it in any way.

7366. It is recognised as one of the judicatures of the city?—Yes.

7367. Has its jurisdiction been extended by any recent statute?—I don't think it—at least by none that I am acquainted with. In the last Provisional Order there is a clause protecting the Sheriff Court and the Dean of Guild Court; in the Roads and Streets Act of 1862 there is a similar clause; and in all recent statutes that I have seen, its jurisdiction and rights have always been maintained.

7368. The Chairman.—Are they not maintained also in the Act extending the Royalty?—Yes.

7369. Are there agents who practise before you?—Yes, a good many.

7370. Do you do anything in the matter of the costs of cases before you?—No.

7371. There is never any question as to costs being given to one party or another?—Sometimes, when a case is litigated, one party thinks he is not entitled to pay a certain amount of the costs. That is a legal question, and we always get our assessor to consider it, and then we give our decision how the costs should be allocated, whether divided by two or three, or in any other way, according to the circumstances.

7372. Mr. Harrison.—Have you a published scale of fees,—that is, fees to the clerk or any other party?—I am not aware. The clerk can answer that question. I do not interfere with the fees of the clerk in any way.

7373. The Chairman.—The clerk is entitled to certain fees?—Yes, these are necessary.

7374. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Is there not a table of fees in connection with the court?—There is a use and wont with respect to the fees; there is a constant practice. When certain documents are written, there is so much to be paid; and if they are lengthened out, of course the parties have to pay so much more.

7375. Do you think it would be any improvement to remove the duties from the Dean of Guild Court, and to entrust them to a stipendiary magistrate or to the Sheriff?—They might be removed anywhere. They might be given to the burgh engineer, or to the city architect; but a power equivalent to that of the Dean of Guild Court ought to be maintained.

7376. Do you think it is an expeditious way of arriving at a conclusion with respect to buildings?—I think it is.

7377. Is it also a cheap and economical way?—It is cheap to the public.

7378. Mr. Shand.—Have you any suggestion to make of any change on the constitution of the Dean of Guild Court?—Yes; I would like very much to get more power for it.

7379. In what particular direction would you wish to have its power extended?—In looking along the streets I see a great many things put out and put up that I would not wish to see; and if I had the power, I would pull a lot of them down.

7380. The Chairman.—Will you explain a little more precisely what it is that you refer to?—As the age goes on, people seem to get more fantastic with their buildings, and I think there are many things perpetrated in the New Town of Edinburgh that ought not to be allowed.

7381. Do you mean as to their taste?—Yes, as to taste. Now we are merely a court, not of taste, but of safety. If a thing can be done with safety, that is all we can look at.

7382. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Are you not also a sanitary court?—No, not very much.

7383. Have you not the power of regulating the drainage?—No, we have nothing to do under the surface.

7384. Can people build a house without showing you that there is sufficient sewerage through it?—That is fixed by the Provisional Order, and they must satisfy the Town Council, not the Dean of Guild Court, with regard to it.

7385. Then you have not the regulation of water-closets and the sewerage?—No; we have nothing to do with anything of the kind.

7386. Have you the power of restricting the height of buildings in the streets?—That is also regulated by the Provisional Order.

7387. Would you like these powers transferred to the Dean of Guild Court?—No; the powers I refer to particularly are such powers as would enable us to prevent things being put out and put up on houses that disfigure our streets.

William Law.

7388. The Chairman.—Do you not consider you are entitled to refuse a warrant for such alterations or erections?—There are many cases in which we cannot refuse a warrant if the operations can be done with safety.

7389. You refused in the case of Charlotte Square?—Yes; but that was an extraordinary case.

7390. Mr. Shand.—Have you any change to suggest upon the arrangements of the court?—I am not aware that I could do anything to improve them.

7391. The Chairman.—I suppose you are aware that in the case of Charlotte Square there was a great discussion many years ago as to the alteration in the style of one of the houses there, and that there was an elaborate interlocutor and note of the first Lord Meadowbank on the subject?—I have not seen that case.

7392. Mr. Murray.—Is there not a class of cases that come before your court involving legal points which would better go at once to the Sheriff?—I don't think such cases are very frequent.

7393. In that case of Princes Street, to which you referred, are you aware that it involved a question as to the construction of a title?—It appeared to me very much to be a great deal of money and time thrown away about a trifle, for the space of ground about which the contention arose was a very small one. If they had been good-natured people, they would either have cut it in two, or the one would have thrown it up altogether.

7394. Did it not involve a very nice question as to the construction of a title?—I don't think there was much nicety about it. One party admitted that the ground belonged to the other, but he objected to him building against his house.

7395. Mr. Orr Ewing.—It is in the power of parties to appeal to the Court of Session if they fancy that your decision is erroneous?—Yes; in that case the parties took steps to do so, but they did not get the length of the Court of Session.

7396. Do you find you have often the power of effecting a compromise between conterminous proprietors in a cheap and expeditious way, and to the satisfaction of both parties?—Very often. We visit the ground with the trades members, and meet the parties and their legal advisers on the ground; and when we see that they are contending about a mere trifle, we advise them to do so and so, and they generally agree to do it.

7397. Do you find that often taking place?—In almost every case.

7398. Has that the effect of saving an expensive litigation on a very trifling matter?—Yes; and it also saves ill feeling between neighbours.

7399. Mr. Paterson.—According to what method would you exercise your functions as a court of taste?—We would get one of the tip-top architects in the Dean of Guild Court, and show him the plans, and make him dictate what was the sort of thing to be done.

7400. Would you do that independently of the opinion of the conterminous proprietors, who might be quite pleased with the alterations which were proposed?—No; I would take their opinion also.

7401. Suppose they were of opinion that the style was unexceptionable, and that the court differed, who would prevail?—We would make a compromise somehow.

7402. But you would like the power of fixing the style of any building that you considered objectionable?—I would be quite content with having a veto upon anything that I considered absurd.

7403. Would that veto be ruled by an architect of great experience in his profession?—Yes.

7404. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Do you mean that you should have power to interfere only where the conterminous proprietors objected to the style of building that was proposed, or that you should have power to do so independently of the conterminous proprietors, but allowing them to give their opinion?—Both things must be taken into account as elements in the question.

7406. Did the Dean of Guild Court authorize that?—It was done before my day. I have always looked upon it with pain.

7407. But do you know whether it was authorized by the Dean of Guild?—I presume it was.

7408. Do you know whether the conterminous proprietors objected to it?—I don't know.

7409. In a case of that kind, would you contemplate a power being given to the Dean of Guild to exercise his own judgment in taking off the slates and substituting something more ornamental?—If such a plan had come before me, I would have suggested that it was very ugly, and asked the party to adopt some other; and I have no doubt that, with a little persuasion, he would have done it. It makes no difference to the inside of the house whether the outside is ugly or not.

7410. Would you have made it more ornamental in point of taste, supposing the adjoining proprietors had not objected to it?—I would have liked to make it correspond in some degree with the adjoining buildings.

7411. What do you say as to the power of making it to your own mind as a court?—I say in that case, as in the case of Charlotte Square, I would not be a party to allowing such a thing as that; if you are determined to do it, do it at your own risk.

7412. Had you not opposition in the Charlotte Square case?—It was not sufficient opposition to be successful. The proprietors met and considered the matter, and they did not think it worth while to contest it in the Court of Session.

7413. Was it not a contested case in the Court of Session?—It was only contested between the Guild Court and the proprietors; there was no contest on the part of the conterminous proprietors.

7414. Mr. Harrison.—As I understand, you would like more power to prevent alterations which, in your opinion, injure the amenity of the city or of adjoining properties?—That is the whole.

7415. At present your powers are very much confined to preventing alterations which may be dangerous?—We are merely a court of safety, not of taste; and you know that the finest buildings in Europe can easily be spoiled with perfect safety.

7416. The Chairman.—Would your suggestion not imply that the Dean of Guild Court should always have at their head a Dean of Guild competent to dispose of such matters?—I do not admit that.

7418. Mr. Murray.—Can you specify any other recent case, besides that of Queen Street, where you have objected to alterations in the town of Edinburgh?—There was an application made for leave to put an additional storey on the top of the Edinburgh Hotel. We objected to that, but suggested that the parties should apply to the Town Council, for the Edinburgh Hotel is already beyond the height prescribed by the Provisional Order, and to have an additional storey put upon it would make it still further beyond that height. I suggested that they should apply to the Town Council to see whether they would sanction the additional storey, and they did so, but it has not yet been put on.

7419. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Does the Town Council override the Dean of Guild Court in Edinburgh?—In such cases as that it does, because they are under the Provisional Order, and such matters are always under the management of the Town Council. The Dean of Guild Court has very little to do with the height of buildings.

7420. Mr. Paterson.—What is your practice with regard to the photographic galleries that are seen all over the town?—I don't like them at all.

7421. Do they not go through the Dean of Guild Court?—I have never given permission for any of them, and I hate to see them. There is one in George Street, above Anderson the fishmonger, that is really frightful; and there is another erection at Free St. Andrew's Church, in George Street, which is equally objectionable. William Law.

FRIDAY, 22D JANUARY 1869.

Members Present:—

LORD COLONSAY.
THE LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.
LORD BARCAPLE.
GEORGE SCLATER BOOTH, Esq.
GEORGE HARRISON, Esq.
JAMES ADAM, Esq.
A. B. SHAND, Esq.
T. G. MURRAY, Esq.
CHARLES MORTON, Esq.
J. B. BAXTER, Esq.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD COLONSAY IN THE CHAIR.

JAMES JAMESON, Esq., examined. James Jameson.

7422. The Chairman.—You are a practitioner in the Sheriff Court of Elgin?—I am.

7423. How long have you been so?—For thirteen years.

7424. Do you hold any official appointment?—I am clerk to the Police Commissioners of the burgh of Elgin; I am clerk to the County Prison Board of Elgin; and I act as Justice of Peace clerk in the Justice of Peace Court of Elgin, my partner holding the appointment.

7425. The county of Elgin and the county of Nairn form one Sheriffdom?—Yes.

7426. With a Sheriff-substitute in each?—Yes.

7427. One Sheriff-substitute being in the town of Elgin, and another being in the town of Nairn?—Yes.

7428. You practise at Elgin?—I practise exclusively at Elgin.

7429. The Sheriff-principal holds a court in each place?—He does.

7430. Are there many civil causes before the court at Elgin?—There is a large number of civil causes before the court at Elgin.

7431. Are there many of them appealed to the Sheriff?—As a rule, I may say that every judgment is appealed to the Sheriff.

7432. In civil cases there is a power of appeal at four or five stages?—There is a power of appeal of an interlocutor disposing of a dilatory defence, of an interlocutor sisting process, of an interlocutor allowing a proof, and of an interlocutor disposing in whole or in part of the merits of the cause. I don't mean that there is an appeal taken at every one of these stages. I mean that, as a rule, there is an appeal taken to the Sheriff on every judgment disposing of the merits. At the other stages we sometimes appeal, and sometimes we do not.

7433. There is an appeal from the Sheriff to the Court of Session?—In cases above £25.

7434. Are there many of those cases that are carried to the Court of Session?—Comparatively few.

7435. Is the manner in which the business is dealt with by the local judges satisfactory?—If that refers to appeals, I say yes; if it refers to other business, I have another answer.

7436. What is the other business you allude to?—The great business of the county consists of small debt jurisdiction, criminal jurisdiction, consistorial jurisdiction, and bankruptcy jurisdiction, by which I mean sequestrations and cessios.

7437. In regard to those branches, what do you say?—I say that, as a rule, the Sheriff-principal does not interfere in the conduct of that business. It is all done by the resident Sheriff-substitute.

7438. And is that satisfactory?—Very satisfactory, so far as my experience has gone.

7439. Then the manner in which the business is conducted in that Sheriffdom, in all its departments, is satisfactory?—Very satisfactory, in my opinion.

7440. Have you any suggestion to offer as to the constitution of the court, as consisting of the Sheriff and his substitute?—I have.

7441. What are your suggestions?—My suggestion is, that in so far as the double Sheriffship is concerned, there should be no double Sheriffship.

7442. What do you think ought to be the course of procedure?—With your Lordship's permission, I shall put in a minute of our Society of Solicitors, and make an explanation in regard to a matter which was represented to this Commission by the Vice-President of the General Council of Procurators of Scotland. The Society of Solicitors of Elginshire are members of the general body of procurators, and they have a representative at the General Council of Procurators. The General Council of Procurators, as we are informed by a circular from the secretary of their body addressed to the secretary of our body, read before this Commission a statement upon 28th of December last, and, so far as I understand, it was represented that that statement gave the views of the whole body of procurators in Scotland. Now I beg to say that that does not represent our views, and that, so far as the statement is concerned, it does not represent the views of the whole body of procurators in Scotland.

7443. Mr. Baxter.—You are under a misapprehension. The representation made to the Commission was, that it represented the opinion of the General Council?—I merely state what my understanding was. Of course what was said will speak for itself. I produce an excerpt from a meeting of the Society of the Solicitors of Elgin, holden on the 9th January 1869, at which the statement of Mr. M'Neel Caird was read. 'Mr. Cameron moved that the meeting approve generally of the statement read to the Law Commission by Mr. M'Neel Caird, with some important exceptions, viz.: 1. That the proposed appeal court is highly objectionable; that the office of Sheriff-depute should be abolished; and that the appeal should be made by reclaiming petition and answers submitted to the resident Sheriff in the first instance, from whom, after reconsidering his own judgment, there should be an appeal to the Lord Ordinary in the same way as there is to the Sheriff-depute at present. 2. That there should be no restriction in the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Courts, the litigants being the best judges of the courts they wish to resort to. 3. That the small juries proposed for the Sheriff Courts would be objectionable and mischievous.'

7444. The Chairman.—Was that the unanimous resolution of your body?—The secretary's letter to me, sending me the minute, says that Mr. Cameron's motion was unanimously agreed to, and adds, 'I may mention that Mr. Cooper, Mr. Murdoch, and myself were in favour of an appeal within the Sheriff Court—in fact, to retain the office of the double Sheriffs; but we did not divide the meeting.'

7445. How numerous was the meeting?—I cannot say, as I was not present at it. I was in Edinburgh at the time.

7446. Mr. Adam.—How many members are there in your Society?—I cannot say; but between 25 and 30.

7447. The Chairman.—You say the suggestion as to an appeal made by Mr. M'Neel Caird was objectionable to you?—Yes.

7448. What did you understand to be that suggestion?—Mr. M'Neel Caird, as I understand, made this proposition: 'The preponderant opinion in our body is in favour of appeal courts of two Sheriffs. Our General Council, after much discussion, came unanimously to the conclusion that such a court would be a great improvement on the present system.'

7449. Mr. Baxter.—That is the opinion of the General Council?—Well, we dissent from that; and I dissent personally from it very much.

7450. Instead of that, would you have a direct appeal to the Court of Session?—No; I shall explain our views a little more fully than is done in the minute. The Sheriff-principal, I may say, is really only an appeal judge at present; and instead of having the Sheriff-principal an appeal judge, we would propose that, in cases under £25, there should be an appeal by reclaiming petition and answers prepared by the local practitioners, and sent from the local Sheriff-clerk's office to the Lords Ordinary in Edinburgh, the Lords Ordinary to consider the reclaiming petition and the answers, and to dispose of the case by a written interlocutor, which shall be sent down to the Sheriff-clerk's office in the county, and there promulgated. That is in cases below £25; and in these cases, of course, under the present law,—and I don't suppose it is presumed that there will be any power to appeal further in these cases,—that would end the litigation; the judgment of the Lord Ordinary promulgated in the Sheriff Court, and coming in place of the Sheriff as an appeal judge.

7451. The Chairman.—Would you allow an answer to that petition?—Yes; I would allow an answer to be given in by the opposite agent in the Sheriff Court within a certain time.

7452. Would you allow counsel to be heard by the Lord Ordinary?—I would not on any account, unless the parties asked it. If they asked it, they are the best judges of their own interests, and they are entitled to have it. In cases above £25 I would have the same procedure, with this addition, that after the decision by the Lord Ordinary, the parties, or either of them, might appeal the case, as they can do at present, to the Inner House to have a judgment.

7453. Mr. Adam.—Would you allow counsel to be heard before the Lord Ordinary in cases above £25?—No, certainly not, unless the parties wish it. I would exclude counsel by statute from being heard unless the parties wish it; but if parties wish it, there is no reason why counsel should not be heard.

7454. Mr. Baxter.—Is not your proposal just a direct appeal from the Sheriff to the Court of Session?—I don't see that. We still hold that it is a local Sheriff Court process. We would prevent the Lord Ordinary from doing anything more than advising the case here, and the judgment would be promulgated in the Sheriff Court in the same way as it is promulgated at present when it comes back from the Sheriff residing in Edinburgh.

7455. The Chairman.—In regard to other classes of cases—consistorial cases, bankruptcy cases, and so forth—have you any suggestion to offer?—With reference to the office of Sheriff, I was going to call the attention of the Commissioners to some previous reports of Law Commissions, in which the desirability of the Sheriff being a resident judge was put forward. For instance, in the report of the Commission in 1818, the Commissioners said: 'For these, among other reasons, although we consider it to be clearly incumbent on every Sheriff-depute to give personal attendance within his Sheriffdom during some adequate period of every year, and that the functions of the office cannot be properly discharged if he does not from time to time, and as occasion may require, visit the seat of his jurisdiction and reside within its bounds, it appears to us (chiefly from the difficulty of establishing a general rule which would be attended with utility) that any positive enactment respecting the period of residence is a matter of very doubtful expediency.' That body reported in these terms in 1818. But, notwithstanding that report, the law requiring the Sheriff to reside four months within his jurisdiction, which was enacted at the original institution of the office in 1745 or 1746, still stood. In 1837, the next Commission on the Sheriff Courts say in their report, as to the constitution of Sheriff Courts, that the 'chief question which has come under our consideration has been, whether the office of Sheriff should be held by an advocate resident either constantly or during the usual term of the court within his county; or whether it should be filled, as it has been for many years past, by an advocate continuing his practice before the Supreme Court.' And they reported in favour of the latter alternative, and the reasons for their so reporting are given in these terms: They say that a Sheriff resident and continuing his practice in the Supreme Court, combines with the local resident judge 'a ready and unexpensive application of the higher judicial talents and knowledge of men of eminence in the law, removed from local influence, and familiar with the administration of justice in the Supreme Court.' They also say, 'When it is further taken into view that the principal judge is a practising barrister in the Supreme Court; that he may be and often is at the head of his profession, and may justly look forward to the highest judicial stations; that these advantages are communicated to his substitute, the resident judge, by the constant intercourse that subsists between them, and by the sense of responsibility and the other well-known consequences of their mutual relation to each other,—we cannot doubt that the satisfaction which is actually produced by the operation of this system is as well founded as we believe it to be general.' Now under that report the old law of 1745 or 1746, rendering it necessary for a Sheriff to reside four months in his county, was changed, and it was enacted by the second section of the Act of 1839, 'That every Sheriff-depute shall attend personally within his Sheriffdom upon all necessary and proper occasions, and shall, unless prevented by indisposition or other necessary cause of absence arising from his official duties,' hold a certain specified number of courts in each year. The law stood on that footing until the Act of 1853, when all personal attendance appears to have been dispensed with, and it was only necessary that the Sheriff should come down and hold so many sittings in the year. The section is in these terms—section 46: 'Every Sheriff shall, unless prevented by indisposition or other unavoidable cause, hold annually in his county sittings for the discharge of the judicial business of the county,' in terms of the provisions there laid down. So that the present law as it stands is an innovation, and is inconsistent with the old law requiring the Sheriff to reside and to do work personally in the county; and it was an innovation which, I believe, the Legislature did not intend, because it was not brought under their notice in the report of the old Commission. From the returns made to Parliament I have prepared abstracts showing the amount of business actually performed by the Sheriffs and the Sheriffs-substitute in each county for the different kinds of business throughout the year.

7456. Mr. Baxter.—For what year?—The returns are for 1861, 1862, and 1863, and they were ordered by the House of Commons on an address from Sir William Dunbar. There are no summations in these returns, and they don't show what amount of business was done—I mean they don't show the totals.

7457. The Chairman.—We have an abstract prepared by a committee of Sheriff-substitutes?—I am not sure that the abstract of the Sheriff-substitutes is right.

7458. Mr. Baxter.—Have you taken considerable pains upon your abstract?—I have: it cost me a fortnight's labour.

7459. Mr. Adam.—You say you do not think the abstracts of the Sheriff-substitutes right?—No; I cannot get it to agree with mine; but, possibly, it is mine that is wrong. Another consideration which, I think, calls for the abolition of the double Sheriffship is that, generally speaking, I don't think the Court of Session produces men able to give judges to the Sheriffs and the Court of Session itself. I think there is a scarcity of men at the Scotch bar; with all deference to the learned body, I think there is not a sufficient supply of raw material to give the necessary number of judges having the proper qualifications.

7460. Supposing you could not have that appeal which you propose to the Lord Ordinary, would you prefer the present system to that of two appeal judges, such as has been suggested?—Yes. I don't see how the two judges would work; and, besides, why not make two new Lords Ordinary instead of two intermediate judges? It would be just going back to the old system, which was so much condemned, of having Admiralty Courts and little intermediate courts, which have been all abolished, and the whole jurisdiction merged in the Court of Session.

7461. Then you would prefer the present system to that of an ambulatory court, with two judges to do the work?—I think that ambulatory court a foolish idea, with all deference to the gentlemen who started it.

7462. Is that the opinion of your body?—I may state that, personally, I am rather in advance of our body in these things. They don't go so far as I go, and as many others of my profession go; but they are clearly of opinion, as you will see from the minute I have read, against the two ambulatory judges going about the country hearing appeals: they would not have the status of judges of the Court of Session, and they would not have the status which the Sheriff has, being the judge of a particular county. I don't think the public would look up to them or reverence them; and I don't think the practitioners would care anything about them. I think we would rather go to the Court of Session.

7463. Mr. Baxter.—Do you not think an appeal to them would be much cheaper than an appeal to the Court of Session?—No; I don't think it would.

7464. Why?—Because I don't see how you can appeal to two Sheriffs with written pleadings. I can conceive one man considering a written paper; but I cannot see how two could do so without a multiplication of copies of the pleadings.

7465. Would you not have oral pleadings?—A great deal is said about that in the Sheriff Court Act of 1853; and no doubt there are exceptional men at the bar of the Sheriff Court who are good pleaders. It is well known that in Glasgow there are some of the procurators who have set themselves out to plead cases in the Sheriff Court; but the great body of the Sheriff Court practitioners are not educated as speakers, and not expected to be pleaders, though many of them are so.

7466. You are not in favour of oral pleadings?—I am not, for many reasons. For instance, in an oral pleading there is great danger that it might be prepared in a slovenly manner. But laying that out of view, take the case of a well-prepared and well-got-up debate at an oral hearing before two gentlemen, coming round as proposed: you are asked a question; they may be clever judges, and they may anticipate you in your arguments; they may do what Lord Bacon said was a thing that should not be done—they may put posing questions to a person, attempting to put him out in his argument; and the best men get confused in these circumstances, things go out of their heads, and a man cannot state his argument so well as in a well-considered written pleading, which will stand reading and re-reading. That is my reason for disapproving of oral debates. I think an argument is best stated when it is stated in writing.

7467. The Chairman.—Do you think as many cases as are now appealed to the Sheriff would be appealed to the Lord Ordinary on your system?—Yes; I am decidedly of that opinion. As long as a Scotchman has a chance at law, he won't give it up.

7468. Right or wrong?—Right or wrong.

7469. How many appeals does the Sheriff of Elgin dispose of?—I cannot say; but I am right in saying that there is not a case decided on the merits by the Sheriff-substitute, which does not as a rule go under review to the Sheriff-principal, and I may state that we have great satisfaction in the appeals.

7470. In cases of appeals against judgment on preliminary defences, or disposing of questions of admissibility of evidence or the like, would you have the appeal equally to the Lord Ordinary?—Yes.

7471. And that by a reclaiming petition?—Yes.

7472. And answers?—And answers.

7473. Sent up to the Lord Ordinary to be by him considered?—Yes; I would not change the system. I think it is a good system, and I think the advice of the Lord Ordinary, or any superior judge, at a preliminary stage of a case is of great service to the parties, because a case is looked at in different views by different minds.

7474. Would you apply that system to Glasgow and to Edinburgh, where there are resident Sheriffs?—I don't see why there should be any exception made of Glasgow or Edinburgh; but if there are good grounds for an exception, of course the exception should be allowed.

7475. Have you considered whether the Lords Ordinary would be able to overtake all the appeals from the various sheriffdoms in Scotland in that way?—I have not considered that question; but I think there is an easy answer to it. If there are more Lords Ordinary required, it is easier getting two or three additional Lords Ordinary than eight or ten Sheriffs.

7476. When the Lord Ordinary has announced a judgment, or if he thinks that further argument is necessary, how would you have him obtain that further argument?—Under our present Act of Sederunt of 1839, it is quite competent for the Sheriffs in any case, where they consider further argument necessary, to order minutes of debate.

7477. Do you propose that the Lord Ordinary should have that power?—Certainly.

7478. And that the future argument ought to be in minutes of debate?—Yes.

7479. Would you allow these minutes of debate to be prepared by counsel?—I would leave that in the option of the parties. If they thought counsel preparing the minutes of debate would be a better course than the Sheriff Court procurators doing it, and are able to pay, I would allow it to be done.

7480. Either party might take counsel as he chose, whether the other party had counsel or not?—Yes; I would leave the parties to manage their own cases, and give them the greatest liberty. They are the best judges of what is best for their own interests.

7481. When the case came to the Inner House, it would come as a case now comes from the Lord Ordinary to the Inner House?—Just so.

7482. And counsel would be heard upon it?—Yes.

7483. Suppose the Inner House, when the case comes to them, desire to have oral argument?—By that time, however, it is a Court of Session process.

7484. And that argument would be by counsel?—Of course it is a Court of Session process, and it must then be managed under their rules.

7486. Then the Lord Ordinary, in fact, would be a Sheriff?—He would be something better, I hope, than a Sheriff.

7487. He would be a judge in the Sheriff Court?—He would be a judge in the Supreme Court administrating justice in the Sheriff Court.

7488. You have some precedent for that kind of thing in the circuit appeals?—Yes; which I am sorry to say there are not so many of, as there should be.

7489. The judge on circuit can hear cases of appeal to him there from the Sheriff Court, and pronounce a judgment, which receives effect in the Sheriff Court?—Yes.

7490. Mr. Shand.—Do you propose that the right of appeal to the Lord Ordinary should remain at each of the stages at which appeal is now competent?—Yes, I think so.

7491. So that you might have, in the course of a case, five or six different appeals to the Lord Ordinary in the Court of Session, with written argument?—Yes; my own experience is, that if I don't think I have a good dilatory defence, and it is disposed of against me, I don't go further with it. Then in regard to an interlocutor sisting process, I don't remember any appeal as to that in my practice, and I have a very large Sheriff Court practice. As to an interlocutor allowing proof, that is the turning-point where we take an appeal if we have a question of relevancy to discuss. We sometimes take an appeal there; but the tendency of Sheriff Court litigation is to have the proof in all cases. Whether right or wrong, let the proof be led, and the whole light that can be got thrown in.

7492. The Chairman.—You think the tendency is to let the facts be ascertained first?—Yes; but don't assume relevancy till we see the facts.

7493. Mr. Adam.—You said that in your court there was an appeal to the Sheriff-principal in almost every case on final judgment?—Yes.

7494. To what do you attribute that frequency of appeals?—In my own experience I have seen that when I considered I had got a good and sound judgment of the Sheriff-substitute against me, it did not convince my client, and I have seen the Sheriff take the view that my client took of it. When we get instructions from our client, it is understood that we shall do all we can for him; and if there was an appeal to a third Sheriff in the Sheriff Court, we would take it as long as our instructions were not recalled, and we would be answerable in damages if we did not do so, as I have found to my cost.

7495. The Chairman.—You say that a Scotchman will not give in as long as he has a chance?—Yes, that is my feeling.

7496. Are there many judgments of the Sheriff brought to the Court of Session?—No, because the agent in the Sheriff Court has then no great interest in the case.

7497. But if the party resolves not to give in as long as he has a chance?—He is generally amenable to the advice of his agents. An agent has no interest in advising an advocation to the Court of Session now.

7498. If the suggestion that you propose were adopted—having reclaiming petition and answers—the agents would have an interest?—They might or they might not. The agent would just have the same interest that he has at present in appealing to the Sheriff; but I sink the question of interest altogether. If it is not for the benefit of the country and the public it should not be carried out.

7499. Mr. Adam.—Perhaps the cheapness of the appeal to the Sheriff-principal leads to appeals?—I don't think it is so cheap as people think. I have got £8 for drawing a reclaiming petition, and I consider that a reclaiming petition should never be done under £5.

7500. Mr. Shand.—Do you mean at each stage of a case?—No, I mean on the merits, when the whole case comes up. A short note of a page or two is all that is necessary at preliminary appeals.

7501. You say there have been very few advocations from your court?—Very few. It is a seven days' wonder when an advocation takes place.

7502. Then I suppose the judgments are very satisfactory as matters at present stand?—Yes. The last advocation from the Sheriff Court was in a case of mine, in which both the Sheriff-substitute's judgment and that of the Sheriff was reversed.

7503. The Chairman.—I think the county of Banff is within the same sheriffdom?—Yes, the same Sheriff administers justice in the county of Banff also.

7505. Mr. Adam.—There is an appeal in cases between £12 and £25 to the Circuit Court?—It is a question whether there is or not. I think that is taken away by our last Sheriff Court Act, and there has been no Sheriff Court procurator bold enough to try it.

7506. The Chairman.—Have you any suggestion to make as to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff?—With reference to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Court in civil matters, I don't see any reason why the Sheriff should not have as extensive a jurisdiction as the Court of Session. The Sheriff had the jurisdiction apparently before the institution of the Court of Session, as is stated by Erskine, and it was only after the Court of Session was established that the cases were appropriated to the Court of Session from their importance or their intricacy; but the old jurisdiction evidently was that the Sheriff was the competent judge in any cause of any amount, and of any kind, and I don't see why this should not be given back. As far as I am aware, the Sheriff Court has had no literature, and there has been no systematic examination of the Sheriff Court records; and my impression and opinion is, that if these records were examined, it would be found that the Sheriffs exercised their ancient jurisdiction down to a much later date than is generally supposed. I have here an excerpt which I have got made from the Sheriff Court books of Elgin: 'The Sheriff Court of the sheriffdom of Elgin and Nairn, holden within the Tolbooth of Elgin, the third day of November 1654, Mr. John Hay, Sheriff-depute.' It was an action of divorce at the instance of a man against his wife on the ground that she was 'ane creature called a hermaphrodite, and unfit for the marriage bed.' The Sheriff held the court, and tried the cause in the same form apparently as such a cause would now take, and he pronounced decreet; and I am inclined to believe that if examination was made of the Sheriff Court records, it would be found that the Sheriffs of Scotland had exercised a higher jurisdiction down to a later period than is generally supposed. I don't see why the Sheriff should not have power also to appoint factors loco tutoris and other administrators, and should have equal jurisdiction under the Trusts Act and the Conjugal Rights Act. I have known cases of great hardship where parties had to go to the Court of Session with reference to small heritable property, worth £100 or £200. The matter was done as cheaply as it could be done under the existing state of the law; but it was done at the expense of double agency, because we had to employ an Edinburgh agent. That is a hardship which the public suffer under.

7507. You would have actions of declarator of marriage in the Sheriff Court?—Yes; I don't see why they should not. Very often there are poor people in the predicament of not knowing whether they are married or not, or wishing to be divorced. There is a denial of justice to these persons at present by their being compelled to go to the Court of Session, because it is impossible for them to go there. Within the last two months a labouring man called upon me in Elgin. His wife ran away from him two or three years ago with a travelling tinker. He wished to be divorced from her. I asked him if he had money. He said he might raise £4 or £5; but I told him that unless he could raise £20 he could not get a divorce, as it would take that sum to prove the facts before the Lord Ordinary. Now that is a case where a man suffers from his poverty, and that should not exist in this country.

7508. Would he not have to collect his witnesses at Elgin, if an action of divorce was competent in the Sheriff Court?—The witnesses are all at Elgin; but even if they were in the most remote parts of Elginshire, they would come to Elgin in a day, and they would come from good-neighbourhood.

7509. How would you regulate the jurisdiction, supposing the wife was out of the sheriffdom?—Of course these are questions of jurisdiction which require to be regulated. These questions arise between the English and Scotch courts; but each case must depend upon itself. I would give the facility to as many as possible; and if there are exceptional cases of hardship, they must just suffer the hardship. We cannot provide for everybody any more than the Court of Session can.

7510. But do you propose any extension of territorial jurisdiction, or of reach of the arm of the Sheriff, in reference to such cases?—No, I don't think so.

7511. The man must go where the recreant wife is to be found?—Yes; and she is very possibly in the next Sheriffdom of Nairn. The man could have found the woman there, in the case to which I have referred, living with the tinker.

7512. Have you anything to say in reference to criminal matters?—I don't see why the Sheriff's jurisdiction should not be extended to all criminal matters, excepting pleas of the Crown.

7513. Mr. Baxter.—Do you except robbery?—I would say the pleas of the Crown, in order to get a well-known criterion.

7514. The Chairman.—Have you anything to say in regard to procedure?—In regard to the writs, pleading, and procedure, including the investigation of facts in civil matters, my opinions are shortly these: We have at present, as it were, three Acts of Parliament under which the great amount of business in the Sheriff Court is done. We have the Small Debt, the Act of 1853, and a special and peculiar Act, called the Certain Debts Recovery Act. All these have different forms of procedure. The writs by which the cases are commenced in court are different in each case, and the procedure following on these writs is different. I think these could all be simplified. I think there should only be one court in the Sheriff Court, as in the Court of Session; and that all claims for debt, or any demand, should come into the Sheriff Court by one form of writ. Let it be as short and as simple as possible; and after it comes in the court,—if it is under £12, which is the extent of our small debt jurisdiction,—let the case be called and determined, in terms of the Small Debt Act. If it is above £12, or any other sum that may be thought should be the extent of the small debt jurisdiction—though I think £12 a very nice and proper limit—let it be disposed of by record and answer, much the same as in the ordinary court now.

7515. Would you make a note of the reply?—I think it is placing the judge in an invidious position, to ask him to take down the pleadings of the parties.

7516. Would you have condescendence and answers?—Yes; just a statement and answer after the case is called, and the defence is stated in court orally. The Sheriff gets a notion of the defence from its being stated orally, and he orders condescendence and answer; and let the case be disposed of in the same way as is done at present. But there should be simplicity of that kind introduced. There is no reason for having three different writs to bring a money claim into court.

7517. Do you speak of money claims entirely?—Money claims or demands.

7518. Lord Barcaple.—Would you have all these classes of cases to come into the same roll?—Yes; in the same way as a case in the Court of Session, of £25 or £500, is in the same roll.

7519. But would you have the small debt cases under £12 to abide the course of the roll?—That is a peculiarity in the small debt jurisdiction which is not to be found in any other civil jurisdiction in Scotland, that the diets are peremptory in small debt cases. They are not peremptory in other cases. If the parties appear on the day of the court, there is just the same order of procedure as at present.

7520. But the case that is before a small debt case might be long, and involve a good deal of time and consideration. Would you have the small debt case to wait till that longer one is disposed of?—There is no necessity for that. Suppose my plan were adopted, the Sheriff-clerk would be applied to for a summons to-day, and in Elgin the court day would be Wednesday week; and I shall suppose there are 20 summonses issued for that day, and 10 of these are for sums under £12. The parties appear, and a proof is led, and the cases are disposed of. Ten of the cases are above £12, and the Sheriff makes an order for condescendence and answers, and the cases go to enrolment. These cases would then go on a separate court day.

7521. They would then go to some other roll?—They would go to a long roll.

7522. The Chairman.—Would you call the small debt cases first?—Yes.

7523. Or on a different day?—No; I would have them all the same day.

7524. Lord Barcaple.—Your answer, I think, was that you would call the small debt cases along with the other cases in the order in which they were issued?—Yes.

7525. And you think that would not lead to delay, because, in the other cases, there would be merely some order for record or further procedure, and not a disposal of the case?—Unless the parties wish to take the judgment of the Sheriff without written pleading at all; and I would give them that option. The advantage of that would be that litigants would be able to get an easy and inexpensive decree in absence, if that was all that was necessary; and if they both chose to accept the sitting Sheriff's judgment as final, they have only to say so, and he might dispose of a case of £500 himself in the Small Debt Court by a prorogated jurisdiction. There is a sort of power of that kind in the present Sheriff Court Act, but it is not very often exercised. But that would enable decrees in absence for any amount to be obtained at absolutely no expense.

7526. The Chairman.—Would you have finality in any class of cases on the Sheriff's judgment, or should they be all open to appeal?—In regard to that I stated my views before. I would not interfere with the present sums, appealable and not appealable. I would have the present regulations on that point, unless the parties chose to state to the Sheriff that they would accept his judgment, and then his judgment would be more of the nature of a reference.

7527. Mr. Shand.—The present system of having all the small debt cases together works very well?—Very well.

7528. Don't you think it would be desirable to keep up that?—Yes; as to these matters of detail I have no very obstinate or decided opinion. I am quite prepared to accept anything, if a man proposes a better thing, or even a less thing, if it is an improvement. With reference to the procedure in civil cases, I wish to bring under the notice of the Commission the fees payable to the Sheriff-clerk, particularly in small debt cases. These fees are, of course, payable to the Crown; they are not payments to the Sheriff-clerk himself.

7529. The Chairman.—He is paid by salary?—Yes, I only know one Sheriff-clerk in the north of Scotland who is paid by fees, and that is the Sheriff-clerk of Nairnshire, which is a very small county. But, generally speaking, the Sheriff-clerk has no interest in the fees. When the Small Debt Act was introduced, the great object in providing the fees payable was to recompense the Sheriff-clerk for his trouble, and to make up for the loss of business he would have in consequence of the introduction of the Small Debt Court; but there is no reason for that now. The fees go into the Treasury; and the sum which goes into the Treasury is nothing to speak of to the revenue of the country. It is of the nature of a tax on justice, and should be abolished. The ordinary payment in a small debt case at present is 2s. 1d. before you get out the summons. The average value of small debt cases over all Scotland amounts to about £3, 10s., from a calculation I have made. After the summons is taken out and returned, there is another 1s. payable to the Sheriff-clerk before you can get decreet. That is 3s. 1d. paid to the Sheriff-clerk, which is about 5 per cent. on an average on the amount sued for. A great number of the people who take out small debt summonses are of the poorest classes in the country, and they cannot afford to pay 5 per cent. to the Sheriff-clerk, for they have to pay officers' fees and other things. It is therefore a tax which should be taken off in my opinion. It is a hardship to the public; and as a source of revenue, it is of little moment. I have nothing more to say in regard to civil matters.

7530. Mr. Booth.—Why do you say that the fees paid to the Sheriff-clerk is of the nature of a tax on justice? Do not the fees paid to the superior courts stand in the same position?—They are liable to the same objection. There should be no fees at all. I think they are wrong in principle. I don't suppose that the revenue derived from all the fees in the various courts of law amounts to £15,000 or £16,000 a year. But in the Sheriff Court it is a mere bagatelle. I suppose the small debt fees collected in the Sheriff Court at Elgin are about £150 a year; but I speak without book or authority.

7531. Mr. Shand.—Have you any idea how much is paid as fees in small debt cases in Glasgow alone?—I cannot say. I know it is a large sum. In 1863, 68,000 small debt cases were decided in Scotland, and 2s. 1d. on each comes to a large sum.

7532. The Chairman.—The Sheriff-clerks are now paid by Government,—by salaries?—Yes.

7533. And the fees are paid into Exchequer?—Yes.

7534. As some compensation or remuneration to the Government for paying the salaries which they have undertaken to pay?—Possibly it may be put in that way.

7536. The Chairman.—You have already spoken to the matter of review in civil causes?—Yes; but I was going to say something as to the investigation of facts in criminal cases. I think there are serious objections to the present system, and that it should be revised and re-adjusted. In criminal matters, as at present conducted in Scotland, we are told the Sheriff is the superior official taking charge of the King's peace, and all criminal matters are under his control and jurisdiction. He is, therefore, the person who sets in force an accusation against anybody accused of a crime, in the shape of getting him taken before him for examination. He is examined, we shall say, before the Sheriff-substitute, and afterwards a precognition is taken, and that precognition is conducted in private. During the time it is being conducted the accused person has no power to employ an agent or to call witnesses, and he is not allowed any intercourse with the world; he is locked up for further examination till after the precognition is taken; the Sheriff, on the consideration of it, grants his warrant for commitment in order to trial, or he may not grant warrant, and then, of course, the man is liberated. But suppose he does grant the warrant in order to try him, the man is committed to prison. He can now be bailed. That involves an application to the Sheriff—the same judge who committed him; an application for bail is presented in writing, and the Sheriff finds whether the crime is bailable or not. If it is a bailable crime, he fixes the amount of the bail; if it is not a bailable crime, he refuses the petition, and the man has his redress otherwise. But suppose it is bailable, the bail is fixed, and the prisoner finds caution or signs a bail bond to the satisfaction of the clerk of the court, and gets liberation from jail. After he is liberated, we shall suppose that the cause of committal was well-founded, and that he is afterwards tried before the same Sheriff. He may be tried summarily or by a jury; and the same Sheriff who committed him is now asked to review the same evidence which he had before him when he committed him, and he is asked to pronounce the sentence of the law against him. Now I think it is a great objection that criminals, when they are first apprehended, have no power to have the privilege of employing an agent and of producing witnesses. I therefore say that the system of declaration, as it at present exists in Scotland, and as it has existed since there was a criminal system in Scotland, should now be altered; I think the system of private precognition should be altered, and that all criminal accusations should take place before a magistrate sitting in open court, hearing the evidence, with the witnesses cross-examined, and the prisoner having power to call witnesses in support of his defence, if that is thought proper. Under the present system I believe there is great injustice done. I have prepared a return from the prison of Elgin; and I only take it because I am familiar with it, and not because the people of Elgin or the county are greater sinners than other counties in Scotland, but I believe it is a fair example;—I have a return made by the jailer to me of the number of persons committed to the prison of Elgin under warrants of the Sheriff, and who were bailed, between 1st January 1868 and 1st January 1869, and there were 21 persons committed to the prison of Elgin by the Sheriff in order to trial, and who afterwards presented petitions and were bailed. Of these 21, 1 was found not guilty by the verdict of a jury; in 4 cases no further procedure was ordered; 1 was dismissed from the bar; 10 were fined in sums varying from 5s. to £2,—and of these I find several had been in jail for three, four, and in one case six days before being bailed. Now the mere fact that a man punished with a fine of 5s., or of an alternative of 3 days' imprisonment, or a fine of 10s., with an alternative of 6 days' imprisonment, or even a fine of 30s. or £2, with an alternative of 30 or 40 days' imprisonment—the mere fact that that man had previously suffered 4, 5, or 6 days' imprisonment before he could get out on bail, is, I think, a great hardship which should no longer be allowed to take place, because, after the law adjudicated on him, it declared that he was only liable in a pecuniary penalty, but still the law was the means of inflicting the term of imprisonment on him. Then bail is not procured without expense. The expense of preparing and procuring an order for bail in the Sheriff Court cannot be reckoned at less than from 30s. to £2. That is an additional hardship on a party wrongfully accused; and if he is acquitted by the verdict of a jury, he must be held to be wrongly accused. I have another return of parties imprisoned in Elgin prison, and liberated by order of Crown counsel, or acquitted, for the same year; and I find that there were 11 persons committed to the prison of Elgin. 9 of these cases were liberated by order of Crown counsel or by the Procurator-fiscal. In one of these cases the party was 72 days in jail before trial; she was tried before the Circuit Court of Justiciary at Inverness and was acquitted. In another case the party was 115 days in prison before being tried by the Circuit Court, and I don't know what became of him. Now I say these are cases of great hardship; and if the law were altered to the effect of allowing the accused to bring forward witnesses, they would have established their innocence, and need never have been committed to prison at all. Then I find that the country population is not, in this respect, treated in the same manner as the population in burghs and towns; for if a person, say in Edinburgh, commits a slight assault or breach of the peace, he is taken before the magistrates the next morning, and is sentenced to whatever the law thinks sufficient for the offence; but in the country, and places where there is no police administration, the party lies under this disadvantage, that if a Fiscal or Sheriff take it into their heads, they will not serve the man with a criminal libel calling on him to appear to be tried, but they will present a petition for his apprehension in order to his examination, and to his declaration being taken. That is done in many cases; and supposing it is done, the prisoner, a countryman, for a police assault that afterwards only infers a penalty of 10s. or 10 days' imprisonment, is hauled in this way before the Sheriff, and his declaration is taken, and all the equipage of the law is put in force against him as if he were the greatest criminal or the greatest murderer. I think that, in cases not inferring a jury trial, there should be no such thing as declaration or previous examination at all. The country population should be put on the same footing as the population of burghs and towns; and the magistrates of counties should exercise their criminal jurisdiction in the same way by presenting a petition for citation, citing the party, and let him appear to be tried without any preliminary investigation, which at present is destructive of the comfort of the people.

7537. Do you mean tried by the Justices of the Peace?—By the Sheriff. I am speaking of the Sheriff Court.

7538. You think the country population should be brought to the Sheriff?—They are at present brought to the Sheriff, generally speaking, though not always; but they are liable to be apprehended, and a declaration taken from them, and to be committed for trial. But a person committing the same crime in a burgh or town would be hauled up before the magistrates the next day, or the same day, and would be sentenced at once, without the trouble, expense, annoyance, and degradation of being imprisoned before being tried; and there are many cases which don't infer imprisonment, though they may infer punishment by a pecuniary fine. I have prepared a return of the number of persons tried by the magistrates in Elgin and Forres, and committed for the year from 1st January 1868 to 1st January 1869; and I find that while the Sheriff of Elgin committed only 41 persons to the prison of Elgin, the magistrates of Elgin committed 50 persons, and the magistrates of Forres one person. The Justices of the Peace of the county of Elgin exercised jurisdiction in 75 cases, and there was not one of these persons imprisoned a day before he was sentenced; and there was not one of the 58 persons committed by the magistrates of Elgin, committed a day to jail before being sentenced. They were only committed after the law had declared their punishment. So that I think there is great room for improvement upon the administration of the criminal law in those matters which I have spoken of. In regard to the investigation of facts after a person is served with a libel, there is no reason why the Sheriff should not be the judge who tries them; but I would have no judge who examines a prisoner trying a prisoner, with a jury or otherwise. The judge may have gone wrong. He may have committed the prisoner on erroneous evidence; he may have the impression of that evidence weighing on his mind at the trial, and he cannot help being biassed against the prisoner if he has given a warrant of commitment against him, for it was his opinion that he was worthy of being committed.

7539. Mr. Baxter.—Do you say that in police cases which are brought from the country, it is the general practice to imprison the party, and not bring him up summarily before the court for trial?—In all cases—you may call them police cases—inferring not more than 60 days' imprisonment, or a fine of £10, it is not the general practice to do so, but the Sheriff has the power to do so, and very often does it. I don't say it is the general practice. I have produced a return from the prison of Elgin of persons who had been tried in that way, and who had suffered a previous imprisonment; and the Sheriff has the power of doing it.

7540. But is it the practice?—I speak of the county of Elgin; and I say it is the practice to examine people sometimes on declaration for police offences.

7541. Is it the general practice?—Do you mean the general practice in Scotland?

4542. No; I know the general practice—I mean the general practice in Elgin, that a party brought in by a constable for a police offence is put in prison before his trial?—I believe they are as often examined on declaration, and put in prison before trial, as they are tried at once.

7543. Lord Barcaple.—Do you know whether in those cases there is a report made by the Procurator-fiscal to the Crown Office before the trial is ordered?—I know this, that in cases where the Fiscal or the Sheriff thinks that a precognition should be taken, a precognition is taken; and in all these cases, generally speaking, the person is examined on declaration, and his declaration is sent up along with the precognition.

7544. My question was, whether in those cases of offences which ultimately are tried summarily, but where the party has been in prison, and a declaration has been taken, there has been a report to the Crown Office before a trial takes place?—No; not generally. It is only if the Fiscal thinks it necessary that he reports.

7545. You mean, that generally in those cases where the party has been in prison, and a declaration taken, the Fiscal does not report?—I know fiscal practice as well as other practice, and I know that if the Fiscal thinks the prisoner should be tried by a jury, or at the Circuit, he reports the case to the Crown Office. But if he thinks it a case that should be tried summarily, he tries it summarily by the Sheriff without reporting it.

7546. And in those cases which he so tries summarily upon his own judgment, does he generally take a declaration and have the party committed in the meantime to prison?—He may, or he may not, as he thinks proper.

7547. Which is the general mode in Elgin?—There are as many cases disposed of the one way as the other. For instance, 21 people were bailed in Elgin, and I find that 10 of them were fined in sums varying from 5s. to £2. Now these parties having been bailed, must have been committed in order to trial before they were bailed, and these are police offences.

7548. Can you say of your own knowledge that in all these cases where the parties were bailed, they had been in prison?—I can say so of my own knowledge from these returns.

7549. That in all these cases where the parties were bailed they had been in prison?—Yes; the returns show that, except in two cases.

7550. Then there were two cases in which bail was taken?—No, no bail was taken; they were tried at once.

7551. But in the cases where bail was taken, can you state of your own knowledge that in all these cases the parties had been in prison?—They had.

7552. Mr. Shand.—Surely it is very common to take bail immediately from a man without his entering the prison doors?—You cannot do that legally.

7553. Supposing the Sheriff signs a warrant for commitment, it may be done?—No. He must be sent to jail, and be served with a copy of the commitment by the jailer or the incarcerator.

7554. Lord Barcaple.—You so understand the law?—That is the law; there is no doubt about it. The party's name must be entered on the prison books.

7555. Mr. Shand.—In 99 cases out of 100 for petty offences, I suppose that is the course followed. The party is taken to prison, and, without any detention, he presents his application for bail?—Yes; and he has to get his agent, and all that sort of thing.

7556. I suppose the Sheriff-substitute does not grant commitment to prison unless the case has a somewhat serious aspect?—I don't suppose he does. He and the Fiscal have the management of that part of the business.

7557. But for petty offences?—I can only speak from the return. Here is a return of 21 persons committed to the prison of Elgin under warrants from the Sheriff, and they were bailed.

7558. Lord Barcaple.—But does that show you that these parties were in prison?—One was 6 days, one 4 days, and one 3 days in prison before they were bailed; and I have no doubt the same thing takes place throughout Scotland.

7559. Mr. Shand.—Are there not many cases where the prisoner is law-abiding, having his house in the neighbourhood, where the Sheriff-substitute allows the case to be adjourned without such a proceeding?—I know the Sheriff-substitute often does that; but there are cases in which he can hardly do that.

7560. Is that because of the apparent gravity of the charge?—Yes; and you don't know much about the men. They are from a distant part of the country, and you must enforce the law as you find it.

7561. Is it in that class of cases that the law is so enforced?—Yes.

7562. The Chairman.—In regard to review in civil matters, you have already stated your opinion?—Yes.

James Jameson.

As to review in criminal matters, I would suggest that there might be a power given to the prisoner to except to the judge's charge to the jury, and take the case by a bill of exceptions to the Court of Justiciary, and obtain the Court of Justiciary's opinion on the law laid down by the presiding judge to the jury.

7563. And if the exception is sustained on any point, that would be conclusive of the case?—Yes.

7564. There would be no further trial?—I would further suggest that the defences of all criminals should be paid by the Crown. If a prisoner is apprehended and punished, he is punished for the good of society. It is necessary, in order to apportion his punishment, that the whole truth should be disclosed to the judge, in order that the judge may administer the law and the proper amount of punishment. That can only be done by an efficient contradicter to the prosecutor. If the prisoner is accused, society has done the prisoner a harm in making him defend himself at his own cost, and the public should therefore pay for the cost of his defence, and it should be the best defence that could be procured.

7565. Mr. Shand.—That would lead to a good many protracted defences?—I have no doubt of it, and I have no doubt that there would not be so many convictions throughout Scotland.

7566. Lord Barcaple.—Would you have that to apply whether the defence was successful or unsuccessful?—If it is a sound principle, it should be applied throughout.

7567. The Chairman.—And whatever the rank of the party, and his ability to pay for himself?—There is possibly a difference there; but it is matter of principle, and does not matter whether the man is rich or poor. It is for the interest of society that he should be tried, and society should pay for it.

7568. Lord Barcaple.—Would you leave him to select his own law advisers?—I would leave him all freedom in that.

7569. Mr. Harrison.—Do you think that many persons are convicted unjustly in Scotland at present?—I believe that many are convicted who would not be convicted if they were properly defended.

7570. But do you think that they are convicted unjustly?—They are convicted according to law, and whatever is according to law cannot be said to be unjust; but I say that many persons are convicted who, if they were efficiently defended, would not be convicted.

7571. The Chairman.—Do you think that many innocent persons are convicted?—That is a difficult question. I never saw an innocent person convicted in my own experience; but it is difficult to say. I never investigated.

7572. But if innocent men are not convicted, do you think it would be a benefit to society that more guilty men should escape?—I think that if my plan were adopted, a guilty man's guilt would be better brought out, and the judge would see his guilt more clearly, and give him a more severe sentence. The innocence of the innocent man would also be brought out, and if less guilty than the other, he would get a less punishment. It is necessary to apportion the punishment. It should be a just punishment, and no just punishment can be apportioned if only one side of the question is represented to the judge.

7573. You think punishment would be better apportioned?—Yes, when it was due.

7574. But if innocent men are not now convicted, and there would be more acquittals, these would be acquittals of guilty parties. Would that be for the benefit of society?—That is a difficult question, and I could hardly answer it. It is more a question of metaphysics, and I am not in a position to say whether nnocent parties are convicted or not.

7575. Mr. Murray.—You give these views on general principles?—Yes.

7576. You don't think that any feeling generally exists in Scotland that innocent people are convicted?—I cannot speak as to Scotland; but I think it would be more conducive to justice if they were defended. A prisoner undefended is a very pitiable sight.

7577. Lord Barcaple.—Have you ever a prisoner undefended in your court?—There are prisoners undefended every day. I have seen a prisoner refuse to have an agent.

7578. Have you prisoners who are undefended, not in summary police cases, but other cases?—All the prisoners tried by jury are defended by an agent; but there are different degrees of excellence among agents. They have an agent, such as he is.

7579. Mr. Shand.—And in all cases of a higher class than police cases they are defended by agents?—Yes.

7580. The Chairman.—Are they agents employed by the party, or agents assigned to them by the court?—If the party does not employ an agent, an agent is assigned to him; but the rule in our court, when a party is to be tried by jury, is, that the jailer generally hands the libel to a poor's agent. We have two or three poor's agents.

7581. Mr. Booth.—Who pays that agent?—The agent pays himself out of the future profits of his profession. In England, I believe, under Mr. Russell Gurney's Act, the expenses of prosecutions and defences are paid by the public.

7583. Have you any suggestion to make with the view of diminishing the costs of litigation?—I think an easy appeal to the Court of Session, in the way I described by abolishing the double Sheriff, would tend to diminish the costs. I have no particular views about costs.

7584. Have you anything to say about the privileges of agents?—I think an agent, after being an agent for 10 years, should have the power of pleading before the highest court in Scotland, and should be eligible for the office of Sheriff.

7585. Mr. Murray.—I thought you proposed to abolish the principal Sheriff?—But there would still be a resident Sheriff.

7586. But a practitioner is eligible for the office of resident Sheriff at present?—Yes.

7587. And that is the Sheriff you propose to leave?—Yes; but he would not be eligible to plead before the Supreme Court of Session. Of course I am speaking of the Sheriffs as they exist at present.

7588. The Chairman.—At present country agents are eligible to be Sheriff-substitutes?—Yes.

7589. That requires no alteration?—No.

7590. Then you think that after a man has been 10 years a practitioner before any inferior court, he should be allowed to practise in any other court, inferior or supreme?—I think so; in any inferior court at all events.

7591. Do you mean in any other inferior court?—Yes; or to plead before the Supreme Court.

7592. As an agent?—No, as a counsel.

7593. Mr. Shand.—Is there any reason why, after pleading as a counsel for some time there, he should not also be qualified for the supreme bench?—No reason whatever, if he is fitted for it. Let the best man be elevated.

7594. And you would remove any restriction that might prevent that?—Decidedly. The best man will come to the surface, and if he has ability he should not be kept down by any restrictions.

7595. The Chairman.—It has been suggested to the Commission that it might be a proper thing that a local practitioner once admitted to practise, having been examined by a General Board, should be allowed to practise not only in the county in which he is settled, but in any other Sheriff Court, or in the Supreme Court as an agent, from the time he has so passed: do you approve of that?—Yes; I think the wider the basis is made, the more efficient will be the superstructure.

7596. Do you think there would be any inconvenience attending the conducting of causes before the Supreme Court by an agent resident at a distance?—I don't think they would attempt it. I am only speaking of my own feeling; and I know that I would never attempt to conduct a case in the Supreme Court. I would send it to our Edinburgh agents.

7597. Have you anything further to suggest on that subject?—No.

7598. Are there any other points that you would like to mention?—No.

7599. Is there a Justice of the Peace Court held in your district?—Yes.

7600. Do the Justices sit in petty sessions in different parts of the county?—Yes.

7601. Mr. Shand.—Is it your opinion that the distinction between counsel and agent should be abolished?—Yes; and it is coming practically very much to that in England at the present day. I think there should be no such distinction.

7602. Do you think the law would benefit as much under such an arrangement as it does at present?—Yes, the public would be benefited; and what is for the public benefit must be for the advantage of the law.

7603. Do you think agents in that position would have the same opportunities and advantages for acquiring legal learning as at present?—Yes.

7604. The Chairman.—There was a system not unlike that in existence in Scotland at a remote period?—I don't know to what your Lordship alludes.

7606. And their clerks acted as agents?—Yes.

7607. That system was changed?—Yes.

7608. You think the change has not been for the better?—Well, I think old things are sometimes better than new.

7609. And that among others?—That among others.

7610. Do you think the subdivision of duties has or has not tended to increase the knowledge and the character of members of the bar?—I don't put it upon that ground.

7611. But what is your opinion on that point?—I cannot offer an opinion upon that point.

7612. But if that subdivision has the effect of enabling each party to acquire greater dexterity in his own department, is that not an advantage to the public?—It is an advantage to the public, no doubt of it; but it may operate as a private disadvantage, because there may be two or three agents throughout Scotland peculiarly fitted for pleading before the Supreme Court, and unless they are members of the Scotch bar they are disqualified.

7613. You think it might operate severely upon two or three agents throughout the country; but that it is for the advantage of the public?—I think it would be for the advantage of the public if the profession were thrown open.

7614. I thought you stated it otherwise a little ago. You said the subdivision might be for the advantage of the public, but that it might be a disadvantage to two or three agents?—Yes.

7615. These persons might come to the bar, and display their talents there?—Yes.

7616. That is open to them now?—Yes.

7617. And some who have come from the other branch of the profession have showed great talent?—Yes.

7618. The Justices of the Peace hold courts throughout your county?—Yes.

7619. And quarter sessions?—Yes.

7620. Do they hear small debt cases?—No; the Sheriff small debt jurisdiction has practically extinguished the Justices' small debt jurisdiction in the Elgin district of the county; but in the Forres district the Justices hear small debt cases.

7621. What jurisdiction do they exercise?—I find that for the year ending 1st January 1869, there were 75 persons tried before the Justices of the Peace of Elgin. Of these, 45 were convicted under the Act 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68—the Day Poaching Act; 1 was tried under the Act 9 Geo. IV. c. 69—the Night Poaching Act; 16 were tried for not taking out the dog licences—(it was a special year for that); 2 were tried under the Act 25 and 26 Vict. c. 114, for the prevention of poaching; 2 for breaches of the Public House Act; 1 for illegal possession of game; 5 for contravention of the Customs Consolidation Act, by smuggling tobacco; 1 for contravention of the County Voters Act—a bellman who had torn down a notice from a church door; and 1 under the Mutiny Act.

7622. These are all under special statutes?—Yes.

7623. The Justices sit for the granting of licences?—Yes; they hold two half-yearly courts.

7624. Is the jurisdiction of the Justices satisfactorily exercised in Elgin?—I consider that it is very satisfactorily exercised.

7625. Do they exercise any criminal jurisdiction?—They do not generally exercise common law criminal jurisdiction. I have seen them sometimes, in a case of emergency, if the Sheriff was at circuit, examine a man, and commit him till the Sheriff came back.

7626. Mr. Murray.—Do you approve of leaving game cases with the Justices?—I think they are very good judges in game cases.

7627. The Chairman.—Is there a Commissary Court at Elgin?—Yes, for the commissariat of Elgin and Nairn. It is held at Elgin. It is one commissariat.

7628. Has it separate officials?—Yes, it has a separate clerk and separate record; but the judges are the same—the Sheriff and the Sheriff-substitute.

7629. Do you think that system of having separate records and separate clerks is a convenient and useful one?—Yes, very.

7630. Mr. Murray.—Why?—Because I think the jurisdiction is different altogether from that of the Sheriff Court.

7631. The judge is the same?—Yes; but the matters are different.

7632. If the judge is the same, why should not the clerk be the same?—Because it is a different kind of court altogether, and exercises a different kind of jurisdiction. The clerk must have special knowledge. He has to consider all the wills given in for confirmation.

7633. Does that objection not apply to almost every court?—Possibly it might.

7634. Lord Barcaple.—You say the clerk has to consider all the wills. Does he in point of fact go over each will, and make an examination of it?—Yes, he does.

7635. With reference to testing the correctness of the procedure adopted by the executors?—The title of the party claiming confirmation. The party claiming confirmation gives in an inventory, asking confirmation as executor, and it is the clerk's duty to go over the testament or testamentary writing produced to him, and to say whether that is a proper title for having the office of executor conferred on the party claiming it.

7636. The clerk undertakes that duty?—Yes.

7637. Is it not personally performed by the Commissary?—No. The writ afterwards issued runs in the name of the Commissary, but the clerk does the work.

7638. Mr. Murray.—If the clerk has any doubt he would go to the Commissary?—Yes; but the Commissary would not perhaps solve his doubt; it is the clerk that is responsible for it; and even though the Commissary might tell him to do it, he might not do it.

7639. Suppose the clerk refused confirmation to the executor, would the party applying not appeal to the Commissary?—No, he cannot.

7640. Do you mean that the clerk is the judge as to whether, if a party applies for confirmation, he is to get it or not?—Yes, the clerk is the responsible party.

7641. Is that practice confined to Elgin?—I don't think so.

7642. Lord Barcaple.—What is the party's remedy if the clerk refuses confirmation? There has been a petition presented, has there not?—No, they just give in the testamentary writing. I never saw the point arise.

7643. Mr. Murray.—But suppose the point did arise, it is surely the Commissary who is the judge whether the applicant is to be confirmed?—Well, he would present the petition to the Commissary very likely.

7644. And what would follow on that?—Very likely the Commissary would grant the warrant, and that would be a warrant of court.

7645. Mr. Baxter.—Does not the writ of confirmation run in the Commissary's name?—Yes.

7646. And he confirms the executor, and gives him power to intromit with the goods?—Yes.

7648. Assuming there is a testament, but that there is a doubt in whose name confirmation should go out, is not the Commissary the judge?—The clerk says he has a doubt about it, and the clerk must then present a special application to the Commissary.

7649. But he ultimately gets the judgment of the Commissary?—Yes.

7650. Mr. Shand.—And as the Commissary is the judge in both classes of cases, the clerk has no responsibility except for mere administrative duty?—Possibly not.

7651. Then would it not be a convenient arrangement that that administrative duty should be vested in the Sheriff-clerk?—Yes; so far as that goes, there is no reason why it should not.

7652. The Chairman.—Do your burgh magistrates hold any court in Elgin?—They hold a Police Court.

7653. They hold no civil court?—No. The Sheriff Court has extinguished that.

7654. Do they hold the Police Court under a special Act of Parliament?—Yes, under the Lindsay Act.

7655. Does that work satisfactorily?—Yes, I think so.

7656. Have you a Dean of Guild in Elgin?—We have.

7657. Does he exercise any jurisdiction?—I have heard of it, but I have never seen any jurisdiction exercised by the Dean of Guild. It is done, however.

7658. He is one of the magistrates?—He is.

7659. Does he hold a regular, periodical court?—No, it is only on special applications presented to him.

7661. Is there much of that done?—Not much; perhaps one ejection in a year. A party applies to the magistrates for a warrant, after the tenant has been warned by chalking the door.

7662. That chalking is done by order of the magistrates?—Yes.

7663. Have you any Barony or Regality Courts?—We have a great many Barony Courts, that is to say Barony Bailies. We have Baron Bailies at Lhanbryde, Lossiemouth, Rothes, and other places. The reason of their existence is that, under the Local Roads Act, they have seats at the County Road Board.

7664. Do they exercise jurisdiction?—Not further than attending the County Road meetings, and as Commissioners of Supply. They exercise no jurisdiction.

SATURDAY, 23D JANUARY 1869.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD COLONSAY IN THE CHAIR.

Angus Turner.

ANGUS TURNER, Esq., examined.

7665. The Chairman.—You are town-clerk of Glasgow?—I am.

7666. You are also clerk to the Dean of Guild Court?—Clerk and assessor.

7667. You have been a long time clerk to the Corporation?—For nearly 40 years.

7668. At one period, I believe, there was a great deal of civil business transacted before the court of the magistrates of Glasgow?—A great deal,—more than in any court in Scotland at one period.

7669. Dr. Barclay.—And there was then very little in the Sheriff Court?—Very little.

7670. The Chairman.—There is not much business now in the court of the magistrates?—Very little. It is very much in abeyance since the passing of the Sheriff Court Act of 1838, by which the proceedings were very much abbreviated in all cases, for example, of citation, only one witness instead of two; and in the case of extracts, the long formal extracts of these days were abolished; and in fact the whole system was so abbreviated as, in point of fact, to disparage the Burgh Courts to so great an extent, that since that period one might almost say they have been gradually going into disuse, and there is very little business now in these courts. The contrast has been very great between the advantages conferred by the Act of 1838, and the pre-existing state of matters in the Burgh Courts.

7671. The same advantages have not been given in the Burgh Courts?—They have not. There is a power, in the Act of 1838, given to the Court of Session to apply the abbreviated forms to proceedings in the Burgh Courts. And I was myself the means of getting that power inserted in the House of Peers when the bill was passing through Parliament; but on a representation made to the judges, subsequent to the passing of that Act, by the late Mr Reddie, they were not disposed to make any change with reference to the Burgh Courts. The idea was, that the Burgh Courts should be gradually superseded in terms of the report that had been previously made by the Royal Commission in favour of the general and gradual supercession of these courts, and the judges did not think it right to pass any Act of Sederunt, making the Sheriff Court Act of 1838 applicable to the Burgh Courts. Therefore, the Burgh Court is disparaged as it were, by the Act of 1838, as in contrast with the proceedings in the Sheriff Court under that Act.

7672. Is there a small amount of business conducted before the magistrates' court still?—Very little indeed.

7673. Is there any assessor who sits with them and considers these cases?—Yes; one of the town-clerks always sits as assessor when there is any business before the court; but there is very little business now before the ordinary Burgh Court.

7674. The gentleman whose name you mentioned—Mr. Reddie—was a very eminent judge?—Yes.

7675. He was a member of the bar, I think?—Yes.

7676. And a very distinguished man?—Very much so.

7677. In the Dean of Guild Court, of which you are the assessor, is there much business transacted?—A very considerable amount of business.

7678. Would you state generally the nature of that business?—I had occasion to make an epitome of the jurisdiction of that court for the Merchants' House in an inquiry which they were lately making, and I have that statement with me. The letter of Guildry is dated in 1605; and as to the constitution of the court, the Dean of Guild Court is composed of eight persons appointed yearly; viz., four merchants, whereof the Dean of Guild is one; and four craftsmen, all Guild brethren, who shall be men of good fame, knowledge, experience, care, and zeal to the common weal,—the most worthy men of both ranks. The lyners of court are appointed 'the next day after the Dean of Guild is chosen,' those of the merchant rank by the Dean of Guild and directors of the Merchants' House, and those of the crafts rank 'by the Deacon Convener and deacons of crafts and their assistants.'

7679. Lord Barcaple.—Do these persons require to be masons or wrights?—Not further than being members of the Trades' House.

7680. Mr. Orr Ewing.—They are always master tradesmen, joiners, or masons?—That is practically the case, but there is no legal qualification attached, except that they must be members, in the case of the merchant rank, of the Merchants' House, and in the case of the craftsmen, of the Trades' House. The Dean of Guild Court is peculiar to royal burghs, and exercises a jurisdiction similar to that belonging in ancient times to the Roman ÆDILE. Its jurisdiction is privative—that is, exclusive of any other jurisdiction, in as far as regards the buildings within the burgh which forms its peculiar territory. To this court belongs the control of all buildings within the royalty or municipal jurisdiction, the prevention of obstructions in the street, the removal of old and ruinous tenements, and in general all matters that have any connection with buildings. It is especially the Dean of Guild's duty to take care that buildings within burgh be agreeable to law—neither encroaching on private property nor on the public streets or passages, and that houses in danger of falling be taken down, and rebuilt if necessary under judicial security. It is his duty also to line or define the boundaries of properties, and to settle questions of possession in matters of vicinage or rights to build, where there is some question of structure in dispute. He has power to decern for penalties and expenses, and in certain instances to grant warrant of imprisonment. The jurisdiction of the Sheriff has been extended to similar questions in counties, by the Act 1 and 2 Vict. cap. 119, sec. 15; but the Sheriff possesses no cumulative jurisdiction with the Dean of Guild Court within burgh, unless the question involves a right of servitude, and certain other prescribed cases. Neither does the Dean of Guild's jurisdiction depend in any measure on the Court of the Burgh, or, as it is commonly called, the Bailie Court. He has a council of his own to assist him, and has also the benefit of the advice of the legal assessors of the burgh; but the judgments must be subscribed by himself, and are subject to the review of the Court of Session. The proceedings of the Dean of Guild Court, and its functions as presently exercised, are in many cases regulated by the Police Act for Glasgow, 29 and 30 Vict. cap. 273, and extend over the district comprised within the municipal boundaries of the city, as defined by the Act 9 and 10 Vict. cap. 289, and by the interpretation clause of the Police Act. These statutes do not, however, limit the previously existing powers and jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild, or the procedure before his court with respect to his general jurisdiction, or processes of lining, or questions of title or servitude. By the Glasgow Police Act all new streets within the district over which the Act extends must be laid out under warrant and direction of the Dean of Guild, conformably to certain prescribed rules. The Act also requires the Dean of Guild's authority to be obtained, and certain conditions fulfilled, before buildings can be erected, altered, or removed. The power of the Dean of Guild to grant what are technically termed 'jedges and warrants' is also recognised, and rules are prescribed by the Act for its exercise. A jedge and warrant is an authority granted by the Dean of Guild to rebuild or repair a ruinous tenement within burgh, creating the cost a real burden on the property, and entitling the person in whose favour the jedge and warrant is granted to continue in possession until he is recouped in the amount expended and cognosced by the court. This procedure is usually resorted to by persons having right to the property, or to a portion of it, but who are doubtful of the validity of their title. It may also be resorted to by an adjudger, or an heritable creditor in possession, for his security, as, without the authority of the Dean of Guild Court, questions might arise in connection with such expenses, as to whether the parties had the right to retain the amount expended by them in repairs in an accounting with other adjudging creditors. The following is a summary of the particular powers conferred by the Police Act upon the Lord Dean of Guild, viz.:—Power, on the application of the Procurator-fiscal, to order compulsorily the removal of the tenants or occupiers, and to take down or repair ruinous buildings from which danger may be apprehended. Power, on the application of the Procurator-fiscal, with concurrence of one or more of the proprietors, or of any of the proprietors alone, to order the sale of ruinous or dangerous buildings. Power, on the application of the Procurator-fiscal or the Master of Works of the city, to order the removal of obstructions or projections on the public streets. Power, with concurrence of the Board of Police, when the proprietors are in court, to require them to sell to the Board such portion of their property as may be necessary to form a regular line of frontage to any public street, or to widen, enlarge, extend, or otherwise improve it, at such a price as may be fixed under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. Power to declare streets or courts public on the application of the Master of Works, and of the proprietors of property adjoining to or having a right of access thereby; and to impose conditions on proprietors who may not have concurred in the application when they apply for warrant to erect or alter buildings adjoining or having access to such streets or courts. Power, at the instance of a proprietor having the greatest frontage to any private street or court, and highest valuation, jointly with the Master of Works, or of the Master of Works separately, to impose conditions on proprietors making application for warrant to erect or alter any buildings adjoining or having a right of access to any such street or court. The procedure relative to the formation and improvement of streets is prescribed by other sections of the Act. Power to award compensation to owners through whose properties the Board of Police may form public sewers. On the other hand, power to fine proprietors of subjects draining into sewers in private streets for not keeping the same effectually cleansed. Power, on the application of the Procurator-fiscal, to order gas and water pipes to be raised, sunk, or otherwise altered.

7681. The Chairman.—These are generally the powers of the Dean of Guild?—Yes; and they are exercised every day in the court.

Angus Turner.

7682. These are statutory powers conferred on the Dean of Guild of Glasgow?—Yes.

7683. Is the amount of work imposed in that way very great?—It is very considerable. I have had a table prepared in order to make the return which the Commissioners have called on me to make; and the following is the number of the cases in each of the years from 1864 to 1868 in Glasgow:—1864, private cases 223, Procurator-fiscal cases 65; 1865, private cases 233, Procurator-fiscal cases 54; 1866, private cases 312, Procurator-fiscal cases 51; 1867, private cases 323, Procurator-fiscal cases 40; 1868, private cases 281, Procurator-fiscal cases 28—making a total of 1610 cases for the five years, or an average number of 323 cases each year; that is including last year, in which, from the depression in the state of trade, there was a falling off of about 40 cases.

7684. Are many of these opposed cases?—I may explain that, by the regulations of the court, there is first a petition presented, and the parties must present with their petition an elevation plan and a ground plan. The elevation plan shows the effect of the building on the conterminous tenements; the ground plan shows any possible encroachment upon the adjoining proprietor affecting the lights, or servitude of entries, or of various other kinds. The case comes before the court, and in almost every one of what I may call the unopposed cases the parties appear. I call them unopposed because there is no litigation in them. The Dean of Guild is generally one of the most eminent of our merchants, and he is advised by four tradesmen sitting on one side of him, and four merchants on the other. The parties come before the Court and submit their plans, and in many of the cases they are not at one about the boundaries; but the Dean of Guild and his tradesmen enter into explanation with the parties, and suggest that certain arrangements should be made, for example, in regard to ventilation, putting water-closets in proper positions in the house, the strength and stability of buildings, and so on. The tradesmen say: That wall is not sufficiently strong; it is not founded properly, or the joisting is not proper: you must alter it. And the parties adjust that at the bar. Those cases are practically unopposed, because the moral effect of these eight men sitting and influencing the parties is such that they are disposed of without litigation.

7685. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Though they are not opposed by further litigation, the parties appear and settle their cases at the first hearing?—Yes.

7686. Mr. Baxter.—And they would probably otherwise be opposed?—Yes; but the influence of the tribunal over the parties is such that this is the practical working of it.

7687. Mr. Orr Ewing.—You have said that the parties present an elevation plan and a ground plan. Do they not present the whole plans of the building?—Yes; but all that the regulations require are the elevation and ground plan. But it is quite true that the parties produce the detailed plans, chiefly to illustrate and make plain to the court what their object is.

7688. The court could not judge of the strength of buildings, or the ventilation, or of the sanitary regulations, or of the sewerage, unless the plans were complete?—No; and therefore they are generally produced. Parties know that the tribunal takes cognizance of the whole question, and they come prepared to meet all questions of ventilation, drainage, etc.

7689. The Dean of Guild Court grants no authority to build unless the whole plans are laid before it, and they are satisfied as to the building in every way?—That is the case.

7690. The Chairman.—Is it for the advantage of the parties to have that settled beforehand, so as not to be arrested in the progress of the works?—No doubt of it.

7691. Dr. Barclay.—Although the parties don't appear, does the court take cognizance of the plans?—The magistrates and the Police Board have a city architect, who is called the Master of Works; and his instructions are, that every plan of a new erection, or any alteration of a building, either as to position or encroachments, must be reported to the court, and he must state that he has gone over the plans, and he must bring under the notice of the Dean of Guild anything which he considers necessary. For example, in the case of building churches and theatres, we have had a number of those lately in which we have had to see that there was proper ingress and egress. This public officer brings the plans of these buildings before the court, because, though the parties may be satisfied, he is not satisfied; and he brings it before the court in order that proper staircases and means of access and exit may be provided.

7692. Is he a party called in every case?—Yes; and therefore, though there may be no opposition on the part of the private parties, still this officer brings his view before the court; and if he satisfies the court that these matters are not properly attended to, the court will not grant the lining, and the case is postponed until the parties satisfy the court that the plan can be carried out with safety. In fact, the court takes cognizance of every description of building.

7693. If parties don't appear, do the court look after private interests, with regard to encroachment on private ground, or interference with servitude of lights, etc.?—If the parties acquiesce, the court would not interfere, except by the intervention of the public officer.

7694. Is it not usual to visit the ground?—Not always; but whenever there is any case of doubt, the court visit the ground and see the premises, and judge for themselves.

7695. In an unopposed case?—No; not unless the public officer brings the matter under their cognizance. Every petition is served on the conterminous proprietors, and they must be presumed to have gone to the office some days before the case is called, as the plans must be lodged two days before the court meets; and therefore it is presumed that the parties have gone and examined the plans, and are satisfied, as far as their private interests are concerned. But the public officer may not be satisfied, and he takes a course of his own.

7696. The Chairman.—There are two interests involved—the interests of the conterminous proprietors as regards their property, or any encroachment on it, and the interest of the public?—Precisely.

7697. The interests of the private party you assume he will look after himself?—Precisely.

7698. And if he does not appear, you suppose he has no objection?—Yes.

7699. But if he does not appear, you take cognizance of the public interests?—Precisely.

7700. Dr. Barclay.—Are the plans authenticated in any way?—Yes.

7701. Are they subscribed by the Dean of Guild?—They are subscribed by the assessor of court, and are referred to in the sentence. The plans are all preserved, and parties have access to them at any time.

7702. Have you sometimes had a demand to see them?—Very often cases arise before the Court of Session, and other questions may arise in connection with these buildings, and we are sometimes directed to transmit the plans for the information of the Court of Session, or to exhibit them to parties interested. With the explanation I have before made, I may now state, that the cases which were not litigated, but were to a certain extent opposed in the manner I have described, consisted for the following years:—Unopposed cases in 1864, 203; 1865, 205; 1866, 264; 1867, 289; 1868, 259. Then, of cases where the parties were dissatisfied, and would have their cases disposed of according to law, under a regular record made up in terms of the Act of Sederunt, there were in 1864, 20; in 1865, 28; in 1866, 48; in 1867, 34; and in 1868, 22. These are the private cases. Then as to Fiscal cases, there were unopposed, except in manner before noticed—in 1864, 30 cases; in 1865, 46; in 1866, 46; in 1867, 23; and in 1868, 16; and opposed or litigated—in 1864, 35 (I may explain that this large number arose from the Act of Parliament with reference to the consumption of smoke); in 1865, 8; in 1866, 5; in 1867, 17; and in 1868, 12. Total, 1610 cases.

7703. The Chairman.—When you talk of Fiscal cases, do you mean that the Procurator-fiscal has observed or got information that transgressions were going on?—Yes.

7704. Dangerous buildings?—Precisely.

7705. Or parties violating the Smoke Act?—Yes.

7706. Or not following out what the Dean of Guild had ordered to be done in regard to the construction of buildings?—Precisely; or in enforcing certain provisions of the Police Act.

7708. Are these cases such that despatch is of great moment to the parties?—Very often—very important indeed. They frequently involve buildings of great value. For example, there was one case lately in regard to carrying out a plan, called 'The Wind of Athens,' after the model of a building in Athens. This was a litigated case, and I think the expense of the proceedings before the court amounted to about £12; but the buildings in question might be of the value of from £20,000 to £30,000. It came to the Court of Session afterwards, and the judgment of the Dean of Guild was affirmed.

7709. But I am speaking of the importance of despatch. Does it frequently happen that there is a stoppage of the proceedings of tradesmen while the case is in dependence?—That arises very often in the Fiscal cases, because he applies to the court where a party has not been conducting his operations properly, and we remit to a tradesman to get the operations conducted in a proper manner. In that case there must be a delay of several months until the operations are completed, because the expenses payable by the parties can only be ascertained on completion of the operations.

7710. But does it frequently happen that the progress of work must be interrupted in consequence of the interposition of the Fiscal, or that the arrangements which parties have made for proceeding with their operations in the season are arrested until the deliverance of the Dean of Guild is given?—That does occasionally arise.

7711. Does that make despatch of great importance?—That is one of the reasons why I think cases are so very rapidly disposed of. In 1864 there was only an average of six days between the calling of the petition and the final disposal of it, so that there must have been great despatch.

7712. Mr. Orr Ewing.—And though the ordinary courts are only held twice a month, there are special courts held when necessary?—Yes; but you will observe I am talking of the average number of days the whole cases were in dependence.

7713. Dr. Barclay.—You have the power, and use it, of granting interdicts?—Very often.

7714. Mr. Baxter.—Do you make up a record?—In contested cases.

7715. Dr. Barclay.—By condescendence and answers?—Yes, under the Act of Sederunt.

7716. Mr. Paterson.—In the case of new erections, I understand the proprietor does not commence till he has got the judgment or lining of the Dean of Guild Court?—No.

7717. And having got that, he goes on to complete the building without delay, unless he does something contrary to the plans?—Yes.

7718. Dr. Barclay.—What happens if he does anything contrary to the plans?—Then there is an interdict.

7719. By the Fiscal or a private party?—Yes.

7720. Do you grant an interdict in that case, without any allegation that the party is making an encroachment, but simply that he has not got the authority of the proper court?—The interdict is only granted on the petitioner's allegations showing a prima facie case for interdict.

7721. You have seen that?—Yes, frequently.

7722. Without any such allegation?—The allegation must be sufficiently definite and relevant. For example, in cases where the conterminous proprietors have not been duly notified of the proceedings, and therefore the parties had no right to proceed with the building without complying with the regulations of the court, we interdict them.

7723. Mr. Orr Ewing.—And fine them for contempt of court?—Yes. The number of cases in which reclaiming petitions were lodged was in 1864, 5; in 1865, 4; in 1866, 5; in 1867, 4; and 1868, 1. Then in the Fiscal cases there was no reclaiming petition for the first three years, and in the last two years there was one in each year. The number of cases advocated was in 1864, none; in 1861, one private case, and one Fiscal case; in 1866, none; in 1867, two private cases; and in 1868, five private cases, and one Fiscal case. The number finally decided in accordance with or adversely to the decree appealed from, in so far as known or intimated to the clerks of court, was in 1864, one appeal judgment affirmed; 1868, one appeal judgment affirmed. Although appeals in ten other cases, as appears from my return, are stated to have been intimated, it does not appear that they have been followed out. So that there were only for these five years two advocations followed out, in so far as known to the clerks, and in these two the judgments were affirmed by the Court of Session.

7724. You believe that in reality only two cases have been taken to the Court of Session?—I have no access to know the result of the five cases, but they have never come back to the court. Only one has come back, and that has been an affirmed case. The advocations were taken some time ago; and the probability is, that if anything had been done, we would have heard of it. The average expense to the pursuer in an unopposed case is not known to the clerks of court, as that is a matter fixed between client and agent, and not known to the clerks, except when some dispute arises as to expenses, when the court may be called on to dispose of the amount; but by the fees established by Act of Sederunt, agents are only entitled to charge certain fixed fees, and which in petitions of ordinary length, at the instance of private parties, ought not to exceed £1, 19s. in each case, including copies for service, besides the fees to the clerks of court mentioned in the return which I have made to the Commissioners, and the average fee to the bar-officer and witness of 6s. 8d. for each case, taking the defenders not to exceed three in number. The average expenses decerned for in cases which have been opposed, as appearing from the Act Book:—Private cases in 1864, £4, 7s. 9d.; 1865, £5, 12s.; 1866, nothing; 1867, nothing; 1868, £8, 18s. Nothing means that neither party got expenses. It is almost impossible to give a correct average of the expenses in Fiscal's cases, inasmuch as the cases themselves are not with the clerks of court, and the decrees for expenses, as appearing in the Act Book, include the expenses of operations ordered by the court; but from £2 to £3 in each contested case may be considered a fair average.

7725. The Chairman.—You have mentioned the average of the other cases. Can you state the highest amount and the lowest amount?—The greatest amount of such expenses during any of the five years was £12, 12s., and the smallest amount was 10s. 6d., as appearing from the Act Book.

7726. Dr. Barclay.—Was that an opposed case?—Yes.

7727. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Did you state what was the expense of a case settled at the first hearing?—£1, 19s.

Angus Turner.

7728. Mr Paterson.—Does that include the fee of the clerk and officers of the Court?—No; there is a table of fees to the clerk. The forms of procedure observed in the Dean of Guild Court in Glasgow are chiefly regulated by Act of Sederunt passed by the Court of Session in relation to judicial proceedings before Burgh Courts in Scotland; and the special fees exigible by the town-clerks as clerks of court, by a table adjusted with the Faculty of Procurators, and confirmed by the Town Council, and subsequently recognised by the Royal Commission sitting on the courts of justice in Scotland in 1822, a copy of which is given in my return to the Commissioners.

7729. The Chairman.—In such a case as Mr. Ewing alluded to, disposed of at the first hearing, what would be the addition made to the £1, 19s. by the clerk's fees?—2s. 6d. would be the fee in an ordinary case; and then there is the sentence money, which depends on the value of the case. In a Procurator-fiscal's case, for instance, the fee would be 1s. 6d., if of the lowest value; if it was of greater value, 3s. 6d.; and of the highest value, as in linings of buildings, 7s. 6d. That would be added to the charge which the procurator would make for preparing the petition and the copies for service. These sums would fall to be added to the £1, 19s.

7730. Dr. Barclay.—And the extract?—I do not know what it costs.

7731. Does it comprehend the boundary?—Yes; it must contain the boundary.

7732. Mr. Paterson.—Do you include the bond of caution?—There is a bond of caution in all linings, and that will be an additional expense of 3s. 6d., I think.

7733. Dr. Barclay.—Do you ask that, although it is not an opposed case?—Yes, in all cases, in order to insure that the walls are properly constructed, and that conterminous proprietors are not injured.

7734. Is there any authority for that?—Just the usage of the court for the last hundred years at least.

7736. The Chairman.—That would make the cost about £2, 10s.?—Yes.

7737. Mr. Paterson.—The 11s. is exclusive of the fee for extract?—Yes; but there are very few extracts taken—not one in twenty. Parties are quite satisfied with the judgment of the court, and proceed upon that. If there is a dispute with some conterminous proprietor, or a collateral case going before another or a higher court, an extract may be necessary, because the record could not be taken to the higher court, and the extract would go; but with that exception, I think few extracts are required.

7738. Dr. Barclay.—What penalty is there in the bond of caution?—It is unlimited. It is, that they shall indemnify the public in the first instance, and the conterminous proprietors, for all damage occasioned by their operations.

7739. Who is the judge of the solvency of the cautioners?—The clerk of court.

7740. Suppose that a proprietor gets authority and declines to find caution, or cannot find caution?—Then the Fiscal applies to the court, and he is fined for not complying with the order of the court.

7741. Mr. Murray.—Is there a separate cautioner along with the proprietor?—Yes; generally the builder.

7742. Mr. Paterson.—That is to guard against the possible bankruptcy of the proprietor?—Yes. And I have known buildings so fragile, being speculatively constructed, that they were not secure; and no adjacent proprietor should be compelled to submit to conduct of that kind on the part of a builder. There must be security that the erection is of a substantial kind.

7743. The Chairman.—Have you found that parties have had any difficulty in finding caution?—No.

7744. Have you known any instance in which the bond of caution was proceeded upon?—Not one. The security afforded by it is itself of value; because the party applying for lining is under an obligation to the cautioner, and great care is observed.

7745. Mr. Orr Ewing.—It is found to be no practical hardship?—None.

7746. Dr. Barclay.—And there is no authority for it but custom?—No; but I think it is a fair and reasonable rule. Supposing a man to be a speculative builder, and a man of straw, he gets authority to line; and if he makes an unsubstantial building, are the neighbouring proprietors and the public to suffer from the speculation of this man? The neighbouring proprietors must be made secure that they shall not be injured by him; and the Dean of Guild Court think it reasonable to put him under a bond of caution, that he shall indemnify the proprietor if any damage arises.

7747. Mr. Murray.—What authority have you for that?—No court is bound to grant a warrant, if they don't see that it can be fairly executed for the public safety. A judge must take care, in issuing a warrant, that the work shall be done competently and legally, and that parties shall not be injured by it.

7748. The Chairman.—Practically, you have not found it to be any obstruction to proceeding with the operations?—None whatever.

7749. Dr. Barclay.—You put it on the ground of speculative builders requiring to be taken care of. I suppose you don't mean to lay it down as a general rule, that every man who builds a house in Glasgow is a speculator; and yet you ask it from every man?—We cannot distinguish between them, and we ask it from all.

7750. Mr. Orr Ewing.—It is a wholesome law?—Yes.

7751. Mr. Murray.—You would not allow them to put up an insufficient building?—We see a plan representing a certain building. But how is the court to know that that plan will be executed? There is no party supervising the executing of it, and therefore the court takes this bond of caution.

7752. Dr. Barclay.—Did Sir James Campbell find caution with reference to that magnificent house of his in Ingram Street?—Yes.

7753. Mr. Murray.—After the court approve of the plan, do they take no means of seeing that the work is done in accordance with it?—No; excepting that it is under the observation of the Master of Works. If he sees any building being constructed on an improper footing, he represents that to the Procurator-fiscal, who immediately brings it before the court. There are many cases of that sort.

7754. But still the court take no cognizance as to whether the plans which they approve of are carried out in their entirety?—No; they cannot.

7755. Mr. Orr Ewing.—But though the members of the court do not do so, the Master of Works does; and is it not the case that it has frequently been found that when stairs have been made narrower than the plans, and the scantling of wood less, the Dean of Guild Court has had occasion to interfere, and order these things to be altered?—That occurs frequently.

7756. Mr. Baxter.—But you don't leave private parties to protect themselves?—We do, so far as we can.

7757. You don't leave them to their own remedy?—No; we hold they are acting upon our warrant. We make it a condition of our warrant, that the work shall be done faithfully and correctly.

7758. Mr. Murray.—Suppose there was a difference of opinion in a litigated case between the Dean of Guild and his council, how is that settled?—The Court of Session have held, by repeated reported cases, that the Dean of Guild is the judge, and that his council are merely his advisers. He may or may not be regulated by their advice. There are three or four cases to that effect, and he alone subscribes the judgment.

7759. What position does the assessor hold?—He takes care that matters are in due form, that Acts of Sederunt and Acts of Parliament are properly brought under the notice of the court, and that the proceedings are in due form. The merits of the case are disposed of by the Dean of Guild and his council, who are a most competent and intelligent body of men.

7760. The Chairman.—If a question of law arises, the Dean of Guild may take assistance from the assessor, just as the magistrates used to take assistance from Mr. Reddie?—Yes.

7761. The magistrates pronounced the judgment, but it was Mr. Reddie's judgment?—Yes; but in this case it partakes more of the character of a jury. The details are with reference to the plans, and tradesmen are more competent than a lawyer to say what should be done with regard to the strength or ventilation of a building, and the strength of partitions, etc. It resembles more a jury of eight men sitting to determine on the propriety of the erections, whatever they may be.

7762. Mr. Murray.—But supposing a legal question to arise, on which the Dean of Guild takes the assessor's opinion, does he always find in conformity with that opinion?—No; I have known him differ from the assessor.

7763. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Have you generally found the Dean of Guild right?—I know one case where the Dean of Guild differed from me, and the case went to the Court of Session, and the Dean of Guild was found to be right.

7764. Dr. Barclay.—Was that a question of pure law?—No; I was rather taking an equitable view, and I should perhaps have rather taken the legal view.

7765. Mr. Murray.—The town-clerk is the assessor?—The senior town-clerk is the assessor.

7766. The fees of court are payable to the town-clerk?—Yes. They amount to £180 a year only. They would not pay the expenses of the clerks, and I would be very glad to be relieved of it to-morrow, unless the duty belonged to my office. Otherwise, I would not undertake it; but it is part of our duties, and we are paid in another form.

7767. Mr. Orr Ewing.—I suppose the Dean of Guild Court pays you very well?—It is just £180 a year, and it takes the whole time of one clerk, and part of the time of another. I don't believe it puts into our pocket £30 a year, and I would be glad to get rid of it.

7768. The Chairman.—Are the expenses of the Dean of Guild Court paid entirely out of the fees?—Entirely so; but probably I should not exactly say that, because the Dean of Guild's Court is a court of the burgh; and the Court-house Commissioners provide the courts, and they also provide for their being cleaned and kept in order. Therefore it may be said that that expense falls on the assessment raised for the purpose of court-houses in Glasgow.

7769. But they give no salary to the assessor?—None whatever.

7770. Mr. Orr Ewing.—The Dean of Guild performs very important duties ex officio?—He is a member of the Town Council, and a member of the Merchants' House.

7771. He is a Commissioner of Police?—Yes.

7772. And he holds the Commission of the Peace in Lanarkshire?—Yes.

7773. He is a member of the Court-house Trust and the Cumbrae Lighthouse Trust?—Yes; and all the more important offices connected with the town.

7774. And having been once Dean of Guild, he is a member of the Cumbrae Lighthouse Trust for life?—Yes; as an old Dean.

7775. He is trustee in a dozen mortifications?—Yes.

7776. And he is a Road Trustee?—Yes.

7777. And he takes part in the charitable and educational institutions of Glasgow?—Yes.

7778. Besides being head of various special charities?—Yes.

7779. In the ancient letter of Guildry granted in 1605, is it not the case that the Dean of Guild and his court was a court of conciliation or arbitration between the merchants of the city?—It was. That was a part of the letter of Guildry.

7780. Resembling very much the Commercial Courts now held in Paris?—Yes.

7781. The letter of Guildry alludes to the courts in Paris?—Yes.

7782. And they are exactly identical with the present courts?—Yes; or nearly so.

7783. Do you consider it would be a good thing for the merchants of Glasgow, or such a city as Glasgow, if we had similar courts now established?—Only yesterday, the head of the Merchants' House called on me, and stated that he is about to bring before the Chamber of Commerce a proposition exactly to the effect you are now mentioning; and in consequence of that, I called on the French Consul, and asked him to give me a note of the constitution and character of these Tribunals de Commerce, as they are called in Paris, and he gave me the book containing their constitution.

7784. Dr. Barclay.—Is that the Code Napoleon?—Yes. When two merchants quarrel about any mercantile or commercial matter, they go before this court of conciliation in Paris, and almost all these questions are disposed of in presence of eight merchants, including the president, who are conversant with the subject-matter in dispute, being selected from the general body of merchants; and the two disputants are so affected by the moral decision of their compeers engaged in the same trade as themselves, that they go away contented, and the question goes no further. That is the practical effect of the court in Paris; and the Chamber of Commerce in Glasgow are, I think wisely, moving to have some similar court established in Glasgow, for the disposal of these commercial questions.

7785. The Chairman.—In regard to the Dean of Guild Court, do you think that there would be detriment to the parties interested in the questions that come before that court, if its jurisdiction was transferred to the Sheriff, and mingled with their proceedings, with the necessary delay that would be thereby caused?—I think it would totally disorganize the whole proceedings of the court. If the Sheriff were to interpose, the whole system of the court would be destroyed. It is a court partaking more of the character of a jury, not of the character of a Sheriff Court, which is presided over by a lawyer going through a long roll of causes, making up records, etc. The cases I have been describing are in most instances disposed of at one hearing; and they would not be disposed of in the Sheriff Court in three years probably.

7786. And there would be more expense?—Ten times more expense.

7787. And some of them would have to be remitted to men of skill?—Yes. At present the cases come before tradesmen, and the whole thing is done at once; but no Sheriff could dispose of a case of that sort without the interposition of some skilled person.

7788. Mr. Orr Ewing.—The Dean of Guild compromises or adjusts cases often which the Sheriff in his official position could not well do?—Yes.

7789. The Sheriff must decide on law and facts?—Yes.

7790. Whereas the Dean of Guild takes a mercantile or practical view of the matter, and effects a compromise?—That is the practical working of it.

7791. Dr. Barclay.—As to the Burgh Courts, you are aware that at one time the aliment of civil prisoners was entirely within the magistrates' jurisdiction?—Yes.

7792. And that was formerly a very extensive jurisdiction?—Yes.

7793. That is now divided between the Sheriff and the magistrates?—I don't think the Sheriff grants any aliment.

7794. Who does it?—The magistrates always.

7795. Your prison is in Duke Street, about a mile from the magistrates' court?—Yes.

7796. Is the prisoner brought from prison to you?—It is done both ways, but the Court of Session have held that the magistrate must be present. It is a very onerous duty altogether.

7797. When you bring a man up to your chambers, under what warrant do you do so?—The warrant of a magistrate, who grants the warrant to convene him for the purpose of examination.

7798. What if he were to escape on the road?—

Angus Turner.

That is one of the risks attending it. There have been cases of escape in Glasgow, and it is a very onerous and serious duty.

7799. It is entirely in the hands of the magistrates?—Yes.

7800. Do you fix a uniform rate of aliment?—It is not in my department. But there is a regular table fixing the amount.

7801. The Chairman.—On what principle?—There is a certain graduated scale.

7802. Dr. Barclay.—They are not all on the same scale?—No.

7803. There was once in Glasgow a service of heirs called a service by ward of court?—That has been abolished. It is now done by precept of clare under the late Act.

7804. You mentioned the jedge and warrant: are there many such?—Not a great number, but there are probably two or three every year—cases of ruinous tenements, where the parties can make out no satisfactory title, or where the proprietors are absent, and you cannot make extensive repairs without the jedge and warrant.

7805. The jedge and warrant forms a real security on the property?—Yes.

7806. Is it recorded in any register?—Yes, I think it is generally recorded in the burgh register, and so a party buying a property is put on his guard.

7807. Then he must search the register?—I don't know that the jedge and warrant would be effectual without being put on record.

7808. Are you aware of the decision of last century in the case of the Sheriff and the Dean of Guild of Stirling?—If you refer to the general common law jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild Court, it will be found in Mr. M'Glashan's Practical Notes on the Jurisdiction and Forms of Process in Civil Causes of the Sheriff Court, edited by yourself.

7809. In the case of Neill, from Dundee, it was held that a Dean of Guild had no privative jurisdiction except in lining?—I was not aware of that.

7810. You mentioned that the Sheriff's jurisdiction in counties had been extended so as to embrace questions of that kind. That Act does not exempt burghs, does it?—It saves the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild.

7811. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—What is the state of the business before the Burgh Court of Glasgow in ordinary civil cases?—It is almost entirely in abeyance.

7812. Do you think there ought be an alteration to the effect of putting the administration of the Burgh Court in the same position as formerly?—It is rather an anomalous jurisdiction altogether, particularly having in view the opinion of the Commissioners in 1822. I could not with propriety say that it would be expedient to revive it or strengthen it, because one must defer to the opinion of the eminent men who sat on that Commission. They thought that the Burgh Court should gradually pass into the Sheriff's jurisdiction, and should be dispensed with. Against the authority of that Commission I think it would be almost idle now to express an opinion, with a view to the revival of the Burgh Court jurisdiction,—the Commissioners being of opinion that it was anomalous that a bailie should sit there only to subscribe the sentences, the business being really done by a lawyer. But in Glasgow there has been a very strong feeling that something ought to be done with reference to the Sheriff Court, in regard to which there is now a great accumulation of business.

7813. Having regard to what took place in the Burgh Court of Glasgow in the days of Mr. Reddie, and in the former period, might there not be a propriety in having such a tribunal encouraged?—I think there would be an immense advantage from having a competitive court—another court besides the Sheriff Court. I think the mere fact of there being two courts would be of the greatest possible advantage. It is scarcely appropriate to talk of competition in regard to courts of law, but the principle of competition even in courts of law is very desirable.

7814. So far as your opinion is concerned, it would go to a restitution of the court?—Yes, in some form. I think that would be very desirable in a public point of view. The business of the Sheriff Court is accumulating very largely.

7815. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Would not an additional Sheriff do the work?—I think it is generally felt that there would be an advantage in having a competing jurisdiction. Just now everything is sent to the Sheriff Court, and agents have not time to attend to the business. If there were two courts, there would be two classes of agents. The Small Debt Court of the Sheriff ought to sit daily; and were a Sheriff specially appointed for that duty, the time of the other Sheriffs might thus be saved for the general business of the higher courts, and of the county, etc.

7816. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Would you give the same privileges to the decrees of the Burgh Court which you give to the decrees of the Sheriff Court, and make the system of pleading as expeditious and economical?—I think it would be a great advantage to have competition between the two courts. I would subdivide the judicial business of the county. The business in Glasgow has increased so greatly, that some remedy must be applied.

7817. Formerly the greater number of proper mercantile cases went before the Burgh Court?—Yes; and during Mr. Reddie's time the greater number of important cases went there.

7818. Mr. Paterson.—You mentioned that out of the 1600 cases in the Dean of Guild Court, about 1200 are passed after a sort of conference at the bar between the court and the parties?—Yes.

7819. And each of these cases costs about £3?—£2, 10s., including the citation of witnesses and of conterminous proprietors.

7820. It has been suggested that, instead of putting a proprietor in petitorio, and having to go to the Dean of Guild Court when he wanted to do no wrong, there might be a deposit of the plans with the City Architect, and notice given to the other proprietors; and that, if these plans were not objected to within six days, the proprietor should go on and put up his building; and if they were objected to within six days, the party complaining should seek his remedy. What is your opinion of that view?—That would be making the present proceeding still more cumbersome; because I don't think that depositation of the plans would be practically effectual. It would be going through a form of proceeding which would be disregarded. No architect receiving plans in that way could have the authority that the court has. The parties know that they are to be dealt with peremptorily and at once, if they don't come prepared with their plans, and with all the information necessary to enable the court to judge whether the building should proceed. It would totally destroy the efficacy of the court, if the plans were merely to be deposited with an architect.

7821. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Although 1200 cases are unopposed in reality, in the great number of them the parties did appear, and pointed out what objections they might have, so that the Dean of Guild and his brethren intervened and adjusted or altered the plans to satisfy the parties; and though judgment was given on the first hearing, these cases were opposed?—To that extent they were so.

JOSIAH LIVINGSTONE, Esq., examined.

7822. The Chairman.—I believe you are one of the Justices of the Peace for the county of the city of Edinburgh?—I have been so for some years.

7823. You sit in the Justice of Peace Court?—I have had considerable experience in sitting there.

7824. Do cases of debt come before you there?—Yes; in almost every form, and to a very large extent cases of servants' wages.

7825. You deal with cases of small amount very summarily?—Very summarily. At the same time, so far as I have seen, the decisions are given very carefully.

7826. There is no review?—There is no review.

7827. How many of you sit?—Two constitute a quorum.

7828. Are there sometimes more than two?—There are sometimes three. I understand that there are generally three summoned.

7829. Are there a good many cases brought before you for debt?—An immense number of causes. I have seen 160 cases on the roll in one day.

7830. How often do you sit to hear those causes?—The court sits every Monday.

7831. When you say that there have been 160 causes in one day, I suppose you mean that some of them are questions between master and servant, and some between ordinary debtor and creditor?—Exactly.

7832. What may be the amount of the claims that come before you there?—In ordinary cases, generally up to £5, and servants' wages to any amount.

7833. Have you any written pleadings before you?—None.

7834. Merely the summons?—Merely the summons.

7835. Do the parties attend in person?—The parties attend in person. I understand that the law is that the parties should attend in person, or by a member of their family, but there is a practice of agents attending. I suppose that can be objected to, and it is sometimes objected to, but it is a practice.

7836. And it is sometimes allowed?—It is.

7837. And it may sometimes be but fair to allow it, when the party is not very able to state his own case?—I think, as a general rule, it is better that parties should attend personally. At the same time, many Justices find considerable difficulty in getting at the truth from the confused story of the litigants, and they find difficulty in making the witnesses speak the truth; so that a practised and intelligent agent sometimes saves a great deal of time and trouble.

7838. From the number of cases brought there weekly, do you consider that it is a court which is popular with the community?—It seems to be so.

7839. Are the expenses of procedure there large or small?—They are very small. I am not prepared to say exactly what the expenses are, but they are very small.

7840. Are there any other classes of matters which you sit on—as, for instance, granting licences?—The court of which I am speaking just now—namely, the Edinburgh City Small Debt Court—has no jurisdiction as to licences.

7841. Have you anything more to say about the Small Debt Court?—I desire to say that I think it appears to be not only popular with the public, but highly fitted to be useful. I have observed that a Justice who sits, and who really is qualified for his work, is of very great use to the litigants who are brought before him. It appears to me that the court in that matter differs considerably from the Sheriff Small Debt Court, where the Sheriff, from his education and his office, judges simply as regards the law of the case. But I have thought that the Justices, who are the neighbours of the parties, while they give their decisions according to law, have a tendency to bring the parties together and reconcile them; and I think great good is effected by the judge being enabled in a very few words to show the reasonableness of his decision, and so to bring them to good terms with one another.

7842. Are the Justices often successful in that endeavour?—I think I have observed that they are often very successful in that.

7843. Mr. Harrison.—Have you any difficulty in getting the requisite number of Justices?—I don't think that in Edinburgh there is any difficulty in getting the requisite number. It is not every Justice who is qualified to act as a small debt judge. There are some peculiar qualifications which I consider requisite for that. It is not so much knowledge of law as knowledge of mankind, and of the classes of mankind that are met with in these courts; and he requires to give a patient, kindly attention to his cases, and to be able very quickly to see how he should give his decisions.

7844. The Chairman.—To see the real merits of the case?—Yes; and he requires a good deal of tact to keep the litigant and the witness to the point and get the truth out of them.

7845. Mr. Harrison.—I need scarcely ask whether you think it desirable that the business transacted before the Justice of Peace Court should be transferred to the Sheriff Court?—I think decidedly not. I think there are some elements of good in the Justice of Peace Court that you could not get in the Sheriff Court.

7846. The Chairman.—These you have explained to us?—Yes.

7847. Dr. Barclay.—You have said that you entertain questions as to servants' wages to any amount. Do you conduct these without written pleadings?—Yes.

7848. Are they not subject to review by the Supreme Court?—They are not subject to any review.

7849. Are they not reviewable by the Quarter Sessions in the first place?—The Small Debt Court is limited to £5, and servants' wages to any amount.

7850. But are the cases of servants' wages above that sum all conducted by regular record, with an appeal to the Court of Session?—I have never met with a record in our court.

7851. And you adjudicate upon questions above £5 without any record?—We do.

7852. Mr. Clark.—What is the largest sum you have adjudicated upon in that court?—I never met with any large sum.

7853. What is about the largest sum you recollect of?—About £12.

7854. Mr. Shand.—Do you entertain questions about the paternity of illegitimate children?—I never had a question of that sort before me.

7855. And you never saw one raised in the Justice of Peace Court?—No.

7856. Mr. Orr Ewing.—What would you say is the expense of a case before the Justice of Peace Court?—I am not sure of the expense of the summons; but I observe that each litigant pays 6d.

7857. That is paid to the clerk of court?—Yes.

7858. Is it the practice in your court, that if a person comes forward and has not the 6d., the court decides and gives decree just as if he were not present?—I never saw that done.

7859. Are you aware whether that is the practice in any Justice of Peace Court?—I do not know any Justice of Peace Court except our own. I have no information as to the County Justice of Peace Courts, and anything I have said does not apply to them.

7860. Dr. Barclay.—Is it the fact that the defender, before he can be heard, must table 6d.?—No; the 6d. is paid when the decision is given.

7861. Does the Act not say, that a party appearing shall pay before he shall be heard?—I am speaking of the practice.

7862. Is there a certain sum paid for each witness examined?—I never saw that done.

7863. Mr. Orr Ewing.—If such a practice existed in the court, as that a poor person coming there without 6d. should have decree given against him as if he were absent, would you think it a bad practice?—I am not at all satisfied as to the system of fees. I don't know that it is a proper principle that the clerk should be paid by fees; and I think that in all cases the Justices should have the power to remit the fees when they think proper.

7864. The Lord Justice-General.—Do you award expenses to the successful party?—Generally.

7865. Can you tell what they amount to on an average?—The amount of expenses is very small. There are the fees, and the sixpences, and the taking out of the decree. I should think the expenses, as a general rule, would not exceed 5s.

7866. Are they as much as 5s.?—In some cases they are.

7867. Mr. Orr Ewing.—What hardship have you seen regarding fees which makes you opposed to them?

Josiah Livingstone.

—I cannot say that I ever saw any particular hardship. I never saw any person refused justice for want of paying the 6d.

7868. You have no reason for your desire to see the system of fees altered?—I never saw a miscarriage of justice on account of that.

7869. Mr. Harrison.—You find the practice is better than the law, and that the fee is not exacted when parties are not able to pay it?—I have often seen the parties unable to pay the fee.

7870. Dr. Barclay.—Where they are able to pay, is not the fee exacted?—Yes.

7871. The Chairman.—That fee is received by the clerk?—It is received by the crier of the court.

7872. The Lord Justice-General.—How many acting Justices are there in the Justice of Peace Court?—I am not able to say. We have about 100 Justices acting in the Licensing Courts for the city; but I should not think that more than a third of that number take their turn in the Justice of Peace Small Debt Court.

7873. But there are as many as a third of the 100 Justices who take their share of the business of the court?—I would not say that there is a third who take their share, but about a third occasionally sit.

7874. They take some share?—Yes.

7875. Mr. Murray.—Who selects the Justices who sit?—Practically it is the clerk of court.

7876. In what way?—The clerk of court sends me a note requesting me to sit as a Justice next Monday, if I can afford the time. If I am able to afford the time, I do so; and we make a sort of arrangement, that we shall continue sitting on Mondays for so long, or until we see cause to decline sitting longer.

7877. Mr. Baxter.—How often do you sit yourself?—I should think about eight or nine Mondays in the year.

7878. Mr. Murray.—Are you aware that there are many Justices who have never been asked to sit in that court?—I cannot say that of my own knowledge.

7879. Dr. Barclay.—You cannot say whether the clerk takes them by rotation?—I cannot say.

7880. Mr. Paterson.—Are you aware of any who decline to sit?—I never heard of any who refused to sit. Excuses are made; but I never heard of any who definitely refused to sit as Justices.

7881. I suppose there must be a great number who don't sit at all?—The clerk of court has a very general acquaintance with the Justices, and he knows who are able to attend; and I should think he has a good idea of who will be most likely to make good and efficient Justices in his court. I may mention that the clerk has sometimes told me, that the lawyers make of all Justices the very worst in the Small Debt Court.

7882. Mr. Gordon.—May that not be because they don't so much require to lean upon the clerk for advice?—I don't think so.

7883. Mr. Paterson.—My question was, whether, according to any plan of management on the part of the clerk, it is the fact or not that a great many of the Justices don't sit in the Small Debt Court?—It is perfectly evident that a great majority of the Justices do not sit in the Small Debt Court; but I should say that, on the whole, that is a matter of congratulation; because it is not every Justice who is qualified to sit there. But in order to make the court very efficient, the Justices themselves ought to arrange who is to take the turn of duty.

7884. The Chairman.—You think they should distribute their duties, and appoint a certain number of themselves to take the small debt part of it. Is that what you mean?—Yes.

7885. What are the other duties which you perform, besides sitting in the Small Debt Court? Do you sit in regard to other matters?—Only in the court of review for granting licences.

7886. Reviewing the judgment of the magistrates granting or refusing licences?—Exactly.

7887. Dr. Barclay.—That is in Quarter Sessions?—Yes; and granting licences for theatres.

7888. The Lord Justice-General.—In Petty Sessions?—Yes.

7889. Dr. Barclay.—And in Quarter Sessions too?—Yes.

7890. The Chairman.—In regard to the review of the acts of the magistrates in granting licences, does a good deal of business come before the Quarter Sessions?—Generally it occupies one whole day each half-year.

7891. Mr. Orr Ewing.—How many cases are there?—The number varies very much. I have seen a large number of cases, and I have seen very few indeed.

7892. The Chairman.—Do you approve of the appellate courts?—That is not a matter on which I came here to speak. What I intended to give evidence about was the Small Debt Court.

7893. You have not considered the other matter?—I have often considered it, but it is a very large question.

7894. And you would rather avoid giving an opinion about it?—Yes.

7895. Dr. Barclay.—In the Small Debt Court, are there not cases continued from a previous sederunt, and which you continue to another sederunt?—Very frequently.

7896. Don't you find it difficult to take up a case which has been heard once before the other Justices, without any record having been made by these Justices?—I never felt that.

7897. How do you gather the facts?—I depend entirely on my memory.

7898. But I am supposing that two Justices have heard a case, and left it to other Justices for adjudication?—I consider it the duty of a Justice who begins a case to attend and finish it.

7899. Do they do so?—I have always done so; and I never found a case continued from a previous day, where there was not a Justice on the bench who had been there the previous day.

7900. Mr. Harrison.—If such a thing takes place, I suppose there would be a re-hearing?—I never met with a case where it was necessary to have a re-hearing.

7901. The Chairman.—The business of that court, so far as regards its small debt jurisdiction, is, so far as you are able to judge, satisfactory?—I think it commends itself to the people in general, and it is the means of doing considerable good. There is one point which I think it my duty to mention. I have very often thought that the Justice of Peace Court, with proper Justices, might have its jurisdiction very considerably extended in mercantile cases. I think that, were certain Justices to be designated by such bodies as the Town Council, the Chamber of Commerce, and the Merchant Company, many merchants and tradesmen who would not bring their cases before the Sheriff Court or the Court of Session, would very gladly avail themselves of that court, and that it might be of considerable use to the mercantile community.

7902. Mr. Shand.—Do you contemplate a court before whom agents and counsel should practise, or a court for the parties alone?—My idea is that it should be for the parties alone, on the very same principle as the Small Debt Court.

7903. You mean a court of the nature of arbitration?—Of course it would come practically to that.

7904. Mr. Orr Ewing.—But with a power of appeal?—I don't think that would be necessary. I think the public would be quite satisfied without it.

7905. To what amount would you extend that?—To almost any amount.

7906. Mr. Murray.—But you would make the consent of both parties necessary to going before that court?—That is a difficulty which I am not able to see my way through. If it could be arranged, I am persuaded that it would be found a most useful court.

7907. The Chairman.—Would you confine it to mercantile cases?—Yes.

7908. How would you define mercantile cases?—I think the term expresses what it means—a dispute between two men in business regarding a matter of business, in regard to which they had been transacting.

7909. Mercantile transactions?—Yes.

7910. Mr. Shand.—Is not a tribunal of that kind at present open to the public, by the choice by two merchants of two of their own number, if any question arises?—Not practically. We understand that a clause in a contract of arbitration is not operative if either party objects to it, and brings the case before the court.

7911. This is a tribunal which you desire to have established, to be resorted to even if both parties do not consent?—That is a difficulty that I don't see my way through; but I would give that court what an arbitration has not, and that is, the effect of a legal decision.

7912. Mr. Orr Ewing.—The expense of drawing up a deed of arbitration would be saved in that way?—My experience of arbitration is, that it takes fully longer time, and fully greater expense, than going before the court, and is very much more unsatisfactory at the end of it. Josiah Livingstone.

7913. The Chairman.—If parties, by contract, agree to arbitration, it cannot be enforced unless they name the arbiters; but suppose they merely agreed to arbitrate, would it be part of your plan that they should be enabled to go before the court you suggest?—That would partly meet my idea—that where a contract specified arbitration, that should be the court in mercantile cases.

7914. Mr. Harrison.—But if both parties are agreeable, do you think the powers of that court might be extended so as to take in any sum, and decide as a court of arbitration?—Yes, in mercantile cases.

A. B. SHAND, Esq.
T. GRAHAM MURRAY, Esq.
JAMES WEBSTER, Esq.
J. B. BAXTER, Esq.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD COLONSAY IN THE CHAIR.

GEORGE WEBSTER, Esq., examined. George Webster.

7915. The Chairman.—You are Sheriff-clerk of the county of Forfar?—I am.

7916. How long have you been so?—Since 1854.

7917. You reside in the county of Forfar?—I do.

7918. There are two places in the county of Forfar at which Sheriff Courts are held—Forfar and Dundee?—Yes.

7919. You are Sheriff-clerk of the whole county?—Yes.

7920. Both courts are under you?—Yes.

7921. Is there much business transacted at Forfar?—Yes; the district is nearly as important as that of Dundee. By the census of 1861, its population was about 100,000, and Dundee about 104,000. Dundee has a larger town population; but Forfar has also a large town population in Montrose, Arbroath, Brechin, Kirriemuir, and Forfar town,—in all, nearly 60,000 of town population: this brings a very considerable amount of business to Forfar.

7922. Not so much as there is at Dundee?—No; there is not so much judicial business, but there is a good deal of business otherwise.

7923. Business falling under your department as Sheriff-clerk?—Yes.

7924. What is the nature of that other business?—The registers of deeds recorded in the Sheriff Court books, the register of entail vouchers, curatorial inventories, Fiars Courts, and such like general matters, are all kept there.

7925. Are these in your custody?—Yes.

7926. I believe the county meetings are held at Forfar?—The county meetings, Fiars Courts, etc., are all held at Forfar.

7927. It is the county town?—It is.

7928. How are you represented at Dundee?—I have a deputy there, and clerks. I have also a deputy and clerks at Forfar.

7929. Do you do any of the duty in person?—Yes, I do.

7930. At Forfar?—Both at Forfar and at Dundee. I go occasionally to Dundee, and very frequently, indeed generally, when the Sheriff is there. I have no employment whatever, except my duties as Sheriff-clerk.

7931. Are there any fees exacted in the Sheriff Court of Forfar?—Yes.

7932. And they are accounted for to the public?—They are accounted for, by me, to Exchequer once a quarter. They are paid into bank once a week, and they are accounted for every quarter, or as soon after the end of the quarter as I can get the accounts made up, showing a classified return of the fees.

7933. Have you the means of stating precisely or by approximation the amount of the fees paid annually into Exchequer from your county?—Yes. For the year ending 31st December 1868, the fees were—for Forfar, general fees, £457, 14s. 1d.; lunacy fees, £11, 15s.; total, £469, 9s. 1d.;—for Dundee, general fees, £604, 5s. 1d.; lunacy fees, £11, 5s.; total, £615, 10s. 1d.; making for both districts the sum of £1084, 19s. 2d.

7934. How are you remunerated?—I am remunerated by a fixed sum. As Sheriff-clerk I get £1200 a year; but out of that I have to pay for two establishments, deputies and clerks, stationery, and every other expense connected with my office, including any expenses incurred in consequence of alterations made; for example, the Debts Recovery Act brought on me an expense of upwards of £30 for books, and that comes out of my pocket.

7935. Are you provided with office-room?—I am.

7936. In both places?—In both places.

7937. Free of rent?—Yes.

7938. How many persons are employed in your establishment at Forfar?—I have a deputy and five clerks. At present I have six clerks there. I have employed an additional clerk, in consequence of having had to prepare a return for this Commission; but that is a mere temporary arrangement.

7939. That is a temporary demand which comes upon you every now and then?—Yes, very frequently.

7940. When returns are moved for in the House of Commons?—Yes. I may state that the items of my fees are very numerous. As near as I can calculate, there are in the two establishments between 14,000 and 15,000 items of fees collected annually, varying from 3d. to 3s. 6d.

7941. These are collected and paid over?—Yes; and entered in the books descriptive of the cause in which the fee was paid—the step of process, or occasion on which it was paid; and then these are classified in the return.

7942. These are all accounted for?—Yes; and these accounts go to Exchequer.

7943. What is the extent of your establishment at Dundee?—I have a deputy and six other persons there; and one of these, as is the case also in Forfar, is entirely for the use of the Procurator-fiscal.

7944. That is for criminal matters?—Yes.

7945. Do the costs of these establishments encroach much upon your salary?—Yes; when I accepted the office of Sheriff-clerk, I was told that I would have about £600 a year clear, but I found that did not turn out to be the case. It is very little more than £500. The expense is increasing every year, and all that increased expense comes out of my pocket. Besides my establishments at Forfar and Dundee, I have a deputy for the Small Debt and Debts Recovery Court at Brechin, another at Montrose, another at Arbroath, and another at Kirriemuir. I am specially authorized by statute to appoint deputies there, and they receive a salary from me; the arrangement being that they shall get one-half of the fees, while I have to pay the whole of the fees received at these places into Exchequer. Therefore the emoluments to the deputies at these places consist of one-half of the fees; and the more business that is done there the more I have to pay, which I think is a very vicious principle.

7946. Does it appear to you that the principle of contract between the Government and the Sheriff-clerk, by which they pay him a certain sum, and he provides the whole establishment, is a good system?—I think it a very bad system, because it brings upon me the desire to keep down the expenses of my office as far as possible—to the nearest point.

7947. Is that a vicious thing to do?—I think so, if it trench upon efficiency. It has a tendency to do that.

7948. It is a temptation to keep it at a starvation point?—Yes; a tendency.

7949. What would you suggest as a more equitable and efficient system of managing the duties of the office?—I think there should be a sufficient number of clerks allowed me, that their salaries should be fixed and paid as part of the establishment, as is done in the case of the Court of Session, I understand. I am the chief person, and I should have a certain clear sum. The clerks should be paid their fixed salaries, and should not be dependent altogether upon me for their remuneration, though under my control as to duties. The stationery and other items should also be provided for. I have to furnish notepaper and books for the judge; I have to furnish all the paper at the trials, pens and ink, and everything of that kind.

7950. You think the Government should attend to all these matters, they receiving the fees as at present?—I think so. At any rate, I think the principle of paying by contract, a bad one. It would be matter for consideration how the new system should be arranged.

7952. How long has that system of paying by contract been in operation?—It was authorized by Lord Murray's Court of Session Act in 1838. I think up to that time the Sheriff-clerks received all the fees for their own benefit. By that Act, power was given to the Treasury to give the Sheriff-clerks a fixed sum, and to receive all the fees; and I believe that is now the case in almost the whole of Scotland, except Lanarkshire and one or two other places, where the Sheriff-clerk did not choose to go into the arrangement. The arrangement, so far as Forfarshire is concerned, had been made with my predecessor, and when I came into office in 1854 I found the system in operation. I saw the calculation of the probable expenses, and it was then represented that there was £600 a year clear, but it has turned out a little below that.

7953. Before that Act of Parliament which you have alluded to, and when the Sheriff-clerk was paid by fees, were the fees regulated by the Sheriff or by the Court of Session, or were they regulated by Act of Parliament?—They were first regulated by Act of Sederunt 16th, and Act of Adjournal 21st March 1746, then by 6 Geo. IV. cap. 23, and lastly by the Act of 1838.

7954. Is the Act which you allude to the 1 and 2 Vict. cap. 119?—It is cap. 119, sec. 28.

7956. It would simplify the collection?—Very much; and it would be a great means of preventing fraud. Where so vast a number of small sums are collected in an office, the chief, who is responsible, is very much open to those under him, particularly the class of apprentices that are employed. The chief cannot be always in his office; neither can his deputy. A solicitor comes in with a paper, and pays 6d. The proper party to make the entry is not there, and an under clerk gets the particulars, which he ought to hand to the chief to be entered in the proper book. But this may be in the first instance omitted by mistake; and the clerk finds that he has got 6d. Altogether it is a bad system, and no audit of these accounts can be made without a great amount of labour—without going through every process and every book in the office. But if stamps were employed, the operation of cancelling the stamps would be done by the chief officer; and it has worked amazingly well in England, and is largely acted on there, to the admitted convenience of all parties. I would diminish the number of items of fees, and substitute fewer and larger fees to be paid at different cardinal points of a case; I would have a different distribution of them, so as to get a sufficient sum out of the whole fees. I think the present system had its origin in the Sheriff-clerk having an interest in the fees; and every opportunity was taken advantage of, for transferring something into his pocket at every little step of process,—occasions which might be passed over,—and a few fees put on at cardinal points, which would raise the necessary sum; and perhaps, to some extent, these should be in proportion to the value of the case.

7957. Do you think that the present division of the county of Forfar for Sheriff Court purposes is a good one—I mean having one court at Forfar, and another court at Dundee? Or what do you think of the suggestion which has been made to the Commissioners, that a Sheriff Court should be held at Montrose, comprehending Arbroath and Brechin, and other parts of the county, rather than at Forfar?—Well, Montrose has some claim. It is a large community; and if justice is to be brought home to the doors of everybody, and expense is not to be considered, a court might be held there. The present system, I think, works very well; but thinking I might be asked something upon this subject, I procured a list of the small debt cases in the last four courts held at Montrose; and I find there were 30 small debt cases at one court, 22 in another, 19 in another, and 17 in another,—in all, 88 cases.

7958. Lord Barcaple.—At what intervals were these held?—Every alternate month—July, September, November 1868, and January 1869; and in all the 88 cases, the aggregate sued for was £363, 15s. 1d. Then in the Debts Recovery Court there were 8 cases, the aggregate sum being £189. I also got a return of the cases from the Montrose district, brought in the ordinary court at Forfar.

7959. The Chairman.—Which at present comprehends Montrose, Arbroath, and Brechin?—What I have stated as to the small debt and debts recovery business comprehends the Montrose district; and I find also from the Montrose district, during the year from 1st January 1868 to 1st January 1869, there were 18 cases called for the first time in the ordinary roll of the court at Forfar; and the aggregate sum sued for in these 18 cases was £2736. Of these, 1 was for £1588, and another for £518—making for 8 cases £638.

There were also 5 affiliation cases and 3 petitions—making up the number of 18. That is the amount of business during the last year done at Forfar from the Montrose district. The population of Montrose by the census of 1861 was 14,563.

7960. Would there be any greater convenience to the people of Arbroath and Brechin to be taken to the court at Montrose, than to go to the court at Forfar, as they now do?—Yes, certainly for Brechin; but then Arbroath has a much stronger case than Montrose for a separate court. It is a larger community, and has a great deal more business. Its population in 1861 was 17,593.

7961. The suggestion made to the Commissioners was that Arbroath and Brechin should be thrown into a district, the court for which should be held at Montrose; and I wanted to know from you whether it would be more convenient for them to go to Montrose than it is now to go to Forfar?—Oh, certainly not for the Arbroath parties.

7962. Then it would be no advantage to them?—None whatever to the Arbroath people.

7963. You think Forfar is more convenient?—I am quite sure of it, for the Arbroath suitors.

7964. Lord Barcaple.—You have a good court-room at Forfar?—Ground was broken last week for the building of a new one.

7965. The Chairman.—It is in course of erection?—Yes; it has been contracted for.

7967. The Chairman.—As I understand, you don't see any general advantage which would result from transferring the seat of the court from Forfar to Montrose?—Certainly not, because if you are to transfer the seat of the court, then all the district of Kirriemuir comes into play. You cannot dispense with a court at Forfar. If you are to give them a new court at Montrose, that is another matter.

7968. If you were to establish a separate Sheriff-substitute, with a court there, that would require additional officials, and the providing of court accommodation?—Yes, the Sheriff-clerk would require to be there. It would require a new establishment, which would probably cost more than the sums sued for. A court-house would have to be built.

7969. Mr. Adam.—Is there business at present existing to justify that?—You must draw your inference from the figures I have read. As far as I am concerned, I think Montrose is a much nicer town to live in; but unless, regardless of expense, it is desired to bring justice home to every man's door, I scarcely think the establishment of a court with a jurisdiction like the Sheriff's is required there.

7970. Mr. Baxter.—You have a depute at Forfar?—Yes.

7971. What salary do you pay him?—£110.

7972. If you were to do duty there, could you save that?—No; I could not do the manual clerking work.

7973. Why?—Because I cannot always be there; and, besides, I could not do the mechanical, detailed clerk's work which is required, and must be done by some one in the office.

7974. Why not?—It is impossible; and that it is so, must be plain to any one who knows anything of public departments. The principal never acts as a clerk merely.

7975. What do you pay your depute in Dundee?—£155 a year.

7976. I suppose the depute in Dundee conducts the whole business of the Sheriff's clerk?—He does the whole details, subject to my direction.

7977. You are not often in Dundee?—Yes; I have been latterly a good deal there.

7978. When the registrations were going on, but you are not often in Dundee?—No, not every day, nor every week; but I am in constant correspondence. There is never a point upon which I am not consulted.

7979. You are the Commissary-clerk?—I am.

7980. How are you paid as Commissary-clerk?—By fees.

7981. What is the amount of the fees of the Commissary-clerk in the year?—I think it is about £700.

7982. Have you any table of Commissary fees?—Yes.

7983. Have you got it with you?—No; but the fees were fixed by the Court of Session by Act of Sederunt a few years ago.

7984. Who extracts the judicial decreets in Dundee?—The Sheriff-clerk.

7985. Your deputy?—Yes.

7986. And he attends the Small Debt Court?—Yes.

7987. And the ordinary courts?—Yes.

7988. Do you ever go with the Sheriff to his Small Debt Courts in Forfar?—Yes.

7989. But not very often?—I almost always go with the Sheriff on his Small Debt Circuits and the Registration Courts, and attend him always at parliamentary elections.

7990. Was not Mr. Guthrie Smith Sheriff-substitute at Forfar for some years?—Yes.

7991. A statement has been made to us by him which I will read to you: 'I think one clerk should be appointed for each court, with a competent salary. The Sheriff-clerk may himself do the work, by giving personal attendance at his office where there is only one court; but where, as in Forfarshire, there are two, it is obvious that he cannot be in two places at the same time. At Dundee the depute-clerk has a salary of only £155, while the salary of the depute at Forfar is only £110. The entire expense of both the offices at Forfar and at Dundee must be under £600, and yet the principal clerk gets a salary of £1000 a year as Sheriff-clerk, and draws from £600 to £700 a year as Commissary-clerk. The country thus gives this gentleman close on £1200 a year for doing literally nothing, but dividing among those who do the work £600 of the public money.' Is that statement correct?—No, it is not correct that I do nothing. Mr. Smith does not and cannot know all that I do or advise upon. I think I do a good deal, and I think I am useful in the office I hold.

7992. What is it you do at Forfar?—I direct.

7993. You superintend?—I superintend. I am very often there. I am performing the duties of the office by depute, but I am present there often, and I have a residence within three miles, and I am pecuniarily responsible for what is done in both my establishments. Mr. Smith's plan might do if Dundee district were made a separate county.

7994. It is very painful to me to put these questions to you, but I do it from a sense of duty?—I have no difficulty in answering them. I make a return annually to Exchequer of all the salaries I pay as Sheriff-clerk, and of all the fees I receive as Commissary-clerk.

7995. Do the deeds recorded in your county go all to Forfar?—Yes.

7996. There is no record of deeds in Dundee?—None. I may explain that, soon after I was appointed, I found that deeds were taken in at the office at Dundee, and extracts were given out at Dundee as from the record at Forfar, and then the original deeds were sent on to Forfar to be recorded. It occurred to me that that was destroying altogether the authenticity of the record as bearing faith in judgment, because the extract given out was a statement that it was recorded in my books, which was not the case. I consulted Sheriff Logan, and by his authority a regulation was made that all the deeds, and everything that was to be recorded in the Sheriff Court books, should be transmitted to Forfar, and there recorded in the order in which they were given in.

7997. Who signs the extracts of the decrees?—My deputy; that is to say, he signs the bulk of them.

7998. Lord Barcaple.—Is there a separate staff for the Commissary-clerk's work?—No, the same gentlemen do it.

7999. Do they hold a separate deputation as Commissary-clerks?—Yes; my deputies at Dundee and Forfar hold separate deputations for Commissary business.

George Webster.

8000. And their work in that department is included in their salary?—Certainly.

8002. Is there any application to the Commissary?—Always. If it is left with us, there is a requisition for confirmation either in the letter or in the marking on the back of the deed by the agent when he gives it in. It is certainly never issued without a request either written or verbal.

8003. It proceeds in the name of the Commissary?—Yes. The whole business of the Commissary Office is done by the clerk. It is very rarely that the Commissary is applied to, except in cases that appear to me to be attended with difficulty. The business of the Commissary is in the main formal, but it involves very often very difficult cases; and I think my knowledge and my upbringing is brought to bear on these points with some useful results.

8004. Mr. Gordon.—Are there more duties performed by your clerks connected with the Sheriff Courts than with the Commissary Court department?—There are two commissariats—Dundee and Forfar; but the vast amount of the business is the Sheriff Court business.

8005. The Sheriff-clerk is not necessarily the Commissary-clerk?—Not necessarily.

8006. It is a separate office?—It is.

8007. But you happen to hold both?—Yes. I was first appointed Sheriff-clerk, and then a few years afterwards Commissary-clerk. These offices are joined in eleven counties—viz. Argyle, Bute, Fife, Forfar, Haddington, Kincardine, Kinross, Linlithgow, Peebles, Ross and Cromarty, Selkirk, and Wigtown; and they are separate in all the others. I think it would be right that they should always be combined, they are so much connected with one another. I know no reason for not combining them. I think it would be a great advantage.

8008. Mr. Adam.—Supposing there was to be a change of system, do you see any difficulty in the duties of the office being discharged by the principal clerk at the seat of each Sheriffship doing the duties in person, as suggested by Mr. Guthrie Smith?—That depends on the remuneration being such as to secure the services of a fit person. I don't think it would be prudent to put there an inferior man, without somebody over him.

8009. But an efficient person could do the work in person?—Of course, if he was efficient, he could do the work; but I don't think that arrangement would end in economy.

8010. Mr. Baxter.—I suppose you find your depute at Dundee a pretty efficient person?—Yes, I do; but I keep him right very often in general things. I think he is most excellent in his position, and that is the reason why I selected him. He was bred in my office at Forfar; and the depute at Forfar learnt the business for two years in my office before he was promoted to Forfar. It is a special business. It is not very interesting to do the details of it, but there are occasions on which the Sheriff-clerk principal is very useful; and from the nature of the office, he should be a responsible educated person, engaged in no other business.

8011. The Chairman.—You said that your previous training gave you an ability to give advice in some of those matters when a question of difficulty arose. I think you practised as a solicitor in London for some time, did you not?—Yes. I am a Writer to the Signet of 1821. I went to London soon after, and I remained in business there till 1854. I had the management of one of the largest businesses in London as a Scotch solicitor in appeals from the Court of Session, in Peerage cases, and also in railway bills. During all that time I had one of the largest businesses. And with reference to the Commissary business, I may say that in the course of it we had a vast amount of instances in which we had to take out probate in England, and I am well acquainted with the course of procedure there. There is one thing I should like to say while it occurs to me,—namely, that I think the custody of the records, and the regulations as to access to the records for inspection, are very defective in Scotland. Parties claim a right to come into my office, and for one shilling to get any of my record books, and sit down and copy from it for a whole day, doing so with pen and ink; so that, if they were fraudulently inclined, there is every opportunity. In England, if you go to the Court of Probate, you are not allowed to go near a record or original document with anything except a pencil. You are not allowed to copy anything, and there is always somebody present with you. That system is not at all observed in any record in Scotland that I have seen, and certainly not in my office.

8012. Lord Barcaple.—If parties in England want a copy, it is supplied by the office?—Yes, always. I was threatened with an action lately, because I would not allow a man to copy a will. I always say, if it is a poor case, I will give a copy; but this was a case in which I thought there was no reason whatever for not paying me fees as Commissary-clerk. However, I did give way, because it is rarely anything of that kind occurs; but they claim a right to come into my office, to have the record or the original deed, and copy from them without restraint of time or extent.

8013. The Chairman.—And not only to read, but to copy?—Yes. In England, parties are allowed to take, in pencil, the name of the executor, the date of the deed, and the amount for which the will is proved; but that is all they are entitled to get.

8014. Are they not entitled to take the names of parties benefited by the will?—No; they may read the will; but if they want to know the particulars, they must order a copy.

8015. But they may read the will?—Yes; and it depends on their memory what they can carry away. That was the practice in Doctors' Commons when I was in business in London, and is, I believe, so still. At any rate, I think it ought to be more stringent in Scotland than it is at present.

8016. Have you any other suggestions to make, either about the record or the duties of Sheriff-clerks, and the mode of regulating the payment of the fees?—We are required to keep a great many books. We are also required to make a great many returns. These books have been imposed on us from time to time, without considering the books we were then keeping; and returns are asked from us, which, if they had been made consistent with other returns, and our books had been framed and uniformly kept so as to show these particulars readily, might have saved us an immense amount of trouble. For instance, the Act for amending the law of hypothec requires us to keep a most detailed account of all applications for sequestrations, the names of the parties, the name of the farm, the rent, and all that sort of thing. We require to keep a somewhat similar return as to small debts. This applies to sequestrations of urban tenements as well. Now, if it was necessary to have that book at all, one book would have done. It was intended for public inspection; but there has never been an instance in which it has been looked at since the Act was passed.

8017. Do you mean that there is a separate book kept for urban tenements?—No; we have a book under the Small Debt Act, and a book under the Hypothec Act. As to the sequestration of urban tenements, in the clause in the Hypothec Act imposing on us the necessity of keeping the book, words seem to have been added, extending it to urban tenements.

8018. What would you suggest?—I would suggest that, in any revision of the law, these matters should be considered. In the first place, they should be uniform in all Sheriff Courts; and if statistics are to be required, they should be framed so that these could be easily obtained. They should be diminished in number as much as possible, and only those that are found to be useful kept up; because there is an immense amount of time required to fill up all these things, and it is labour apparently without any object, for they are never looked at.

8019. You mean that only those matters should be entered that are of use?—Yes; and where two similar books are kept, they should be combined, and made uniform.

8020. Does it not very much depend upon the motions that are made for returns in the House of Commons, or in the House of Lords, what it is that you are called upon to give?—Certainly.

8021. And that may not be in accordance with the books you keep?—No; but in the House of Commons or the House of Lords any person acquainted with the subject would say, on the part of the Government, 'There are no materials for giving such a return;' and any gentleman, told that upon good authority, would not press his motion for a return. But certain things could be obtained very easily, if we knew beforehand what would be required of us. For instance, the returns which I have laid before you from Montrose, were available from an alteration which I made some time ago in keeping the books. My deputy there says that he had no trouble in giving these returns, because of the order which I gave to note some particulars in the fee-book. Under the old system he would have had to look at every case, and would have found, very likely, that one half of them were not in our custody; and I may state that I think the system of borrowing processes is a very bad system, and is the occasion of a vast amount of delay. The record is taken out of the custody of the clerk of the court; and at this moment, when returns are asked from me for a certain year, I find that 25 per cent. of them are out of my custody—that is to say, the whole record is out of my custody, and all I have is the interlocutor sheet, which does not give the particulars wanted.

8022. These are current cases?—Yes; and the record is borrowed out of court. I have never been able to find what is the reason of this practice. The defender has, or ought to have, a copy of the pursuer's papers, and vice versa. The summons is served upon the defender. If he has a defence, why should he not be required to serve a copy upon the opposite agent?

8023. You are limiting that to the record, exclusive of the productions?—These are in a different category. I don't see why the system in England should not be adopted, that a man should keep his own evidence till the trial. Why should my evidence against a man be put into the hands of the clerk of court, and then borrowed up and put into the hands of my opponents?

8024. Mr. Webster.—Why not?—Because there is a door open to fraud and vitiation. It is not so in England.

8025. Is there not a wider door open to fraud by keeping up the documents till the last moment?—You don't keep them up. You give the opposite agent notice that you intend to produce at the trial such and such a document, which he may see and take a copy at your office, and he comes there. What he wants to see is, first, whether it is genuine; and if it is genuine, a copy is as good as the original. I judge only from Forfarshire, where we have large communities in Arbroath, Montrose, Brechin, and Kirriemuir; and constantly, when cases come on in court, it is found that the process is in Kirriemuir or Montrose, and often out of the jurisdiction of the Sheriff altogether, and the case is postponed.

8026. According to the system you propose, would you let a party use a document at the trial if he had not given notice that he had the document, and offered inspection of it?—Certainly not.

8027. Have you ever, in practice, known any fraud committed by the document passing from the custody of the one party to the custody of the other?—Certainly not.

8028. If you were to adopt the English system, would you require that not the solicitor only, but every one who was to speak to the document, should go to the agent's office and inspect it?—I take the English system, where a summons of inspection can be taken out; but it is quite consistent with my view that the judge should have the power, upon special application in a special case, to order the documents into court, and either to allow them to be inspected in the clerk's hands, or to be borrowed up under certain regulations. I think, in general, it is quite unnecessary to borrow them.

8029. Are you speaking of that from practical experience in the conducting of process business, or from your official position as clerk of court?—I am speaking from my official position; and I state this as a fact, in which the judge at Forfar will concur, that a great number of the cases are put off owing to the processes not being in the clerk's hands.

8030. You distinguish between the record and the documents?—With respect to the documents, they are not essential until the trial, if parties have previously had access to see them and learn their contents.

8031. You think that detailed accounts, or correspondence, or vouchers, are not necessary until the trial?—I don't know what use there is, of seeing the original of any writing more than once, if you are satisfied it is genuine; a copy is then as good as the original.

8032. Lord Barcaple.—Are there not a good many cases in your court where there is no parole proof led at all?—Yes.

8033. But the matter depends on statements, admissions, and documents?—Yes.

8034. How would you deal with the documents there?—The parties should have copies of them.

8035. The evidence must be the document itself—not the copy, unless it is admitted?—Certainly. If you have seen a document once, and it is genuine, the copy, if correct, is just as good as the original.

8036. Mr. Webster.—At what stage would you let the party see it, if the case is to be disposed of, without a formal proof?—Whenever a man brings a suit that is to go to trial, and whenever it comes into the clerk's hands, after trial it should remain there till it is returned to the party who produced it.

8037. The Chairman.—What do you mean by the expression after trial?—I mean when the case is decided by the judge.

8038. But what do you call trial?—After proof, or after decision.

8039. Suppose there is no parole proof in the case; but the case turns upon certain documents, and the parties have stated their case in written pleadings, they may require to look at the documents, and the documents must be laid before the judge. There is no trial in that case?—Of course the documents or copies should be before the judge, and there may be cases in which it would be proper to allow the documents to be borrowed; but I spoke principally of the record. These borrowings, in my opinion, occasion a great deal of delay and expense. I don't run into extremes; but I know that practically a great deal of delay and expense arise from the record being out of the custody of the court.

8040. And that, I suppose, arises a good deal from the negligence of the agents in not returning it when they ought to return it?—Certainly; there is a rule of court, that no case ought to go to the roll unless the process is in my hands the night before.

8041. That is not observed?—It is not; and for this reason, that it is not made imperative on me to refuse it. The agent brings the process at the last moment into court, and then the judge takes the case up. But in the great number of cases it is postponed for want of the process.

8042. Lord Barcaple.—You mean it is dropped because there is no process?—Yes, and there is a fine exigible; but it is not imperative, and agents do not press for it.

8043. The Chairman.—Have you any opinion upon the constitution of the Sheriff Court, as consisting of a Sheriff and his substitutes?—Yes. I think it a very good arrangement at present, subject perhaps to some modification, principally as to extending the area of the Sheriff's territory. I think the present system of a resident substitute, with an appeal from his judgment to a gentleman in actual practice before the Supreme Court, intermediate between that court and the resident judge, affords a very cheap and expeditious, and, so far as I know, a very satisfactory mode of getting the opinion of a second person trained to, and in the actual practice of the law as administered by the highest court, and in contact with the best legal minds of the time, aiding him with great advantage in the exercise of his judicial functions; and I think that is proved by the few advocations.

8044. But the number of advocations may be in some degree affected by the cost of litigation elsewhere?—Certainly.

8045. In cases of small amount, do you think the power of review by the Sheriff is expedient and useful?—Yes, and very expeditious, very cheap, and very useful.

8046. And satisfactory?—I think so.

8047. You think it desirable that the judgment of the resident Sheriff should be reviewed by a gentleman who is a practising lawyer in Edinburgh of some position?—Decidedly. I have a very strong opinion upon that.

8048. It is desirable that the gentleman reviewing the judgments should be attending the courts in Edinburgh?—Decidedly. I think that is a very great advantage, and I think upon very evident grounds.

8049. By enlarging the areas of the Sheriffs, do you mean grouping of counties?—Yes; carrying out the principle which was followed in the case of Linlithgow, and Elgin, and other counties, as occasion arises.

8050. You think that might be done to some extent?—Yes; I think the arrangements could be very easily made, keeping always in view the facilities of access which railways afford.

8051. And the amount of business to be done?—Yes.

8052. Do you think it would be inexpedient to make the district or group of counties so large as to preclude your getting the services of a gentleman who is in considerable practice at the bar?—Certainly. I think that should always be considered. I don't know that I have any right to say anything about emolument; but that would involve the increase of his emoluments. Indeed, I think both Sheriffs and Sheriff-substitutes, particularly of the larger counties like Forfar, are much underpaid; and I think a Sheriff, when he travels on the business of the public, should be paid his expenses, and that his inducement not to go to his district should not be affected except by the necessity of the case. Sheriffs now have a fixed salary, and they must pay their own expenses; I think that is a bad principle.

8053. Mr. Campbell.—In the case of a gentleman in extensive practice, his personal expenses must be exceedingly trifling compared with the sacrifice of fees which he makes in leaving Edinburgh?—That is so, to a certain extent.

8054. Are you aware that, in the case of gentlemen holding the office of Sheriff-depute in very extensive practice, it has been their object, by changes of Sheriffdoms to which they are appointed, to escape from large counties where important duties were to be discharged, and to take a small one at a smaller salary?—That I can easily understand.

8055. Mr. Baxter.—You are aware that the Sheriff-substitutes are generally taken from the bar?—I am. I think there are about fifteen who are not members of the bar.

8056. The record is made up before them?—Yes.

8057. And they take the proofs and see the witnesses?—Yes.

8058. And the Sheriff reviews the judgment of the substitute upon his notes of evidence?—Yes.

8059. Are you aware that that is considered by the profession generally in the country as a weak appeal?—Well, it is a necessity that the appeal judge can't see the witnesses, unless you confine the appeal judge to matters of law. There is a great disadvantage in the judge not seeing the witnesses; but that applies to all appeals.

8060. I was asking whether you know that it is the opinion of the profession, under the circumstances I mentioned, that the present court of appeal is a weak one?—No; I don't know that, nor do I think it necessarily weak if the notes are well taken.

8061. Do you know the opinion of the profession?—I know some are of that opinion. There is no unanimity on any subject now, that I know of.

8062. Do you know it is a general opinion?—No, I don't know that; but it may be. I have never met the opinion but I have tried to controvert it.

8063. Do you know that it is the opinion of the profession in Dundee and Forfar?—No; I don't think it is so much the opinion in Forfar. I believe in Dundee there is a large mass of opinion that that is a weak point, and I admit it is objectionable, and that the resident judge has a decided advantage in many respects from seeing the witnesses; but that can never be avoided as to oral evidence.

8064. Mr. Gordon.—It is in that respect that you say the appeal is objectionable, from the Sheriff not having seen the witnesses examined?—Yes. There is a certain class of cases in which that is so; but I don't think that is so in all.

8065. Mr. Baxter.—Do you know that it is the opinion of the profession, that it is an appeal from a judge well informed to a judge worse informed?—I don't profess to be a judge of that opinion as applicable to all cases, but in those I do know, the facts are against it most decidedly; and were it otherwise, it must be either accidental, or the fault of the person making the appointments, and not the system.

8066. Do you think that the proposition to strengthen the appeal by having two Sheriffs sitting like the Lords Justices in the Court of Chancery is a good one?—I think that is a very bad plan. In the first place, you must give these two judges larger salaries; and having two, you diminish by one-half the working power of appeal, because the two men will only do as much as one will do,—in point of getting through work, indeed less than one would do.

8067. But do you consider it a stronger court of appeal?—No, I don't think so, if by stronger is meant a better or more useful—more expeditious or cheaper.

8068. You don't think two minds are better than one?—I don't say that, but you are driven to one or three, because I don't see how two would work.

8069. You are aware that that is the constitution of the Lords Justices in Chancery?—I don't think we can compare our work in Sheriff Courts to that of the Lords Justices.

8070. But you know that to be so?—It is a new arrangement since I left business, but that would not change my opinion in reference to the Sheriff Courts, nor generally that only two judges sitting together is a good or a practical arrangement; and you must look to the class of cases with which you have to deal.

8071. Do you think that would strengthen the court of appeal?—It depends on the value put on the word 'strengthen.' If you mean to say it would diminish the expense or expedite the case, I will answer the question. I think it will add to the expense; and it will delay the cases, because, when two minds have to come to a conclusion on a subject, there is greater time taken where difference of opinion arises, than where one man has to act on his own responsibility. You increase the expenses of the judges, and you diminish by one-half the working power of appeal, while you also diminish by one-half the responsibility of the judge; and I don't know what you are to do, supposing the two judges agree that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute cannot stand, but don't agree as to what is to be done instead.

8072. Would not the judgment stand in that case?—Then the judgment stands, but the appeal judges disagree with it.

8073. Then it is two to one?—No, it is two against the judgment of the one Sheriff-substitute, and yet that judgment is to stand. Supposing they adhere to the Sheriff-substitute's judgment, then there are three judges agreeing. But the case I was putting is this: Where the two judges that have heard the case are both satisfied that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute cannot stand; but when they come to settle what is to be done instead, they find that they cannot agree upon that. I don't see how it would practically work. Suppose they come to Dundee, and hear a certain number of cases, they decide so many, and take so many to avizandum; they go on to Forfar and do the same thing there, and they go throughout their district. Suppose they reside in Edinburgh; they have so many cases before the two judges to decide, and just consider the delay that would occur from interchanging documents. It would be a long time before the decision could be known, and who is to have the custody of the records all that time? I look upon the present arrangement not as a regular authoritative appeal, but as offering the most convenient, cheap, and expeditious way of getting the opinion of a trained lawyer, qualified as I have before stated, upon a great number of unimportant cases, which are not fit for two judges such as are proposed. I think you may utilize the existing Sheriffs more as to work, and still keep them at the bar. For instance, I think Dumfries, Wigtown, Kirkcudbright, Selkirk, and Peebles would make a Sheriffship on a workable scale.

8074. Mr. Booth.—You have said that the appeals from Sheriffs-substitute to the Sheriff is very easy, expeditious, and cheap?—I am sure it is. It is certainly expeditious in our county; and that it is satisfactory, and at any rate ends most cases, is shown by the few advocations to the Court of Session.

8075. And I suppose most of the cases are appealed to the Sheriff?—No; but a good many are.

8077. The Chairman.—Do you think the jurisdiction of the Sheriff should be extended to any class of cases in which he has not jurisdiction now?—My opinion is that, as a principle, he should have jurisdiction in most civil cases; but there are some special cases which I have great doubts about. For instance, I think it most inexpedient to give a Sheriff jurisdiction in cases of divorce, though it is a great hardship on poor people that they cannot get a divorce. A divorce necessarily implies proof of the constitution of the marriage, and so you must give the Sheriff the power of deciding whether a man is married or not. It is not the same question as the question of giving aliment to a wife, because that does not affect the status; but when the court pronounces a decree of divorce, that necessarily implies that the marriage is proved. In divorce cases, the first thing which we proved in the House of Lords was the contraction of the marriage, and that had to be done before the bill could proceed beyond its first stage; and so in the Court of Session now, the marriage must first be proved. In Scotland the constitution of marriage is a much discussed subject, and the facilities now afforded for contracting marriages are much complained of; and if you increase the facilities for dissolving marriages, you will increase the evil.

8078. Then you would except cases of divorce?—Yes; and of the constitution of marriage.

8079. Would you give the Sheriff jurisdiction in declarators of legitimacy?—No; I think that is very nearly the same subject.

8080. Or declarators of bastardy?—I think not.

8081. In regard to the hardship upon poor people which is stated to exist, and which in your opinion does exist, that is consequent upon the expense of the process of divorce—that is the hardship?—I have no doubt of it.

8082. Do you think that would be avoided to any considerable degree by the proof in cases of divorce, instead of being taken in Edinburgh, being taken by a remit to the judge ordinary of the bounds where the parties are?—The objection that the judge who is to decide the case does not see the witnesses would then arise; but that would diminish the expense. In England there is no arrangement of that kind, and the jurisdiction in divorce has been confided by the Legislature there, to a separate court of high dignity.

8083. But do the poor people in England get the benefit of it?—No.

8084. Mr. Baxter.—Do you know of your own knowledge, that in many cases the expense of divorce operates as a bar to the remedy?—I have no doubt of it—cases in which the remedy ought to be given.

8085. Do you know many cases where a man has taken the law into his own hands, and lives in immorality and adultery?—I have no knowledge of that; but I think the Conjugal Rights Act, 1861, might be worked out in the Sheriff Court.

8086. The Chairman.—In regard to heritable estate, do you think the Sheriff should have jurisdiction in all questions of heritage?—Yes; but if you extend the jurisdiction to such cases, it might be right to put in a provision that either party might have it transferred to the Court of Session if they thought fit, putting a limit of value.

8087. But the choice being absolute to either party?—To either party.

8088. Mr. Baxter.—Of course the pursuer chooses his court when he raises the action?—Yes; but he may change his mind.

8089. So that the option would lie to the defender?—Practically, almost.

8090. The Chairman.—The pursuer might not expect that a certain formidable defence would be stated; and when he finds that stated, he might consider it desirable to have it disposed of by the Supreme Court?—Yes; but the option should be exercised at an early stage.

8091. Mr. Baxter.—And above a certain limit in value?—Yes.

8092. The Chairman.—In regard to pleadings and procedure, have you any suggestion to make?—I think the forms in the Sheriff Court Act of 1853 are very good; and if that Act had been carried out more strictly, we would have got rid of a good many of the complaints that have arisen. I think that there should be a simple writ, which might be in a short form, with a mere description of the claim, so as to identify it; the case would thus begin very simply, and a decree in absence would be procured very cheaply. Authority should also be given to the clerk of court to enter up judgment, if there is no appearance, without the intervention of the judge; but I think that, as much as possible, all cases of the same class, where it is a claim for payment of money, should be uniform. At present we have the ordinary form, the debts recovery form, and the small debt form. I think all these should be combined into one form; and in that respect, as well as in a great many others, all the existing Acts should be repealed and the provisions consolidated, so that we might read in one place all the regulations. It is impossible to overstate the great discrepancies and difficulties which we have in knowing what is meant, from the provisions being spread through the different Acts of Parliament.

8093. The Chairman.—In regard to procedure after the case comes into court, have you any suggestion to offer?—In the first place, I think something like what is done in the Debts Recovery Act as to making up the record should be adopted. I think the pleadings might be shortened in a great many cases, and greater precision and exactitude enforced.

8094. Mr. Campbell.—Do you think it would be of advantage that the pursuer should have a right of replication in a brief note?—I think so. One must be careful in following the English system, because the Sheriff Court is a court of equity as well as common law; and, therefore, if you take the common law forms, you are at sea when you come to an equitable case. But the common law procedure in the Sheriff Court should be assimilated to the common law procedure in England. These forms are very short and distinct. The description of the demand served on the defender should be short; just sufficient to identify the claim; with a right to the defender to demand particulars, without the intervention of the judge, and through the clerk of court. A great deal might be done in that way to diminish the expenses.

8095. The Chairman.—You think that, with a brief statement of replication by the pursuer, a more formal record might frequently be dispensed with?—I think so.

8096. There are various stages at which appeals from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff is allowed. Do you think that any of these might be dispensed with?—I think so. I think the right of appeal, in a great many instances which exist now, ought to be subject to the leave of the judge—I mean at certain stages of the case—the whole being before the appeal judge when it comes to him. When these changes are made, I think it will be necessary that a new table of costs for practitioners should be settled, because it would require to be made applicable to the new forms, so that a professional man is fairly remunerated. If you do away with a number of steps of process at which he has now a fee, you must give him something in substitution for that.

8097. Do you approve of the principle on which costs are regulated under the Debts Recovery Act?—Certainly not.

8098. You disapprove of it?—Most decidedly.

8099. The agent is paid by a slump sum?—Yes; 7s. 6d. for a demand of £25, and 10s. for any sum above that, in the case of decrees in absence. There is a clause in the Act enabling the Court of Session to alter the fees, but they can do so only in 'contested causes.' Somebody has put in that expression, I have no doubt, in the progress of the bill, and the meaning of it was not seen at the time. Therefore the Court of Session cannot alter the fees of 7s. 6d. and 10s.

8100. These are as to decrees in absence?—Yes; and your Lordship knows what has to be done for these fees. The solicitor has an interview with his client, who says, I want to pursue John Smith for £49, 19s. 9d. The first question is, Does the account come within the definition of causes allowed by the Debts Recovery Act? He has then to write a demand on the party for payment. Then he has to consider and find out whether that party is worth powder and shot. Next he has to see whether he can prove his case; and if he is satisfied of all that, he comes to my office and gets a form, which he fills up with the particulars of his demand, and puts it into the hands of an officer to summon the party. The summons is returned to the solicitor with an execution, and he has to see that that is properly done. Then he has to come to my office, and lodge it for enrolment for the next court day. He has then to come up on that day and ask judgment. And for that the statute allows him a fee of 7s. 6d.

8101. Do you think he should have a separate fee for each of those things which you have mentioned?—No; I don't mean to say that. I think you would find a guide in this matter in the procedure in the County Courts in England.

8102. How would you deal with a case of decree in absence? Would you not have the fee a slump sum?—Certainly not. I think each case ought to be judged of by what the solicitor does; and it is not only provided that he can charge only the fees allowed by the Act, but it is illegal to take more from his employer. I object to that as a principle.

8103. Then what do you suggest about it?—I think there should be a new table of fees.

8104. I am talking of decrees in absence?—I don't see any objection to an increase of the sum upon a just principle, removing the illegality of taking more from the solicitor's own employer, if he chooses to give it. I don't see why the sum should not be fixed against the defender.

8105. Then it would be a slump sum against the defender still?—It might be; but I don't think that is a right way of remunerating a professional man.

8106. Mr. Baxter.—You would pay him according to the work done?—Yes.

8107. The Chairman.—As to the privileges of agents, do you think there would be any advantage in allowing the practitioners of one Sheriff Court to practise in another Sheriff Court as matter of right?—At present there is nothing to hinder a practitioner in one county from being admitted to the courts of another.

8108. Do you think that an entrance examination by a general body of examiners should be sufficient to qualify a person to practise in any of the Sheriff Courts?—I think so. I believe this question really means, whether the country practitioner is to share in the business conducted in the Court of Session.

8110. If he wished to go to another county to practise, would you require that he should undergo any examination, or any process of admission, in that county?—I would be very sorry that the judge of the local court parted with the control over the practitioners in his court; and I think he should have the power of regulating the admission. If he is admitted as a procurator, and has done nothing in the other county to disqualify him, I think he should be admitted without examination of a professional kind; but I don't think that would be acted on in many cases.

8111. Mr. Campbell.—You think it would be desirable that the Sheriff should maintain his discipline over his own court unimpaired?—Yes; and it has occurred to me, whether the Sheriff has a power of striking a man off the roll now. I think it must be done by the court above; but I think the Sheriff ought to have power over the practitioners in his court, the same as exists in England.

8112. The Chairman.—Are there any other matters which you would like to suggest?—I understand it is very much desired that country agents should be admitted to the Court of Session, one of the consequences being that they would then be entitled to be in partnership with the Edinburgh agent as to the costs in the particular cases; and that is founded on the practice in England, where the country practitioners are all admitted to the Supreme Court. The practice there is to divide the profit in every case from the beginning; but that is not a parallel case to the country practitioners in Scotland, because a country practitioner in Scotland has the conduct of the case up to the time that it comes into the Court of Session; and on the assumption that the remuneration of the Edinburgh agent is appropriate to the duties done, I think it is very unjust that he should be called on to contribute to another who did not do any of the work. I know that that principle was discussed in London, between the London solicitor in appeals, and the Edinburgh agent; and I had an opportunity of consulting one of the highest authorities on that very point, and he said: If I find you or any of the solicitors contributing a share of your profit to the Edinburgh agents, who are not practitioners here, I would deal very severely with them. I think it is a vicious principle, and it is not in the interests of the client at all, but the contrary.

8113. In England, the solicitors are all admitted in the Supreme Court?—They are all admitted in the Supreme Court, and they then go to reside in different localities; and they send up a case to the London solicitor, and share in the profits from the beginning. The propriety of that is very much questioned, but it is quite legal. I understand that where it is in a different court, it has never been considered legal that the practitioner of the one court should share with the other.

8114. There are litigations before the County Courts, and in these litigations the London partner participates?—I don't know how that is now; but I don't think that there is a separate body of attorneys for County Courts.

8115. Have you anything to say in regard to criminal matters?—Yes; I think the system of taking the declaration of prisoners should be abolished. A prisoner is brought up into a private room, in presence of the judge who is to try the case, and the Procurator-fiscal; and he is told that he is to be asked questions, having been previously warned that he is not bound to say anything; but that if he does say anything, it will be taken down and used against him at his trial. I think that is an objectionable thing under any circumstances. But I think it is very objectionable that the judge who is to try the case should have anything to do with this proceeding, or with the getting up of it. The same judge may be a party to the precognitions, and he then comes to try the criminal.

8116. Do you think that is productive of evil?—I can't say that it is. It has been very leniently and fairly administered; but if it had been otherwise, there would have been an explosion long ago.

8117. That has been the state of matters from time immemorial?—Yes; it has, in Scotland.

8118. Mr. Baxter.—Does it not occur to you that it gives a prisoner an opportunity of making an explanation, if he has any to offer?—But that opportunity could be given him in a different way. The Procurator-fiscal is engaged in inquiring what evidence exists against a man for having committed a certain crime. He judges of that, and he applies to the judge to have him committed for trial. I would give the prisoner an opportunity of making his statement after he had seen his agent, or at any time before trial, to the Fiscal. He could send the Fiscal a written statement, and that statement should be printed with the indictment, and not, as at present, his declaration only used if the Procurator-fiscal thinks fit. Or he might be entitled to be brought up, and make his statement in court publicly before trial. I think the principle of the private examination of the accused party is objectionable, particularly when it is done by the judge who is ultimately to try him. I think the judge who is to try a prisoner should not know anything about his case till he, the judge, is on the bench and the prisoner is at the bar.

8119. Is it not the practice to read the charge, and ask if he has any explanation to give?—Yes. It is most fairly administered; in our county particularly so; but I think the thing is wrong.

8120. The Chairman.—You think it is wrong in principle?—Yes. I also think it is wrong in principle to charge previous conviction in aggravation in the indictment, and send that to the jury. I think the previous conviction should be proved after the verdict, and merely considered by the judge with reference to the extent of the punishment.

8121. You spoke of printing the prisoner's declaration with the indictment. Would you print whatever statement the prisoner chose to make?—Not necessarily; I think there should be a discretion in the judge in that respect.

8122. The prisoner might accuse parties who were not guilty; you would not print that, would you?—No; there must be a certain discretion somewhere, in case the prisoner made use of it for improper purposes.

8123. Do you think the prisoner ought to be allowed to insist on the reading of his declaration at the trial, striking out such parts as I have alluded to?—Yes; and if the declaration contained irrelevant matter, it should be struck out.

8124. But if the prisoner is not to be questioned at his examination, but allowed to make what statement he likes, and if he is entitled to call for that at the trial, and to have it read, is not that practically allowing him to be a witness for himself without cross-examination?—It is, certainly, but I don't know why that should not be. He might be allowed to make the statement, and at present he makes it very often through his counsel.

8125. Have you any other observations to make?—The question as to having jury trials in the Sheriff Court has been much discussed, but I don't think that would work at all. I don't think that a jury is the best tribunal for trying all sorts of cases, and certainly not the most of the kind of cases that we have in the Sheriff Court.

8126. Mr. Campbell.—Have you considered whether it might not be expedient to give the Sheriff a power of inflicting sentences of penal servitude?—I think there is no objection to that. I think his power of punishment might be extended.

8127. Do you think that in that view it might be proper that he should try certain cases of robbery?—I don't see why he should not, but I speak with great deference on that subject.

8128. The Chairman.—Have you any further suggestion?—There is a question as to whether the judge should reserve an appeal in criminal cases. I don't know whether it might not be proper to allow the Sheriff-substitute to reserve a point at the trial for the opinion of the Sheriff. There is another matter which I should like to mention. New duties are being put on the Sheriff-clerks. For example, under the Lunacy Act we take fees for the work done; but these fees, instead of being remitted with my fees to Exchequer, and thereby enhancing my position as a productive officer, have to be remitted direct to the Lunacy Board, and they go to diminish the apparent expense of their establishment. That was done last session. I am also required to remit all the fees which I receive under the Writs Registration Act to the Lord Clerk Register. That occasions me a great deal of trouble, and it seems very unnecessary for the public interest. It would be far better as a principle, that all the fees which I receive in every department should go direct to Exchequer, instead of requiring me to remit this class of fees to the Lunacy Board, and that class of fees to the Lord Clerk Register, thereby confusing the accounts, because there is no audit of my accounts. I think that all the fees which I receive as Sheriff-clerk should go direct to Exchequer in one account.

8129. Would you classify your account, to show how much was derived from one source, and how much from another?—Certainly. We classify all the fees that we remit to Exchequer.

8130. And you would classify so much as appertaining to the Lunacy Board, and so much as appertaining to the Lord Clerk Register?—Yes.

8131. And the Exchequer would distribute it?—It would go in as a receipt from my office for duties done.

8132. If you had to state your account classified in that way, what saving would there be of trouble to you?—One letter, in the first place, would do. I would only communicate with one department. But I think it is wrong in principle, that all the fees that I receive should not go in with my general account.

8133. But they are destined for a different purpose; and it makes one direct application of them by you sending them to the party who is to get them?—That only applies to diminish the estimate for the Lunacy Board.

8134. It shows how far the Lunacy Board is self-supporting, and how far the registration of writs is self-supporting?—Yes, but the work is done by me.

8135. But the fees are derived from the work applicable to these departments?—Suppose I wanted to go to the Treasury and say I wanted an additional clerk, they would say, You are not productive, your fees only show £1200.

8136. But you could say to the Treasury that you remit fees to the Lunacy Board and to the Lord Clerk Register?—No doubt.

8137. Mr. Gordon.—What Act of Parliament do you refer to?—All the warrants for the committal of lunatics in Forfarshire go through my office; the medical certificates are all examined, and they then go to the Sheriff for examination and signature, and I am entitled to a fee as Sheriff-clerk for that. All that is done by me as Sheriff-clerk, and I don't see why the fees should not go in with my other fees.

8138. Mr. Booth.—If the fees were collected in stamps, do you consider you would be able to present an equally clear account with as little trouble?—Much clearer. If the number of fees taken by me were small, it would be easy to put upon me the duty of keeping an account of the stamps that I cancelled. At any rate, it would be possible by an indicative mark on the stamp itself, by marking Forfarshire on it.

8139. You would not have the two systems going on at the same time?—No.

8140. If you took to the stamp system, you would give up taking fees in money altogether?—Yes; and I think the words of the Act of last session are broad enough for that.

8141. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestion?—There is a very important matter as to the making up of the jury list. I think it is very necessary that a new mode of making up the jury list should be introduced, and that the qualification should be more definite and simple. With the valuation of property which we now have throughout Scotland, it would be very easy to combine with the duties of the assessor the obligation to return the names of those qualified to act as jurymen in point of residence and the occupation of property. With the new mode of citing juries we have great inconvenience in Dundee, arising from the imperfection of our lists.

8142. You would have the assessor return to you a list of persons assessed at a certain value of property?—Yes; and it might be, also the exemptions in point of age, and other exemptions.

8143. How would the assessor ascertain that?—He sends schedules to everybody now, and they are obliged to make returns. It would only be asking them to add their age and their qualification, and whether they claim exemption as jurymen. I think it would be possible to combine that with the valuation return.

8144. Mr Gordon.—The assessor's returns only relate to real property?—Yes.

8145. Jurors are qualified also with reference to personal property?—Yes, but I think it would be expedient to make some limit as to the occupation value, both as to special and common jurymen.

8146. At present the jury lists are made up by the Sheriff-clerk?—Yes; special jurors £1000, and common jurors £200. They are made up by employing other people, and that is paid for by Exchequer.

8147. But the Sheriff-clerk conducts them?—We keep the jury list.

8149. Mr. Webster.—What mode do you take of ascertaining who are qualified to be on the list?—We select a man who has a general knowledge of the town, and the last man we selected was one of our own officers in Dundee. In the country the work is generally done by the parish schoolmaster.

8150. If you were to lay the duty on the assessors of landed property, how would you deal with those who are not qualified by means of landed property? Would you not require the same sort of staff to take up a list of these parties?—No; I think they would be included as resident occupiers; and I propose to alter the qualifications of jurymen, which are now fixed by the Act 6 Geo. IV. cap. 22.

8151. Would you exclude all who had not a landed qualification?—I said occupation, and there is no man who does not live somewhere. If a man is the owner of property, and does not live in the county, he is not liable to serve as a juryman.

8152. Mr. Murray.—Supposing two or three brothers live together, one of them being proprietor of the house?—There may be difficulties of that kind, but they arise just as much now.

8153. Mr. Webster.—What I want you to explain is the mode by which you propose to get a list of all the qualified jurors?—The assessor, by himself or the people employed by him, knows the occupiers of all premises within the county and burghs, and the rents of them. I do not think there practically would be any difficulty.

8154. Then you would relieve the Sheriff-clerk of the duty?—No, not at all. I want a simpler, cheaper, and more certain mode of getting at the jurymen.

8155. Mr. Gordon.—You are the person who has the charge of making up the list at present?—Yes.

8156. And you are responsible for its general accuracy?—Yes; but I am authorized by Exchequer to pay the persons who take up the list 7s. 6d. a day, and I don't think that is adequate, and I don't think the system or mode a good one.

8157. The Chairman.—You wish a better machinery for taking up the list and sending it to you?—Yes, and I would still, as at present, be responsible for the management of it as to particular trials, and seeing that it was efficient; but a great many people escape by the present system who would not escape by the other system.

8158. Mr. Murray.—If you take proprietorship or occupancy as the sole test of a juryman, a number would escape?—I don't see that; but I don't propose proprietorship, but occupancy of a certain value, for a common juror, and a higher for a special juror.

8159. What would happen in the case of a man living with his mother, she being the proprietor of the property, or in the case of two or three brothers living together?—In England everybody is asked to return the number of persons living in his house who are qualified to act as jurymen, and he would be subject to penalties if he did not do so.

8160. That is, if you take certain machinery?—I would be prepared to devise machinery to do it. All I mean to say is, that the present mode is not a good mode, and the other mode I think would be more efficient. It would be done by an officer, who is for other purposes going all through the county.

8161. You would lay an additional duty on him?—Yes, which he could discharge cheaper and better than the present system.

8162. Lord Barcaple.—Can you tell us what are the main grounds upon which persons do escape now, who should serve as jurymen?—I don't think that applies to the country, but in towns, it is owing to the inefficiency of the people we employ to take up the lists. In the very last case of making up the roll, I ascertained when we were acting on it, that it was so imperfect that I immediately wrote to stop the payment of the man's allowance for it.

8163. Did you find that there were any particular classes of persons who were omitted?—No; it was just a general inaccuracy, putting in people who had left the place.

8164. But I am asking about people who were not put in, who should have been there—people who had escaped?—I think it was entirely a mistake on his part.

8165. Are there any particular classes of persons whose names you miss on the roll?—I don't think so. It is quite open to leave out a man if an improper person is employed to make up the roll, and that is the reason why I think it should be done on the responsibility of a public functionary. I must do it through others.

8166. Mr. Murray.—Is not the Sheriff-clerk the functionary charged with the duty?—Yes, for the Sheriff; and being so, I think there is a better mode of getting the information than I am obliged to use. I think what I propose would save the public money,—for, as I have said, Exchequer pays the expense,—and we should have a more correct and efficient list.

8167. When a roll is made up, how long will it last before you exhaust it?—Two or three years; but it depends on the number of cases. We delayed making up our last roll in consequence of its being understood that the present Lord Advocate intended bringing in a bill with the view of regulating the qualification of jurors. We continued that last roll three or four years, and began the present roll last year.

8168. Lord Barcaple.—Will the provision of the Act of last session, repealing all exemptions of jurymen depending on any Act of Parliament passed since 6 Geo. IV. cap. 22, make a great difference in your county?—I cannot say.

8169. You have not the means of saying yet whether it will make a large difference or not?—No.

8170. The Chairman.—It will make a greater difference as to special jurors?—Yes.

8171. From your former experience, has your attention been directed to the comparative cost of litigation in the two ends of the island?—I think they are much larger in the southern portion than in the northern. I have no doubt of that, not in the least, looking at the bills of costs in the Sheriff Court. I see that they are certainly not like the bills of costs that I used to see in the south.

8172. Mr. Booth.—Do you think there is as large an amount of litigation in the north, in proportion to the population?—It varies with localities. I cannot give an opinion as to that.

8173. Mr. Murray.—Do the Sheriff Courts give satisfaction?—I think the Sheriff Court an admirable institution; and in judging of them, we should not compare them with the County Courts in England.

8174. The Chairman.—Why?—The Sheriff Courts ought not to be compared with the County Courts of England, because the County Courts are limited in their jurisdiction, and try merely a simple class of cases. I should wish further to suggest that I think no warrant for arrestment should be granted before final decree; at any rate, no general warrant, but only of a particular fund on cause shown ex parte to the judge; arrestment on dependence is often oppressively used, and without adequate remedy.

KENMURE MAITLAND, Esq., examined.

8175. You are Sheriff-clerk of Edinburgh?—I am.

8176. How long have you been so?—Since 1859.

8177. How many assistants have you in your office?—In the office in Edinburgh I have eleven clerks, two of whom are deputes. I have also a depute at Leith, and one at Dalkeith.

8178. Is the system of payment of the office you hold one of payment by salary?—By salary.

8179. And do you provide the staff for carrying it on, and pay that out of your salary?—I do.

8180. That is the system?—Yes. There is a salary of £2000 a year, out of which I have to provide the salaries of the clerks, the office expenditure in the shape of stationery, printing, etc.

8181. Do you pay office rent?—Not now at Edinburgh—not since the building of the new Sheriff Court-house. I had to pay office rent before.

8182. At Leith and Dalkeith is an office provided?—At Leith the office rent is paid by me. At Dalkeith, which is a Circuit Small Debt Court merely, and the expense of which was not taken into account at the time of calculating the salary, the rent of a court-room is paid by Exchequer; but it is only £3 or £4 a year.

8183. Mr. Murray.—Out of the £2000 are you not obliged to expend a certain amount on clerks?—At the time the salary of £2000 was fixed, it was calculated that £1100 a year was required for clerks, and that the office expenditure in respect of stationery, printing, etc., was £200 a year; so as to leave the Sheriff-clerk an allowance of £700 a year for himself.

8184. Do the Exchequer call on you to show that you have paid £1100 for clerks?—No; they do not.

8185. So that, if you could conduct the business of the office for a smaller amount, your own emolument would be so much the larger?—Yes; but just now, and for some years, I have paid more than £1100 for clerks. I see, on looking back, that it was the custom to make a return of the salaries paid to the Exchequer; but I have not made any return for some years, and I have not been asked to do it.

8186. Then it is a sort of contract between you and the Exchequer to do the whole work for £2000 a year?—Yes.

Kenmure Maitland.

8187. You draw certain fees, which you account for to Exchequer?—I account for all fees to Exchequer, with the exception of certain fees accounted for to the Board of Lunacy.

8188. Can you give us any general statement as to the amount of the fees?—I make a sworn return quarterly.

8189. What may they amount to in a year?—I think the fees are about £1200 a year. The amount is rather increasing now, but it fell off for some time.

8190. Do you think the system of payment by contract is a good one—beneficial to the public and to the office?—I would rather have a fixed sum, and that the clerks were paid by Government. I find my office expenditure increasing yearly; and there are disadvantages in the system of my having the clerks to pay. I may state an example of this. If a clerk has been in the office a long time, and has grown old, he has no claim on any one except me for a retiring allowance. If I discharge him, I must throw him on the world, or give him a pension out of my own pocket; and as these are men who have been working in the public service all their lives, I think it a hard case that they should be thrown on the world in that way.

8191. Mr. Webster.—The longer a clerk remains with you, and becomes efficient, you feel he is entitled to a larger salary?—Yes.

8192. And that has to come out of your own pocket?—Yes.

8193. Mr. Murray.—At present the clerks are all appointed by you?—Yes.

8194. If they were paid by Government, Government would expect to appoint them?—It would be questionable how that would work.

8195. Do you see any practical difficulty in working the establishment under that arrangement?—There might be a difficulty as to the control I would have over them, seeing they were my deputes, and yet paid by Government. I have a great responsibility at present in the office; I am responsible for all my clerks, and for all the fees collected.

8196. The Chairman.—Do you see any difficulty in the Government controlling the appointment, you suggesting the persons to be appointed, and the Government giving their approval?—That, I believe, would obviate the objections which I would have otherwise.

8197. And as to the removal of a clerk, the same would apply?—If my reasons were submitted to Government for their approval.

8198. And that, you think, would be upon the whole a better system than the present?—I think it would.

8199. Fairer for the clerks?—Fairer for the clerks, and better for the public service.

8200. Have there been any instances of clerks who have been worn out in the service or laid aside in consequence of infirmity, being left destitute?—I have in my office just now more clerks than one whom I cannot retain much longer. From their advanced age, I should like to have others in their place. But if I throw them on the world, they are either destitute, or I must pension them. They do their work just now, but not so efficiently as they used to do, and they will soon be unfit for work.

8201. Lord Barcaple.—From their time of life?—Yes.

8202. The Chairman.—You have charge of the jury lists, both for civil and criminal trials?—Yes.

8203. Do you think that the mode of preparing these lists at present is a good one, or have you any suggestions to make for improving the system?—I may mention, first, the statutory provisions under which the jury books for the county of Edinburgh are made up. In terms of the Acts 6 Geo. IV. cap. 22, and 7 Geo. IV. cap. 8, they are made up in three divisions—those for the city of Edinburgh, for the town of Leith, and for the rest of the county. I shall be glad to explain the mode of making up the roll of jurors within the county of Edinburgh, under these provisions, the different courts for which assize lists are furnished from the books made up by me, and the proportions of special and common jurors for each of these assize lists, and the number of jurors required in the course of the year; and also to show the operation of the Justiciary Act, and the Court of Session Act of last session, by which a new mode of citation is introduced which tells very seriously on the duties of my office; in so far as, under the old system, jurors were cited for the High Court of Justiciary by the macers of the court, or by Sheriff-officers when the macers were otherwise engaged; and for civil causes before the Court of Session, and in the Sheriff Court, the jurors were all cited by Sheriff-officers. The citations were either served personally on the jurors or left at their dwelling-houses. By the Acts of last session these modes of citation are abolished, and the citations are now made through the Sheriff-clerk's office. The Sheriff-clerk has to 'fill up and sign a proper citation addressed to each such juror, and shall cause the same to be transmitted to him in a registered post letter, directed to him at his place of residence, as stated in the roll of jurors; and a certificate under the hand of such Sheriff-clerk or his depute, if the citation of any jurors or juror in manner herein provided, shall have the like force and effect as an execution of citation according to the present law and practice.' In evidence of the great additional work which has thus been thrown upon the office of the Sheriff-clerk in Edinburgh, I may specify that, since this new mode of citation came into operation, viz. 15th October last to the present time, 25th January 1869, I have cited—For the High Court of Justiciary, 5 lists of 45 jurors—225 citations; 1 list of 65 jurors—65 citations; for Court of Session jury trials, 15 lists of 39 jurors—585 citations; and for Sheriff Court of Edinburgh, 13 lists of 45 jurors—585 citations; in all, 1460 citations in three months, or little more. This involves, besides the making out the assize list from the general jury book, the careful filling of a proper citation, with the name, designation, and address of each juror, the date of trial for which he is cited, and other necessary particulars, and also the direction on the outside for delivery by post. Moreover, on taking the letters of citation to the General Post Office to be registered, the authorities there require that the Sheriff-clerk shall present two copies of the list of assize, one of which copies, after comparison with the names and addresses on the letters, is retained at the Post Office, and the other is returned to the Sheriff-clerk with a certificate of registration of the letters therein specified. No provision was made for remuneration to the Sheriff-clerk for all this, nor even for the outlay, which comes to something considerable, because there is a fee of 4d. for the registration of each letter, and 1d. for postage.

8204. Mr. Webster.—But in civil causes the parties are charged with that?—No regulation has yet been made by Act of Sederunt or otherwise as to the fees to be charged by the Sheriff-clerk for the citation of jurors in jury trials in the Court of Session; and in order to save myself from loss on account of my outlay in the meantime, I have hitherto, since the operation of the new mode of citation, charged the agents in the cause as follows for the assize lists furnished, and the citation of the jurors, viz. a fee of 10s. 6d. always in use to be charged as a fee for making out the list from the jury book (and which goes to Exchequer with the ordinary office fees), and 1s. for each letter of citation, inclusive of the registration fee and postage. In this way the whole charge for each assize list in civil causes is—For making out list, 10s. 6d.; for 39 citations at 1s. each, £1, 19s. — total, £2, 9s. 6d.; whereas formerly the accounts rendered by the Sheriff-officers for citing a jury in these cases generally amounted to between £5 and £6 in each case. They were allowed so much a day for their travelling expenses, and so much for each citation. Jurors were cited from each of the counties of Edinburgh, Linlithgow, and Haddington. I have had to employ an extra clerk in my office since the operation of these Acts, in order to overtake the work.

8205. Eightpence comes practically to be what is left for the postage and the filling up, because there is 4d. to pay for the registration?—Yes.

8206. That leaves 7d. for the stationery and the filling up?—Yes, that is what I have charged at present, but I thought that the Act of Sederunt would have embraced that matter.

8207. The Chairman.—Have you any further remarks to make on that subject?—I am not sure that the present mode of making up the books is altogether satisfactory. I have a great many complaints as to the frequency with which jurors are called upon to serve in this district, especially in Leith and in the county.

8208. Lord Barcaple.—Would you explain how the books are made up?—The mode of making up the roll of jurors within the county of Edinburgh (in its three divisions) is as follows: Sheriff-officers, or other persons competently qualified, are appointed, whose duty it is to deliver schedules at every house within the district assigned to them, unless where it is known that no male resides who is qualified to act as a juror. These schedules specify the several qualifications for special and common jurors, and also the grounds on which exemption may be legally claimed. The schedule is addressed to the householder or person supposed to be qualified, and the name of each individual for whom a schedule is delivered is entered in a book kept for the purpose; in which book the streets, if in the town, or parishes, if in the county, are arranged alphabetically; and under each street or parish the names of the persons therein to whom schedules are delivered are also alphabetically arranged. A direction is printed in the schedule, that the same must be filled up and returned to the Sheriff-clerk's office within six days. There is no penalty, however, for not returning the schedule filled up, and in fact it is often not returned. But the person delivering the schedules is instructed to use his best endeavour to have the schedule filled up and returned to him at the time of calling, whenever this is practicable. In the towns especially, where this can be more easily done, the schedules, which may not have been promptly returned, are now usually called for again by the person making up the lists; and if not recovered, further inquiry is made regarding the qualification of the persons to whom these schedules were addressed. After getting in the schedules as well as possible, those which have been filled up and returned, or which may have been called for and filled up from information obtained by the Sheriff-officer or person employed, are arranged in the order of the names in his book, and the qualification of special or common is inserted in columns for that purpose in the book. Opposite to the name of any person claiming exemption a marking to that effect is made; and it is also noted where the schedule has not been returned. The next step is that the Sheriff-clerk, to whom the book is handed when ready, copies the names from it on separate sheets of paper, so prepared that they may be readily divided into separate slips, each containing the name, address, and qualification, as special or common, of one juror; and these are revised and compared with the officer's books and schedules. The claims of exemption are then considered; and in cases found entitled to exemption, the names are struck out from the prepared slips and from the officer's book. In the cases of persons whose schedules have not been returned or recovered, the names are allowed to remain in the book and prepared slips, unless there is reason to know that there is no proper qualification. After being so revised, the prepared slips, each containing the name, address, and qualification of one juror, are separated and placed in a ballot-box by the Sheriff-clerk, drawn out one by one at hazard, and the special and common jurors' names made into separate parcels. The names are afterwards entered by the Sheriff-clerk in the order in which they are drawn from the box, in the general jury book for the district. In entering the names they are so arranged that about one-third of the names on each page of the general jury book shall be special jurors. It is found that this is, as nearly as may be, the proportion in which the special and common jurors appear on the lists for the several districts. And moreover, with this proportion it is found that the special and common jurors in each book are generally exhausted about the same time. By the 7th section of 6 Geo. IV. cap. 8, it is provided that in all criminal trials one third of the number of jurors required, or if the number required cannot be divided into thirds, a number as nearly as can be to a third, more or less, at the discretion of the Sheriff, shall be persons qualified as special jurors, and shall be distinguished in the return accordingly. The general jury book is provided with columns for the name, address, and qualification of each juror, and also for insertion of the date of the precept, or signing of the assize list, by virtue of which the juror is summoned to serve, the particular court he is cited to, and the date of holding the same, and the number of each juror in that assize list. While the current books are being used, others are in the meantime in preparation in the same way, in order that a new jury book may be in readiness when the former one is exhausted. The jury books for the counties of Haddington and Linlithgow, which are made up under the care of the respective Sheriff-clerks of these counties, are, when completed, transmitted to the Sheriff-clerk of Edinburgh, who supplies from them the names of jurors when required, as directed by the Act of 1825.

8209. What is precisely the proceeding you adopt in the cases where the schedules are not returned?—The officer or person employed has to make what inquiry he can, and according to his report the juror is put down as special or common.

8210. But he always is put down?—Yes, unless there is reason to know that he is disqualified from age or some other disability.

8211. But unless the Sheriff-clerk is made aware of a real disqualification, do you always put down the name of the party with whom a schedule was left, which has not been returned?—Yes.

8212. Mr. Webster.—I think you described the delivery of schedules as being also to the occupier of the house, without knowing who he was?—Generally the officer takes the Directory, or has some other means of finding out who the occupier is.

8213. Has he any inducement, in the shape of remuneration, to make a complete return?—No; he is paid 7s. 6d. a day for 10 hours' employment.

8214. Lord Barcaple.—The schedules are addressed to residences, not to places of business?—Not to places of business. It is to parties resident.

8215. Are you satisfied that, as the result of the whole matter, you do get a fair return of the names of all the parties within the county who are liable to serve?—I think, with the person who is employed just now, who is not a Sheriff-officer, but whose whole time is devoted to the duty, I get a better return than when I employed the Sheriff-officer; but I am not satisfied that it is the best way that could be adopted.

8216. Have you any apprehension that there is a large number of persons who ought to serve, whose names are not upon the list?—No; I don't think there can be a large number now, under the present system.

8217. How many have you upon the list at present?—The general jury book last in use for the city of Edinburgh contained 4061 names. It was commenced on 13th March 1867, and was exhausted on 6th November 1868, lasting nearly 20 months. It was rather larger than usual, and that book was a fuller book. It was made up more carefully, I think, than previous ones. The general jury book last in use for the town of Leith contained 374 names, and was exhausted in little more than 6 months. And the general jury book last in use for the county of Edinburgh (that is, exclusive of the city of Edinburgh and the town of Leith) contained 1036 names, and was exhausted in about 6 months. On an average of the last 4 years, the jurors in the city of Edinburgh have been called on to serve once in every 15 or 18 months; and in the town of Leith and county of Edinburgh, once in every 6 months, or thereabout. The jury book for the county of Haddington, which contains on an average about 650 names, is generally exhausted in about 8 months; and that for the county of Linlithgow, with an average of 550 names, is exhausted in about 8 months also.

8218. Mr. Campbell.—Can you tell me whether, by the increased care which has been taken in collecting the names of the jurors, you have got any considerable increase in number on the jury roll within the last two or three years?—Yes, certainly I think so.

8219. A material difference?—Yes.

8220. Lord Barcaple.—Can you say in what class of persons that increase has taken place? Have they been special or common jurors?—It tells upon both.

8221. You have not noticed that there has been a great preponderance in one or other?—No; the proportion remains much the same.

8222. There are disqualifications. How do you ascertain these?—In the schedule delivered to the householders the grounds of exemption are stated, so that a person may see whether he is entitled to exemption or not, and there are columns left that the party may state whether he is a special or a common juror. The different qualifications are mentioned, and the parties fill in under what qualification they choose to be classed, or their ground of exemption, if they have any.

8223. There were some statutory exemptions which have been recently abolished by the Court of Session Act?—Yes; but they are very few.

8224. Were there many instances of that in the city district of Edinburgh?—No; it is income tax commissioners, keepers of lighthouses, and a very few others. In Edinburgh, it does not tell much. The principal exemptions here are advocates, writers to the Signet, and all members of the College of Justice, and medical men.

8225. Lord Barcaple.—What means have you of knowing what schedules are left originally?—I have merely to take the word of the person delivering them. He gets the schedules from me, and fills them up, and enters them in his book.

8226. It depends on him who are the persons with whom the schedules are left?—Yes; but he brings me his book, and all the schedules which he recovers, and he lays them before me. It lies with him to say whether he has delivered them.

8227. Suppose some one to say to him, 'I am above 60 years of age,' what would he do?—If he had any doubt of it, I would consider myself entitled to ask for a certificate.

8228. But what would the man do, supposing a person with whom he proposes to leave the schedule says, 'I am above 60 years of age?'—And does not fill up the schedule?

8229. Yes?—Then the officer, if sufficiently satisfied that it was true, would write, 'Above age,' and take the person's name out of the book.

8230. Upon his own statement?—Yes.

8231. Mr. Harrison.—If there was any very obvious case in which you had reason to doubt whether the man was above age, I suppose you would check it?—Yes, if I had a knowledge of my own on the subject; or if I had doubt, I would ask for a certificate of age from the person claiming exemption.

8232. Mr. Murray.—Don't a number of persons, who are entitled from their qualifications to be entered as special jurors, return themselves as common jurors?—I have known instances of that.

8233. And do you accept these persons' returns?—Yes; but such a case is very rare.

8234. What object have they?—I cannot tell what their object may be.

8235. Is there any advantage to be gained?—No; there is rather a gain in being a special juror. There are more special jurors required for civil cases in the Court of Session, and there they get paid. A special juror has more chance of being employed in a civil case than a common juror.

8236. Then it must arise from some misconception on their part?—I cannot tell.

8237. The Chairman.—Have you any further suggestions to make?—If it shall be deemed expedient to have new legislation on the subject of the jury lists, I would respectfully suggest that there should be some rearrangement of the divisions within the county of Edinburgh from which the jurors are taken, and of the respective proportions to be taken from these divisions. The jurors from the town of Leith, and the rural part of the county of Edinburgh, are called upon to serve twice as often as those resident in the city of Edinburgh. Leith is now so much a place of offices and warehouses that there are actually fewer persons resident there who are qualified as jurors than there were formerly, in proportion to the population and extent; and as the jurors from Leith are now of the same classes as those in the city of Edinburgh, there would seem to be little or no reason why it should be kept up as a separate division. In the event of a re-arrangement, Edinburgh and Leith might form one division, and the rest of the county another division, and the proportions to be taken from these in future assize lists should be calculated on a comparison of the numbers of jurors contained in the jury books made up for each of these divisions. And further, in place of taking as at present the old police bounds of 1822 as the limits of the city of Edinburgh division, the Parliamentary bounds might be substituted. It may further be suggested that perhaps a simpler and less expensive, and also a more effective mode of making up the jury lists than that at present followed, would be to employ the assessors for this purpose, as they have the information as to all the occupiers, and the amounts of rent, and value and nature of the possessions occupied. In the notices of assessment issued from the assessor's office to occupiers, an addition might be inserted (to be struck out where, in the knowledge of the assessor, it did not apply), that the name of the person addressed would be put on the roll of jurors for the district unless a legal claim for exemption could be substantiated to the satisfaction of the assessor within so many days. As the possession of personal property, which constitutes certain of the present qualifications, does not come within the knowledge of the assessor, the qualifications might perhaps be advantageously simplified, say, as follows: That all persons rated at £10 of yearly rent for their residence, and up to £ , should be taken as common jurors, unless they could show that they were otherwise possessed of a special qualification; and all persons rated as occupiers at £ of yearly rent and upwards, to be taken as special jurors. I have thought that some such method might be a more effective way of taking up the jury books; but it is a very difficult subject, and it presses very hardly on the jurors in the districts of Edinburgh, Haddington, and Linlithgow, who have to serve not only for trials in their respective Sheriff Courts, but also in cases before the Court of Justiciary and the Court of Session.

8238. Have you any further suggestions as to jurors?—No.

8239. Have you any suggestions to offer as to the mode of procedure and pleading in the Sheriff Court?—No.

8240. Are you in use to attend in court personally?—I attend personally in the criminal courts, and take a personal superintendence of the general business in the office—records, fees, exchequer accounts, etc. etc. I leave the process department and the sitting in the ordinary court very much in the hands of my depute (Mr. Whitten), who has been in the office for 25 or 30 years, and I have no doubt he may be able to give valuable evidence as to the practical details of that department.

8241. Mr. Baxter.—Are you Commissary-clerk?—I am not.

8242. The Chairman.—In regard to the matter of exemptions, you have said that if a man states to the person taking up the list that he is beyond 60 years of age, the person taking up the list strikes him out, and does not return him to you, or takes his statement for it. Would it not be some check that a person so stating should always be obliged to put it into the return, and write it in the column of exemptions?—Yes; but there is no authority for enforcing their filling up of the schedule. The schedule is not a statutory proceeding. It is merely followed in this county from use and wont.

8243. You might not give effect to the exemption unless it was filled into the schedule, and then the party would have the trouble of attending and pleading his exemption?—But it is our object to keep the jury roll as perfect as possible, so as to save persons being called upon to serve, who, when they come up, will claim exemption.

8244. And also to require all persons not legally exempted to attend?—Yes.

8245. Mr. Murray.—You give personal attendance at your office daily?—Yes.

8246. And you personally superintend the different departments?—I do.

8247. And I suppose there are few days in which you are not in communication with one or other of the Sheriffs?—I am every day. I take a large share in the business.

8248. Are you aware that the business of the Sheriff Courts of Mid-Lothian could not be satisfactorily conducted except by one giving personal attendance to it?—Certainly it could not.

8249. Mr. Campbell.—You have been for some years in the habit of attending regularly the sittings of the Sheriff Court in criminal cases tried by jury?—Always.

8250. You are therefore well acquainted with the classes of cases which the Sheriff tries?—Yes.

8251. Do you see any reason why the Sheriff should be so much limited as he is in his power of punishment; or do you think that he might, with advantage to the public, be entrusted with the power of sentencing to penal servitude?—I think it certainly would be for the public advantage that his power in that respect should be extended.

8252. Are you aware that there are cases tried by the Sheriff and punished with periods of imprisonment, similar to those tried in the High Court and Circuit Courts of Justiciary and punished habitually with penal servitude?—I am.

8253. Don't you think, then, that it is a great disadvantage to the public service, that such cases, which would be punished with penal servitude in the Supreme Court, should be punished with sentences of imprisonment if tried before the Sheriff?—That is my opinion.

8254. Mr. Shand.—In that class of cases, Crown counsel have considered the cases, and have come to the opinion that they are not suitable for penal servitude?—I am talking of cases which so came out in evidence, that in my opinion a heavier sentence than two years' imprisonment was merited, and probably would have been given, if the Sheriff had been empowered; also of cases where there have been a large number of previous convictions—cases where I know that the party has undergone penal servitude before, and that has been ignored in the libel under which he is brought before the Sheriff.

8255. But all of these cases have been before Crown counsel, and Crown counsel have considered that in the particular case imprisonment should be the sentence, and consequently it is sent to the Sheriff?—That particular case has been remitted to the Sheriff.

8256. After consideration by Crown counsel, who have come to the conclusion that penal servitude would be too severe a punishment?—That may be so.

8257. Do you propose that that extension of criminal jurisdiction should be limited to the Sheriffs in Edinburgh, or extended all over Scotland?—I have understood that, under a pressure of business before the High Court of Justiciary, cases have been remitted to the Sheriff of Edinburgh, which would not have been sent to him to try but for that pressure of business.

8258. Do you mean that this provision should be confined to Edinburgh?—I speak from my own experience, sitting in the Sheriff Court of Edinburgh, that I have seen cases tried by the Sheriff where I believe a severer sentence than two years' imprisonment was merited. Similar cases may occur in other counties; and I should like to see Sheriffs entrusted with the power of sentencing to penal servitude.

8259. Mr. Murray.—In this county the Commissary-clerkship is held by another party than the Sheriff-clerk?—Yes; the offices are quite distinct.

8260. Do you think they could be conjoined with advantage to the public service?—I think so, certainly.

I think the offices could be combined with economy and advantage.

8261. Both in this county and in other counties?—Yes; and I have thought so all along. There is an inconvenience to the public in having the offices separate, seeing that the Sheriff is Commissary.

8262. Lord Barcaple.—They are separate offices at present in this county?—They are; and they are not in the same building.

8263. Are you familiar with the nature or amount of the business done in the Commissary Court?—No, except what I have seen in the returns.

Kenmure Maitland.

8264. But you think one principal clerk could fully undertake both offices?—Clearly; and with a slight extension of the staff in the Sheriff-clerk's office, I believe they could be so undertaken, with benefit to the public service.

8265. Mr. Webster.—In the Sheriff Court you are limited to business proper to the Sheriffdom of Edinburgh, but in the Commissary Court there is a wider jurisdiction. It is the commune forum for all parties not having a domicile in Scotland?—It is so, but I cannot say farther as to the Commissary Office.

FRIDAY, 29TH JANUARY 1869.

Members Present:—

LORD COLONSAY.	GEORGE HARRISON, Esq.
THE LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.	JAMES ADAM, Esq.
LORD BARCAPLE.	T. G. MURRAY, Esq.
JAMES CAMPBELL, Esq.	J. B. BAXTER, Esq.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD COLONSAY IN THE CHAIR.

JAMES WEBSTER BARTY, Esq., examined.

James Webster Barty.

8266. The Chairman.—You are a practitioner before the Sheriff Court in Perthshire?—And in Stirlingshire also.

8267. You are Procurator-fiscal at Dunblane?—Yes; for the Western District of Perthshire, in the Sheriff and Justice of Peace Courts; and I am secretary to the General Council of Procurators.

8268. How is that council constituted?—It is composed of the dean or other chief office-bearers of each local society, both those incorporated previous to the passing of the Procurators' Act, and those incorporated under its provisions.

8269. The deans for the time?—The deans for the time being.

8270. How long does a dean hold his office?—It is different in different societies.

8271. How many of these societies are there?—The following are the societies incorporated previous to the passing of the Procurators' Act:—Faculty of Advocates of Aberdeen; Society of Solicitors of Banffshire; Faculty of Procurators and Solicitors in Dundee; Society of Solicitors at Law, Edinburgh; Faculty of Procurators, Glasgow; Faculty of Procurators of Paisley; Society of Procurators and Solicitors of Perthshire. The societies incorporated since the passing and under the provisions of the Act, which are also entitled to be represented at meetings of the General Council, are:—Society of Solicitors of Airdrie; Ayr Faculty of Solicitors; Faculty of Procurators for Dumbartonshire; Faculty of Procurators of Dumfriesshire; Society of Solicitors of Elginshire; Faculty of Procurators, Greenock; Faculty of Procurators for the Rhinns of Galloway; Faculty of Solicitors of Inverness-shire; Faculty of Procurators of the County of Linlithgow; Society of Solicitors and Procurators of Western District of Perthshire; Faculty of Solicitors of Ross and Cromarty; Faculty of Procurators of the Lower District of Wigtown; Society of Solicitors of Hamilton; Society of Solicitors and Procurators of Kincardineshire; Society of Solicitors and Procurators of Forfarshire; Society of Solicitors of Fifeshire, Dunfermline. These are all the societies at present represented in the General Council.

8272. The General Council consists of the deans or presidents of all these societies?—Yes; and failing any dean being present at a meeting, a representative member from each of these local societies may represent him in the council for the time being.

8273. May be sent by the Society to represent them at the council?—Yes.

8275. The council is part of the constitution created by that Act?—It is. I can state shortly what are the chief duties and powers of the council under that Act. They are—(1.) To frame bye-laws providing for the appointment of office-bearers, and the time and place of meetings. (2.) To frame a curriculum and regulations as to the legal study of all persons applying for admission as procurators within Scotland, with the exception of those whose admission is regulated by the charters of incorporated Faculties conferring exclusive privileges, and as to the subjects for examination of such persons in general knowledge and law, and legal training and practice, and also as to extending the period of apprenticeship of apprentices failing satisfactorily to undergo the compulsory examinations provided by the Act. (3.) To fix the time, and place, and fees of examination of persons applying for admission as procurators. (4.) To act as examiners of such persons. (5.) To exact from all incorporated Faculties such contributions as shall be required for the necessary expenditure of the General Council and office-bearers. Bye-laws, curriculum, and regulations, in terms of the powers and duties above referred to, having been prepared by the General Council, were approved of, in terms of the Act, by an Act of Sederunt of the Lords of Council and Session, dated 22d June 1866. I produce a copy of these bye-laws.

8276. How often does the council hold meetings?—By the Act it is necessary that they should hold at least one annual meeting, and they do in fact hold meetings much more frequently.

8277. Mr. Baxter.—There is power given in the Act to call special meetings?—Yes; and the bye-laws also contain regulations as to the calling of meetings.

8278. The Chairman.—Has the council had under its consideration any matters connected with the inquiry that the present Commission is engaged in, as to the Sheriff Courts?—I may explain that, in July 1868, after it was known that a Royal Commission was to be issued to inquire into the law courts, a series of queries was prepared by the General Council with reference to various points connected with the supreme and inferior courts, in regard to which amendments were likely to be proposed, in order that the opinions of the local Faculties on these points might be ascertained. Answers were received from 17 Faculties; but as 5 of these did not supply me with printed copies, I can only at present produce the answers of 12 Faculties. After these answers were received, several meetings of the General Council were held to consider them, and much discussion took place in regard to them. At a meeting held on the 10th December, I was instructed to obtain printed copies of the answers, and to send them to each of the Faculties for their consideration. Thereafter a meeting of the General Council was held on 26th December, attended by, I think, 13 representatives of those Faculties, and they unanimously, and after anxious deliberation, agreed on certain propositions, and requested Mr. Caird to state these to this Commission as the views of the General Council. That he accordingly did on 28th December. Thereafter I received instructions to report the statement which he had read to the Commission to the various local Faculties for their consideration and opinion, and to request them to communicate their opinion to me. I have received in reply resolutions from 19 Faculties, copies of which I produce.

8279. Mr. Harrison.—Will you state in a general way what the purport of the answers is?—Fifteen of the Faculties, containing 795 members of the profession, have by unanimous resolutions given their unqualified adhesion to the views of the General Council as expressed in Mr. Caird's paper, read by him to this Commission. These 15 Faculties are,—The Society of Advocates, Aberdeen; the Ayr Faculty of Solicitors; the Faculty of Procurators and Solicitors, Dundee; the Faculty of Procurators, Glasgow; the Faculty of Solicitors of Inverness-shire; the Faculty of Solicitors of Fifeshire at Dunfermline; the Faculty of Procurators of Dumfriesshire; the Faculty of Procurators for the Rhinns of Galloway; the Faculty of Procurators of Dumbartonshire; the Faculty of Procurators in Paisley; the Society of Solicitors, Airdrie; the Faculty of Procurators for the county of Linlithgow; the Society of Solicitors of Hamilton; the Faculty of Procurators, Greenock; the Society of Solicitors of the Western District of Perthshire. There were four other Faculties, numbering 149 members, which approved (also unanimously) of Mr. Caird's paper with exceptions.

8280. The Chairman.—They approve of Mr. Caird's statement?—Yes.

8281. Mr. Harrison.—What exception do they make?—Elgin would abolish Sheriffs-depute; Banff would prefer an appeal court of three Sheriffs; Forfar excepts to a jury of three Sheriffs,—a minority numbering three also wished to except two appeal Sheriffs. The Faculty of Ross and Cromarty is satisfied with the present records; does not approve of short printed summonses, nor of the proposed summary and unexpensive jurisdiction up to £50; and is against reciprocal opening of courts to all practitioners. I may mention that the Ayr Faculty of Solicitors gave one or two special suggestions in addition to those contained in Mr. Caird's paper; namely, (1) They think that a shorthand writer should be attached to each court, by whom all proofs in civil causes should be taken down under the superintendence and direction of the Sheriff. (2) They are of opinion that the judicial functions of all Justices of the Peace and unpaid magistrates should cease, and that a stipendiary magistracy should be established in Scotland. (3) They are further of opinion that Procurators-fiscal should be appointed by Government, receive adequate remuneration, and be precluded from taking civil business in their respective courts. (4) They think the attorney tax should be brought before the Commission, and an effort made for its abolition.

8282. Mr. Murray.—What was the answer of the Society of Solicitors of Elginshire?—They approved generally of the statement read to the Law Commission by Mr. M'Neel Caird; but stated their opinion—1. That the proposed appeal court of Sheriffs is entirely objectionable. That the office of Sheriff-depute should be abolished, and that the appeal should be made by reclaiming petition and answers to the resident Sheriff in the first instance, from whom, after reconsidering his own judgment, there should be an appeal to the Lord Ordinary in the same way as there is to the Sheriff-depute at present. 2. That there should be no restriction in the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Courts, the litigants being the best judges of the courts they wish to resort to. 3. That the small juries proposed for the Sheriff Courts would be objectionable and mischievous.

8283. Is that a sample of the small differences which you said existed?—They are mistaken in supposing that small juries was a recommendation of the General Council. That was simply one of Mr. Caird's own views, and it was not stated by him as the view of the General Council, but the reverse. I must also remark that the second head stated by the Elgin Society, to the effect that there should be no restriction of the Sheriff's jurisdiction, is not a dissent from, but is in entire conformity with the paper read to the Commission by Mr. Caird; so that the only substantial difference between the Elgin procurators and the rest of our body is that, while they would abolish the Sheriffs-depute, we would attempt to utilize them. But if we should not be permitted to utilize them, the main difference between the Elgin gentlemen and the rest of the Faculties would probably disappear. A blind attempt to keep things as they are for a little longer might reconcile us to greater changes than we at present advocate.

8284. Lord Barcaple.—Then the assent given by this body generally, you say, was to resolutions come to with reference to Mr. Caird's report?—It was to the resolutions contained in Mr. Caird's statement. His statement contains the resolutions come to at the meeting of the General Council.

8285. Mr. Murray.—And the solicitors of Elgin do agree with these?—They approve generally of the statement, with the exceptions I have stated.

8286. Mr Baxter.—But it was the statement itself that was communicated?—Yes; and I produce a printed copy of it.

8287. Mr. Harrison.—How many bodies of procurators are still unconnected with the General Council?—There are no bodies unconnected with the General Council, but in various counties there are no Faculties,—the most important of these counties is Stirling. I believe the procurators in one of the districts in Stirlingshire are about to be incorporated. There is also no incorporation in the large district of Cupar in Fifeshire.

8288. The Chairman.—You mention that the meeting was held in July, and that the heads of subjects were distributed to the different Faculties for their consideration?—Yes.

8289. And you produce these heads?—Yes.

8290. You said answers were sent to the General Council by the different bodies to whom these heads were sent?—Yes.

8291. Have you got these also?—I am not provided with all these answers. A good many of them were in manuscript, but copies of most of them were printed.

8292. Have you got copies of the whole of them?—Yes; they are all in my possession.

8293. Will you produce them?—I shall produce them all.

8294. You mentioned that afterwards the council met and considered these answers.—Yes.

8295. What did they do upon considering these answers?—Upon considering these answers, they obtained printed copies from the various Faculties, and distributed them among the Faculties. They sent copies of the answers by each Faculty to each of the other Faculties, and requested the Faculties to consider them.

8296. So that in that way each Faculty had intimation of what were the opinions of every other Faculty?—Just so.

8297. What followed upon that?—After they had time to consider these replies, meetings were called for the purpose of endeavouring, if possible, to ascertain the prevalent views of our branch of the profession.

8298. Did the several Faculties send back observations on the views of the other Faculties?—Not in writing; but their deans expressed their views at subsequent meetings of the General Council.

8299. The paper distributed to the Faculties at that time was a printed paper?—Yes.

8300. And along with it there were in print the answers that had been made by all the different Faculties?—As far as I could obtain them from the various Faculties.

8301. Had all the Faculties sent in answers?—They had not. Seventeen of them sent in answers.

8302. And it was the answers sent by these seventeen that were so distributed among the others?—They were, so far as printed.

8303. They were printed and distributed?—They were.

8304. These are in print?—Yes; and I produce all those that I have in print.

8305. You say there were some in manuscript?—I have these in my possession.

8306. Are they part of the seventeen?—Yes.

8307. They would be printed when they were sent to the different Faculties?—All I could send were those that were printed.

8308. How many of the answers did you so send?—Twelve; five were not printed. These five I have in my possession, and I will produce them.

8309. Whom were these five from?—They were from Paisley, Dumbarton, Dundee, Airdrie, and Greenock.

8310. Which of the Faculties made no answer at all?—I am not quite sure of the names at present without looking at the minute-book. The Solicitors at Law in Edinburgh was one, and the Society of Solicitors of the Western District of Perthshire was another. Three others did not return answers. The Faculty of Ross and Cromarty did not; but I cannot state the others in the meantime.

8311. Did you send the answers of those who did make answers to the Faculties that did not make answers?—Yes; as secretary, I sent communications to all the Faculties.

8312. The printed copies of the answers you had received you sent even to those who had not made any answers at all?—I did.

8313. And in return did you get observations from the Faculties?—No.

8314. What was the next step?—The next step was the calling of meetings of the General Council. I think there was an adjourned meeting to consider the whole question again.

8315. Was that in December?—Yes; between 10th and 26th December.

8316. What was done then?—The whole subject was fully discussed at that meeting, which was fully attended. Certain resolutions were unanimously adopted, which Mr. Caird put into the form of a statement to be read by him at this Commission.

8317. How many were present at that meeting?—I think the representatives of thirteen Faculties. I am not quite certain, without looking at the sederunt, if there were more or less.

8318.—The next thing was that Mr. Caird appeared as a witness and read the statement?—Yes.

8319. After that you say that his statement was circulated?—Yes.

8320. Who was it sent to?—It was sent to the whole Faculties.

8321. How many returned answers to it?—I produce to-day answers from nineteen Faculties. I understand there has been a return sent from the Society at Perth to the secretary of this Commission; but that return is not from the Society itself, but merely from the Committee of Management. I may explain, that four Societies, including Perth, and numbering 121 members, returned no answers.

8322. The Society itself has sent you no return?—No; I may explain that the original answers were the first and crude opinions of the Faculties, arrived at without having the benefit of knowing the opinions of the other Faculties, and, as might be supposed, are in some points very diverse. The resolutions come to on the 28th December, and the opinions expressed in the minutes of meetings of the Faculties which finally considered these resolutions, are the mature views of all these bodies, arrived at after full discussion, and after hearing the views, and being in the knowledge of the opinions of their brethren in the different parts of the country.

8323. Does it appear from the returns that you got that there was any division of opinion in any of the Faculties?—In the first return there is a considerable division of opinion.

8324. Does it appear what the division was?—I have been unable to frame any analysis so as to tell the Commission what it is. It was on various points.

8325. In the next return was there division of opinion, or did it appear that there had been, or had not been division of opinion?—There had been to a certain extent, but to a very trivial extent indeed.

8326. Did it appear that they were unanimous?—It does.

8327. Do the materials now put before us give all the opinions that have been collected by the General Council, and the opinion of the General Council itself?—The whole.

8328. Did you mention the procurators of Kincardine as among the number?—They sent in answers to the first series of questions.

8329. But not to the second?—There were no second questions. Mr. Caird's statement was sent to them, but they have expressed neither assent nor dissent.

8330. Are their answers to the first series of questions among the papers you produce?—They are.

8332. In December?—Yes; they were represented by their dean.

8333. He was one of the thirteen?—Yes. He was one of those who attended the first meeting.

8334. Who is their dean or chairman? — Mr. Tyndal, the Procurator-fiscal of Kincardineshire.

8335. Do you think that he was at that meeting?—Yes; to the best of my recollection.

8336. Mr. Adam.—Do you know the aggregate number of members belonging to the Society of Procurators?—I have the list we made for the year 1868, and the aggregate number of members represented in the General Council was 1060.

8337. The Chairman.—Among those inquiries is there anything connected with the criminal department?—There is one query as to extending the Sheriff's jurisdiction, and also as to giving him a power of sentencing to penal servitude.

8338. How long have you been Procurator-fiscal?—I have acted as Procurator-fiscal for nearly six years.

8339. What is your opinion as to the extension of the jurisdiction of the Sheriff in matters criminal?—I think it might be safely extended to cases of small robberies, and also to cases of aggravated thefts, where thefts are merely aggravated by previous conviction. I have had several cases of this kind in my own short experience, where the criminal is tried twice for small thefts, and a third time for a serious case of housebreaking. Afterwards he steals perhaps half-a-crown's worth of coals, or some small thing, and he has to be tried before the Circuit. I think the Sheriff might have jurisdiction to try cases of that sort.

8340. He has jurisdiction to try; but you think he ought to have jurisdiction to punish adequately?—Yes.

8341. Do you mean by penal servitude?—Yes; probably for a limited period.

8342. You don't propose to extend his jurisdiction to other offences than robbery, which are not within his power now?—No; I don't think so.

8343. Cases of robbery and theft sometimes run very closely into each other?—They do.

James Webster Barty.

8344. And when the violence is small, the punishment is substantially the same; and therefore you think it would be inexpedient that the Sheriff should not have the power to deal with a case of that character?—I think it would be desirable that he should have the power to deal with such a case.

8345. If a man were tried for theft, and it turned out that there was some degree of violence, he might escape altogether?—Yes.

8346. You have been in the use, I suppose, to attend at the taking of the declarations of prisoners?—I have.

8347. In presence of the Sheriff?—In presence of the Sheriff.

8348. Is it consistent with your experience that the prisoner is always warned that he is at liberty to speak or not to speak as he thinks proper; but that if he does speak, what he says will be taken down and may be used as evidence against him?—It is.

8349. Is there any pressure put upon him to speak?—None whatever. Quite the contrary. My practice is to ask him generally if he is guilty, and if he chooses to make any special statement, that is taken down; but he is in no way questioned minutely.

8350. Mr. Adam.—Do you or the Sheriff dictate the answers?—The Sheriff dictates the answers in all cases.

8351. The Chairman.—It does not consist with your experience that any unfair advantage is taken with the prisoner in the matter of declaration?—I have never seen that in any case.

8352. You take precognitions?—I do.

8353. I suppose the Sheriff is sometimes present at the taking of these precognitions, and sometimes not?—Very seldom, as matter of practice, does the Sheriff now attend. In a very serious case he probably does so, but in minor crimes he never does.

8354. I suppose he would attend if he were apprehensive that a witness would not speak truly, or if you ask his presence?—Yes; in order that a witness may be put on oath if necessary.

8355. Mr. Baxter.—Supposing that the criminal investigations were to be conducted publicly, and that the Sheriffs were to preside, would you require an additional staff of Sheriffs?—Yes. It would be quite impossible for one Sheriff to do the whole business, both civil and criminal, in that case.

8356. Such investigations in populous places would occupy his whole time?—I think it would.

8357. The Chairman.—Do you investigate cases of sudden death?—I do frequently, according to the demands of the district. In the year 1867 I investigated 14 cases of sudden death, and reported them to the Crown; and in 1868 I investigated 15 cases.

8358. Mr. Campbell.—You have received explicit directions on the subject from Crown counsel?—We have.

8359. Do you always adhere to these regulations?—Always.

8360. The Lord Justice-General.—Is the Sheriff always present at taking the prisoners' declarations?—Always, and he always dictates them.

8361. The Chairman.—Are there any alterations you would suggest in regard to criminal practice?—I think that the form of the criminal libel might be altered. Mr. Gair prepared an amended form, which I saw and wrote out with my own hand; and I entirely approve of his suggestion in that respect.

8362. That is with a view to shortening and simplifying the libel?—It is. With reference to the summary form, I consider that the forms of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, are perfectly suitable, and that no change is desirable on these. Probably it might be more correct to have the prayer of the complaint in certain cases slightly altered; but that is a very small matter.

8363. Mr. Baxter.—What is your practice when a constable brings in a prisoner accused of a petty offence?—I present the complaint to the Sheriff, and put the man on his plea at once.

8364. The same day?—Yes.

8365. You never commit such a man to prison?—No, never. I never take a declaration from him, nor put him in prison, unless there is some likelihood that he is to be tried by a jury.

8366. Mr. Campbell.—Do you think it desirable that Circuit Criminal Courts should still be held by judges of the Court of Justiciary?—I think, on the whole, it is.

8368. The Chairman.—Have you any suggestions to make as to criminal procedure?—I understand that there has been a question raised by several Faculties, whether the Procurators-fiscal ought not to be restricted to their public duties. I think they ought not to be so restricted. There are 13 Fiscals, I think, with incomes under £300. In the first place, then, unless a large increase was made, the same class of men as the present could not be got. My own salary from all sources is £385, which by deducting outlays is reduced to £300. My income from private business is considerably larger. In the second place, the Procurators-fiscal would not have sufficient work to occupy their time, and the enforced idleness would produce either aversion to do any work at all, or a habit of magnifying every petty offence into an important crime. In the third place, the present system has worked exceedingly well, and has certainly been an economical one. If it be resolved to restrict Procurators-fiscal to their public duty, it will be necessary—(1) to increase salary; (2) to give retiring allowances; (3) and for the sake of economy to do away with the smaller districts, and to give each Procurator-fiscal a larger jurisdiction. But this extension of jurisdiction has its drawbacks. With the present small districts, you secure that the Procurator-fiscal himself shall personally attend to each case; whereas, if he has a very wide district, he must very frequently employ his clerks to do the work which ought to be done by himself.

8369. Mr. Murray.—In a county where a Procurator-fiscal has a sufficient salary, don't you think it would be an improvement to debar him from private practice?—I am not sure. At present the duties are very well done, and I am not aware of any cases where the two interests have clashed—the public interest and the private interest of the Procurator-fiscal. Probably in some large places, where the Procurators-fiscal have sufficient work to do, it might be a good thing.

8370. Mr. Baxter.—Are you aware that in large places, Procurators-fiscal do confine themselves to their duties?—I understand so. I understand that in Edinburgh and Glasgow the Procurators-fiscal do not attend to private business.

8371. Mr. Murray.—Would not the same thing apply in some of the larger counties?—In a few cases it probably might.

8372. Mr. Adam.—Could one Fiscal do the whole work with advantage in your county?—I think he might.

8373. You think it is not too much?—It is not too much.

8374. You mean, without taking private practice?—Yes, without taking private practice.

8375. The Chairman.—In that case, would the drawbacks that you have alluded to exist?—No; not in that case.

8376. Mr. Murray.—But your objections are that it would be more expense to the country, and that in some cases the Procurator-fiscal would have too little to do?—Yes.

8377. If these were removed, your objection would disappear?—No; I have a third objection, that if you increase a district to too large an extent, the Procurator-fiscal cannot do the work himself, and must employ clerks to do it.

8378. The Lord Justice-General.—Do you think that objection would apply if there was one Procurator-fiscal for the whole of Perthshire?—Probably not to a district of that extent.

8379. Mr. Murray.—The facilities of railway communication have made a great alteration in that respect?—In many districts, and especially in Perthshire.

8380. Mr. Baxter.—Are you satisfied with the present mode of appointing Procurators-fiscal by the Sheriff?—It is impossible that the appointments could have been better than those which have been made by the Sheriff.

8381. The Chairman.—The Sheriff has a material interest to have an efficient Procurator-fiscal?—He has.

8382. He is responsible, as chief magistrate, for the peace of the district, and for the prevention of crime?—Yes; and the Procurator-fiscal directly represents the Sheriff in these matters.

8383. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think there should be any check with reference to his dismissal when once he is appointed? Should he be an independent officer, or should the Sheriff have power to dismiss him?—I think that there should be a check with reference to his dismissal. I know that the Sheriff has the power of dismissal, and I also believe that the Lord Advocate may present a complaint to the Court of Justiciary for the purpose of having him dismissed; by allowing the latter to be the sole means of dismissal, it might put the appointments on a better footing than they are at present.

8384. The Lord Justice-General.—Are there many examples of a Sheriff dismissing a Procurator-fiscal?—There are not.

8385. Do you know any?—I don't know any cases of absolute dismissal. I know cases of resignation, which nearly amounted to dismissal.

8386. Mr. Murray.—In these cases, was it not for the benefit of the public service that the resignations should be accepted?—I thoroughly believe that.

8387. Mr. Baxter.—You don't know any cases of capricious dismissal?—I do not.

8388. The Chairman.—Have you anything more to say with reference to criminal matters?—I may also say that I am Justice of Peace Fiscal.

8389. Is there criminal jurisdiction exercised by a Justice in Perthshire, except the apprehending or taking declarations occasionally?—Not as matter of fact. They don't exercise their criminal jurisdiction in any way in the western district of Perthshire.

8390. Do you think it would be an expedient thing if the Justices in distant parts of the county took up petty offences without bringing parties to the seat of the Sheriff?—As a general principle, I don't think they are well fitted for criminal investigation, or for sentencing criminals. I think that is much better done by a Sheriff-substitute. I may state, that the only jurisdiction which the Justices exercise in Perthshire—and they exercise none in civil matters—is with reference to prosecutions under the Poaching Acts, the Road Acts, and the Inland Revenue Acts, and other Acts of a like kind. I prosecute in these cases.

8391. Is that duty well done?—While I think it is, I am not quite sure whether it would not be better to do away with that jurisdiction altogether where there is a Sheriff-substitute. There is a public complaint, that in poaching cases, and other matters of that kind, the Justices have a personal interest, and the public are not satisfied in all cases with their decisions.

8392. Do you think, on the whole, the decisions are fairly given?—I am of that opinion. I was only mentioning an opinion which I have heard stated by the public.

8393. The Lord Justice-General.—Then you think that is popular prejudice?—Yes.

8394. Mr. Murray.—But you would give in to it?—I should prefer the Sheriff as a judge upon the whole.

8395. Do you think the public would be better satisfied?—Yes.

8396. Mr. Campbell.—And you don't think the work would be worse done?—Certainly not.

8397. Mr. Murray.—Don't you think the poachers would sometimes get severer sentences?—I cannot say.

8398. The Chairman.—The Justices act in granting licences to public-houses?—They do.

8399. They sit in Petty Sessions for that purpose?—Yes.

8400. And their judgments are reviewable in Quarter Sessions?—Yes; but in Perthshire there are very few appeals indeed.

8401. Do you think that business is properly done?—It is very well done. And I think they are peculiarly well fitted for that business, because they know intimately and personally the various cases that come before them.

8402. Do any Excise prosecutions come before them in your district?—A few. I appear for the Excise when there are cases.

8403. Is that business well done?—It is sufficiently well done, I think. I may state that the forms adopted by me, are the forms under the Summary Procedure Act of 1864, with the exception of the Excise prosecutions, which have special forms, under the various Acts.

8404. Have you any criminal officers attached to your staff at Dunblane, or do you rely on the constabulary?—Entirely on the constabulary now. At one time we had criminal officers; but we have ceased to have them for a good many years.

8405. Mr. Adam.—Do you find any increasing difficulty in proving previous convictions?—A very great difficulty indeed. In many cases, I have had to depart from the previous conviction altogether, because I could not get officers to prove it.

8406. The Lord Justice-General.—What does that arise from?—I think it arises partly from this, that the officers are not well paid for proving convictions. The sum allowed them as witnesses and for going to a distant court is so small, that they far rather say they know nothing about the conviction.

8407. Mr. Baxter.—Does that not arise from the shifting nature of the police?—No doubt of it, from both causes.

8408. Mr. Adam.—You have not the same officers continuing about the court?—No; they are changed very frequently, and from one district of Perthshire to another.

8409. The Chairman.—Would you suggest any mode of meeting that difficulty by having the identification done in some other way?—Probably, if we had a special detective officer attached to the seat of every Sheriff Court, under orders of the police, but attached more or less to the Fiscal's office, that would do.

8410. Mr. Baxter.—If there was a superannuation fund for police-officers, would that make them more stationary?—No doubt of it. That is much required. After a few years' service in the police, the best men generally leave.

8411. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Do you think that is because there is no superannuation fund?—I have no doubt of it.

8412. The Chairman.—It would require very great care to frame a system of superannuation, would it not?—It would. It would be a difficult matter.

8413. Mr. Baxter.—Do you know that it is the opinion of the Council of Procurators, and generally of the various Faculties, that the review in the Sheriff Court should now be by two judges instead of one?—I do. They hold that view very strongly, and it is the result of long and wide experience under the present system of appeal from a single judge to a single judge. Perhaps I may be allowed to say, that it is a striking fact that the Sheriff Court practitioners should have arrived at that opinion with such unanimity.

8414. Have you framed any table showing what you would propose with regard to dividing the country into districts?—Yes; and I now produce it. I think five districts would be sufficient; and the number of Sheriffs being thus limited to ten, much higher salaries than the present could be given, and the services of better men could therefore be obtained. I have made out from the returns of business done in the Sheriff Courts during the year 1863, a scheme of division of the country into appeal districts, which, I think, in a general way shows how this plan might be carried out. This scheme is founded on the presumption that the work in Lanarkshire is sufficient for one district, as I understand that the time of the present Sheriff is sufficiently occupied, and, therefore, if the work in the other districts be less than in Lanarkshire, the other appeal judges will be able to undertake it. This scheme divides the country into five districts, and several modes of ascertaining whether such a division would work in practice have been adopted. In the first place, the actual amount of work to be done by the appeal judges ought to be ascertained by the number of appeals shown by the tables to have been taken in any particular year. In the tables I have made out, I have therefore shown the number of appeals taken in the year 1863; but as I believe that the Sheriff-clerks have not followed the same principle in calculating the number of appeals, their returns may not be reliable. I have accordingly taken the number of actions for debt enrolled, and also the population in each district, as criteria to a certain extent of the business in these districts, calculating that the number of decrees in foro, and appeals in all districts, bear very much the same proportion to the cases enrolled, and also that the business in one district containing a certain population will be very similar to that in another district containing the same amount of population. The table shows, first the northern district, comprehending Aberdeen, Banff, Caithness, Cromarty, Ross, Elgin, Nairn, Orkney, Sutherland, Zetland, and Kincardineshire. The population of these counties is 581,460; the number of actions for debt, enrolled in 1863, is 1238; the number of decrees in absence, 649; the number of defended cases, 589; and the number of appeals, 453. The second district, I suggest should comprehend the counties of Forfar, Perth, Kinross, Clackmannan, Stirling, Inverness, and Dumbarton; population, 598,036; number of actions for debt, enrolled in 1863, 1591; number of decrees in absence, 951; number of defended cases, 640; and number of appeals, 437. The third district comprehending the county of Lanark, alone comprehending a population of 631, 309; number of actions for debt, enrolled in 1863, 1517; number of decrees in absence, 692; number of defended cases, 825; and number of appeals, 514. The fourth district to consist of Fife, Haddington, Berwick, Peebles, Roxburgh, Selkirk, Linlithgow, and Edinburgh; population, 618,035; number of actions for debt, enrolled in 1863, 1159; number of decrees in absence, 653; number of defended cases, 506; and number of appeals, 292. The fifth to consist of the counties of Argyle, Renfrew, Ayr, Bute, Wigtown, Kirkcudbright, and Dumfries; population, 620,405; number of actions for debt, enrolled in 1863, 1085; number of decrees in absence, 576; number of defended cases, 509; and number of appeals, 265. These are actual numbers taken from the returns made on Mr. Baxter's motion in 1866, and the figures are perfectly correct so far as I can ascertain them, except for the county of Fife, from which no returns are made except of the population. I have, therefore, put in a number which may be fairly characterized as no more than the average number of other counties in proportion to the population. This scheme I offer as my own. It has not been under the consideration of the General Council.

8415. Lord Barcaple.—You have said 'actions for debt.' Do all the figures you have given refer exclusively to actions for debt?—Yes, with the exception of the appeals.

8416. Are not the appeals in actions for debt alone?—No; they embrace actions ad facta præstanda. These appeals include all classes of actions.

8417. Do you know what the number of actions for debt was, separately ascertained?—I am not aware. I take them merely from Mr. Baxter's returns.

8418. The Lord Justice-General.—Can you give us any notion what proportion the number of actions for debt bears to the total number of actions in the Sheriff Court?—I could not answer that question at present. The number of appeals seems to give the amount of work which the appeal judges would have to perform; but in some Sheriff Courts the Sheriff-clerk has gone upon different principles in calculating the number of appeals from those upon which other Sheriff-clerks proceeded, and it became necessary to verify the amount of work which the number of appeals appeared to put upon the judges of each appeal district, by taking other methods of calculating the amount of work. I might in this table have also inserted the number of actions ad facta præstanda; but as these are few in number, and could have no effect in changing the constitution of any particular district, I have not thought it necessary to do so. In framing this table, my object was not to show the particular number of each class of actions, but the mode in which appeal districts might be formed. I, therefore, took the population and the other particulars contained in the table as sufficient indications of the probable amount of work in each district, and as corroborative of the results shown by the number of appeals.

8419. The appeals you have given is the number of appeals from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff?—Yes.

8420. Do you think if the new plan which you have suggested were adopted, the number of appeals would be increased, or diminished, or remain stationary?—I think they would remain stationary. There seems to be no reason to expect either a diminution or increase, unless the stages at which appeals be taken be increased, or diminished as we proposed.

8421. Might not the expense of an appeal under your new system be greater?—I don't think so; certainly not more than a few shillings greater.

8422. Mr. Baxter.—I suppose there are very few cases not appealed?—There are very few cases not appealed from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff.

8423. Mr. Adam.—Would you have the appeal judges go to every place where there is a seat of a Sheriff-substitute?—Yes, where there was business to be done; but in some places there could be only one or two cases in a year, or at all events very few cases.

8424. Lord Barcaple.—What do you understand by actions for debt?—I understand them to be all actions except ad factum præstandum.

8425. You mean all actions with pecuniary conclusions?—Yes.

8426. No matter what the grounds of the action?—Yes.

8427. The Lord Justice-General.—Including actions of damages?—Yes.

8428. The Chairman.—And of aliment?—Yes. Although in England, I believe, damages are not looked on as debts, I mean by 'debts,' any money which one man owes to another, whatever the ground of his liability.

8429. Mr. Murray.—You would have the machinery of the court at each of these places?—Wherever a Sheriff-substitute was retained.

8430. You would not have them to go to places beyond that?—No; only to places where there is a Sheriff-substitute. I don't think it would be desirable that they should go to other places.

8431. Then you confine it to the Sheriff-court towns?—Yes.

8432. Mr. Campbell.—Are there any instances where it would be desirable to concentrate the business to be done before the Sheriff on appeal, which you suggest, in some one town easily accessible from one or two of the smaller towns?—I think that might be done, after a careful examination of the tables.

8433. Mr. Baxter.—The great mass of business would be in the large towns?—Yes, and in the large districts.

8434. Can you give me any idea of the present expense of appointing factors or tutors?—I have had cases frequently of the appointment of judicial factors, and I don't think in any case the expense in the Court of Session is less than £20 or £25. I can give instances of that.

8435. Have you accounts showing that?—Yes. In one case where I am judicial factor, my appointment cost £25. There was a heritable bond besides, to which I had to make up a title, and that cost other £25. Of course that latter item is now done away with.

8436. Had you paid £25 for your appointment?—Yes; between £20 and £25. It cost the estate that sum.

8437. Do you know anything about the expense of the discharge?—I am at present being discharged as judicial factor on the same estate, and I have no hesitation in saying that the expense will be much greater—probably between £40 and £50.

8438. Have you got the account for that?—No; but I know the amount of business that has been done.

8439. Mr. Adam.—Have you any idea of the expense that would have been saved by an application for the appointment in the Sheriff Court?—The same case in the Sheriff Court would have cost from £5 to £10.

8440. The Lord Justice-General.—What are the chief items of expense in the present system?—There is a good deal for printing, and also for counsel's fees.

8441. Are these the two chief items?—So far as I remember, they are.

8442. Mr. Adam.—In cases of appointments of that kind, it is very often necessary to serve a petition on a considerable number of persons having interest?—It is; and that is specially the case with reference to the discharge.

8443. In that case, the printing would be cheaper than making copies?—After a certain number of copies, printing is cheaper; but it is rarely that so many have to be served as to make printing cheaper than copies.

8444. Do you know practically, in your business, when it becomes as cheap to print as to make copies?—As far as I remember, it is twenty copies. That is what the printer who prints for me told me.

8445. The Chairman.—You think that it is as cheap to print only when there are twenty copies required?—I think so; but I really cannot give a definite answer to that.

8446. Would you be surprised if it were only six copies?—I think six is less than according to the rates that I pay; but I cannot be positive on that point.

8447. Mr. Adam.—Does your Sheriff-clerk ever do duty in your court in person?—He has never been in Dunblane since I have been a procurator before the Sheriff Courts in Perthshire.

8448. The work is done by a deputy?—The work is done by a depute. I believe the depute's salary is £110, and out of that he has to pay the whole expense of the office, and do the whole duties.

8449. Mr. Murray.—The Sheriff-clerk of Perth must necessarily do the duties in Dunblane by depute?—Of course; he must do the duties less or more. I merely said he had never been in Dunblane.

8450. Is there a Commissary Court in Dunblane?—There is.

8451. With a separate commissariat?—It is in Perthshire. There is a principal Commissary-clerk for the whole of Perthshire, with a depute at Dunblane.

8452. Is confirmation extracted at Dunblane?—Yes.

8453. Who acts?—The Sheriff-clerk depute. He is Commissary-clerk depute.

8454. Having a separate appointment?—Yes.

8455. Mr. Baxter.—Then the Sheriff-clerk of Perthshire is Commissary-clerk?—No; it is another gentleman.

8456. The Commissary-clerk is paid by fees?—Yes.

8457. Are these fees much complained of?—Yes, they are.

8458. As being too high?—Yes; the fees for the procurators are very small, but the fees of the Commissary-clerk for doing a very formal act are as much as the procurator gets for his whole trouble. In the very last confirmation I had, my whole account was £5, 10s., of which £2, 11s. was paid to the Commissary-clerk.

8459. Mr. Murray.—Might not that include the recording of the testament?—It includes all he does; but the work he does is very small, and almost mechanical, in comparison with what the agent has to do.

8460. But according to the present system a will or statement must be recorded?—Yes; in certain cases.

8461. Mr Adam.—Do you practise in Perth as well as in Dunblane?—I practise in Perth occasionally, and I am frequently in Stirling.

8462. Do you think that one Sheriff-substitute could do the whole work of your county?—I believe he could do the whole civil work, but I don't think he could do the whole criminal work with advantage to the public.

8463. Why?—Because great expense would be caused by the agents, prisoners, police, and witnesses going to Perth in criminal cases; and that in the course of a year would amount to a larger sum than the salary of the Sheriff-substitute at Dunblane. The amount of criminal work in the Dunblane district for the year ending 15th May 1867 was as follows, viz.—reported cases, 34; unreported, 93; jury trials, 4; inquiries into sudden deaths, 14; as to accidents in mines, etc., 9; as to fires, 1. For the year ending 31st March 1868, as follows, viz.—reported cases, 37; unreported cases, 119; jury trials, 4; inquiries into sudden deaths, 15; accidents, 7; fires, 1.

8464. Mr. Baxter.—Have you a table of the Commissary-clerk's fees?—I can produce a copy.

8465. Mr. Murray.—Did you ever see the principal Commissary-clerk of Perthshire at Dunblane?—Occasionally.

8466. The Chairman.—When you have criminal trials with a jury from the western district, are they tried at Perth?—They are tried at Dunblane. They were tried at Perth for a considerable period, but now they are all at Dunblane.

8467. Mr. Baxter.—What do you think of the present division of the county of Perth?—It is a very bad one at present. The Sheriff at Perth has too much to do, and if the jurisdiction is extended he will have much more to do; and the Sheriff at Dunblane has too little.

8468. Are the duties of Sheriff-clerk well done by the depute at Dunblane?—The duty of Sheriff-clerk is excellently done by the depute at Dunblane.

8469. Do you know whether the Sheriff-clerk does duty in Perthshire at Perth, or by depute?—I have scarcely ever seen him when I have been at Perth. He occasionally appears in jury trials, but I believe that is the most of the duty he does.

8470. He has a depute at Perth?—He has an excellent depute who does the work, and is paid by a salary a very little higher than that of the depute at Dunblane. With reference to Sheriff-clerks, it is generally thought that it would be very desirable that they might act as interim Sheriff-substitute. They have no particular interest in cases, and in many cases it is very desirable that they should take pleas in absence of the Sheriff. We have great difficulty in many districts in getting a proper party to act as interim Sheriff-substitute.

8471. The Chairman.—Does the Sheriff-clerk not act sometimes as Sheriff-substitute?—No, never now. There was a decision, or some remarks made against it.

8472. But you think that would be expedient?—Yes.

I am anxious to state with reference to writs, pleadings, and procedure, that I think that the Recovery of Debts Act ought to be repealed, and that the Small Debt Act ought to be extended to cases of £50 in value. If this were done, several amendments would require to be made in the Small Debt Act, the most important of which are: (1) Power to agents to appear in all cases; (2) A suitable table of fees to be fixed; (3) The first diet to be a diet for hearing merely; (4) Appeals on points of law on cases stated, to be allowed in cases beyond £5 in value; (5) The defender to be allowed to remove any case above £25 to the ordinary courts on finding caution, provided the crave be made at the first calling of the case. The present Sheriff Court Act should apply to all cases beyond £50, with the following amendments: (1) The summons to be a short printed writ, calling the defender into court, with particulars annexed, for which the procurator should be allowed a small fee, so as to make decree in absence inexpensive; (2) Proofs to be taken, by the Sheriff dictating to a shorthand writer; (3) Power to advocate for jury trial all cases above £50; (4) Summons to contain warrant to arrest and inhibit; (5) In all cases condescendences and defences cannot, I think, be dispensed with, but where they can, I think pleas of parties, as provided for by the Recovery of Debts Act, a better form of making up the record than a minute of defence.

8473. Mr. Baxter.—Have you anything to say about the extension of the Sheriff's civil jurisdiction?—I would extend it to all cases generally, and specially in regard to questions as to heritages. I know many hard cases in my own practice, with reference to small properties especially. In regard to divorce, the want of an available court for dealing with such cases, when the parties are in humble life, is an evil which it is impossible to exaggerate. Suppose a man separates from his wife for causes which would warrant divorce, and she continues her cohabitation with another man, by whom she has a family, the unfortunate husband being undivorced, continues legally bound for her maintenance and that of the adulterous children, and that responsibility may be enforced by them or by the parish.

The Right Hon. LORD COLONSAY in the Chair.

Alexander Nicholson.

Alexander Nicholson, Esq., examined.

8474. The Chairman.—You are a practitioner in the Sheriff Court of Fifeshire?—I am.

8475. In the Cupar district?—Yes; in the eastern district.

8476. Is that the larger or the smaller district?—It is the larger district.

8477. Have you been long a practitioner there?—For sixteen years.

8478. Do you hold any official position?—No; I am a solicitor and banker.

8479. There are a good many practitioners at Cupar?—Yes, upwards of 20 in the town of Cupar, besides those in the other towns in the eastern district. There are probably 50 or 60 practitioners in the eastern district altogether.

8480. Attending the Cupar court?—Yes; or entitled to practise there.

8481. These practitioners are scattered in the different burghs along the coast?—Yes; from Kirkcaldy to St. Andrews.

8482. Have you any observations to submit to the Commissioners in regard to the constitution of the Sheriff Courts?—I don't know that I could suggest any alteration upon the constitution of the Sheriff Court. I am in favour of retaining the double Sheriffship.

8483. Do you think that a review within the court is an expedient thing to have?—I think it is.

8484. A review by the Sheriff of the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute?—In my opinion, it would be an advantage to have the judge in habitual attendance on the Supreme Court, in considerable practice, and having opportunities of coming in contact with the heads of the law here. I think it is an advantage to give the Sheriff the power of reviewing the judgment of a person residing in the district.

8485. That is the present constitution?—It is.

8486. You think there is an advantage in his attending the courts, so as to familiarize himself with the progress of the law, and the decisions and practice of it?—That is clearly the opinion that I have formed.

8487. The appeal to the Sheriff is a cheap system of appeal?—It is very cheap, and I think that is one of its chief recommendations; that even those who would go to the higher court, will get the opinion of a competent lawyer at very little expense.

8488. Are there many of the decisions of the Sheriff-substitute at Cupar appealed to the Sheriff?—I think I may say that the whole of them, or nearly the whole of them, upon the merits, are appealed to the principal Sheriff. There are also other judgments appealed, such as the judgments allowing a proof, and disposing of preliminary objections under the Sheriff Court Act of 1853.

8489. But these are not so uniformly appealed as the others?—No; they are seldom appealed—especially interlocutors allowing a proof; but the judgments on the merits are almost universally appealed.

8490. Mr. Paterson.—Is what you have stated the prevailing opinion of your colleagues?—I don't think it is universally so, but it is the opinion of a very large majority of them.

8491. Mr. Baxter.—Has your body met and considered it?—We had it under consideration on Monday fortnight.

8492. Did you come to any resolution about it?—We came to no resolution. We had just a discussion among ourselves. There were some dissentients, but the prevailing opinion was what I have expressed.

8493. You came to no resolution on the subject?—No; nor was I instructed to say anything particular upon the subject.

8494. Mr. Paterson.—What are your reasons for preferring the double Sheriffs, as at present constituted, to an ambulatory court of appeal of two Sheriffs?—I think it is very likely that if such a tribunal were constituted, they would dispose of the cases offhand, without taking them to avizandum, as the principal Sheriff does. When a debate takes place before him, he very seldom disposes at once of the case, unless it is a very plain and simple one. He takes it to avizandum, and has an opportunity of considering the arguments and the authorities quoted, as well as any authorities which he may turn up himself. I think, therefore, that is a more mature judgment than would be pronounced by the ambulatory court.

8495. Mr. Baxter.—Why should not the ambulatory court take the cases to avizandum?—There is nothing to prevent that, but I think it is more convenient for one judge to do so than two judges. If they took it to avizandum, they would have to meet and consult about it afterwards. I think it would be necessary for them to dispose of it immediately after the debate.

8496. Mr. Paterson.—But supposing they find themselves not quite at one, do you see any harm in their making avizandum, just as the Sheriff would do?—No, I don't see any harm; but I think it would cause some inconvenience to meet and have consultations afterwards.

8497. Mr. Adam.—If they found that their impressions agreed, do you think they would be likely to dispose of the case then and there, without fully considering it?—That is my opinion.

8498. Mr. Baxter.—Would that not be equally the case with a single judge?—I don't know that the opinion of two Sheriffs is much superior to the opinion of one Sheriff in a matter of that kind; and I don't know that much respect would be paid to these ambulatory judges. I think it would be attended with inconvenience.

8499. Where would they fix the hearings?—They would need to go to every seat of court.

8500. Mr. Morton.—While nearly all the judgments on the merits are appealed to the Sheriff-principal, can you give us a notion how many are advocated?—A very small percentage is advocated from our courts.

8501. Then the judgment of the principal Sheriff is generally accepted as conclusive?—Unless in very important cases. There are very few advocations from our courts.

8502. Mr. Baxter.—Has the expense of the Court of Session anything to do with that?—I would not say that it has not.

8503. The Chairman.—Do you think it has?—I think it has. I think there is a very strong feeling in the provinces that the expense of obtaining a review of the judgment of the Sheriff is so disproportioned to the sum in dispute, that parties are very reluctant to take it.

8504. Do you think that there would be any advantage in making the judgment of the Sheriff final up to a certain point?—In my opinion, it would be an advantage to make it final up to £50.

8505. You think that below that the expense of the Court of Session review would be so great as to make it either difficult to be obtained, or a hardship to go through with it?—I think it would be a hardship, at any rate; and I think, from the experience of the Sheriff-principal and the Sheriff-substitute, cases of that pecuniary amount may safely be left to their decision.

8506. Have the cases that have been advocated from your court been generally cases of much importance?—They have been cases of importance mostly; but sometimes there have been cases of very little importance advocated, in order to obtain delay, and probably with a view of forcing the opposite party into a compromise. I am afraid there have been cases of that description, though I cannot say they have been numerous.

8507. Perhaps there have been cases in which the litigants displayed temper, although the subject-matter was of little value?—Sometimes.

8508. Does it appear to you that there are any alterations which could be made with advantage on the form of proceeding within the Sheriff Court?—I think the Sheriff Court Act of 1853 works very well, upon the whole; but I think some alteration might be expedient in the pleadings. At present the record may be made up in two ways: either by a minute of defence appended to the summons; or when parties don't agree to close in that way, which they too often don't do, then a record is ordered to be made up by condescendence and defences. I think it would be better to allow the record to be made up in one way. My opinion is—and I know that the opinion of my brethren in that respect is—favourable to doing away with the minute of defence; and, in defended cases, to have the pursuer to give in a short condescendence, and the defender a short defence.

8509. Has any mode occurred to you of ensuring that these papers shall have the character you ascribe to them, of being short?—In our court, I think, they generally are short; and the Act of 1853 is very well framed to accomplish that purpose, if the judge enforces the provisions of it.

8510. Mr. Baxter.—You would have no short record at all?—We very seldom close upon a minute of defence. When the case is called, we are appointed to state the ground of action and the nature of the defence. Generally we come with a short minute of defence, if we think it is possible to close upon that; and the opposite agent may be allowed to see it for eight days, or to consider whether he shall consent to close on it. Very frequently—I would say three out of four times—there is a declinature to close on that. Delay occurs, trouble has been occasioned in framing the minute of defence, and an order to make up the record by condescendence and defences follows.

8511. Does the Sheriff always grant that when it is asked?—I think he cannot refuse it, under the Act of 1853, if the parties don't consent.

8512. The Chairman.—It has been suggested that perhaps a note of reply by the pursuer would supersede any further record in many cases?—It might. That is another way of looking at it; but it might be short, or it might be long, and it would certainly not be so conveniently framed as an articulate condescendence and an articulate statement of facts for the defender. The minute of defence is generally a statement of the defence without being put under substantive heads, and the reply would be very much in the same way. It is very apt to get into an argumentative document rather than a mere statement of facts.

8513. An argumentative document would be an irregularity?—It might be so. The difference in point of expense would be very little.

8514. If an action is merely a claim for debt, say upon an account, and the summons states that the party is owing an account herewith produced, and the defence is that the account is paid, or that the debt was never contracted, would there be any occasion for more than a reply by the pursuer that it was contracted at a certain time?—Nothing more in such a case, and sometimes not even that.

8515. In the great majority of cases of pecuniary claims, would there be any reason for going into a separate articulate statement of fact?—Sometimes explanations require to be given, if the case is going to a proof, which it would be convenient to have on record, so that the parties might be tied down to a certain line of examination of their witnesses.

8516. Mr. Paterson.—As I understand it, you are quite in favour of short records?—Quite.

8517. But you think they ought to be made up in general by condescendence and revised defences?—By condescendence and defences—not revised defences.

8518. You think that could be done with economy and despatch, provided the court and the practitioners see that the case is stated succinctly?—Yes; and it would be very convenient to have the record made up in that way preparatory to a proof, and the expense of such a record is no reason against it.

8519. Is the practice in your court at Cupar in favour of what is called the short defence, or in favour of condescendence and defences?—It is in favour of condescendence and defences.

8520. Do you find that to work well?—We do.

8521. Does it not induce delay as compared with the other?—Well, there are only six days allowed to lodge a condescendence. If an order for condescendence is taken at the calling of the summons, there are only six days allowed to lodge the condescendence, and ten days thereafter for the defences. If you have the option to close on the minute of defence, there is more delay. Very generally there is an adjournment to consider whether you can close on the minute of defence.

8522. Have you heard of any such thing at the Cupar court as closing on summons and defences?—I have heard of such a thing, but it is not very common. The closing on condescendence and defences is more frequent.

8523. Dr. Barclay.—In the case of a prescribed account, if it is denied, would you make up a condescendence and defences?—Not necessarily.

8524. You would just deny resting-owing?—Yes.

8525. Mr. Campbell.—In cases of affiliation how would you do?—In cases of affiliation it is invariably the practice to make up a record by condescendence and defences. You have to be very specific in averment, and I don't think I could put my finger on any case where the record was closed on a minute of defence in such a case.

8526. Dr. Barclay.—In that class of cases do you not find also that the defender frequently alleges familiarity with other men?—Very frequently, and we always make up the record by condescendence and defences.

8527. The Chairman.—Have you any suggestion to make with reference to the procedure in the Sheriff Court?—No; it does not appear to me that anything calls for amendment in the procedure prescribed by the Act of 1853, except that the records should be closed either in one way or the other, and that there should not be any option given.

8528. Do you think that the opportunities for appeal are too frequent in the course of preparing the case?—It does not appear to me to be so, and I don't think it has been abused in that way. There is a right of appeal on questions put during the proof, but the proof is closed before any appeal is taken, and an appeal is taken after that. I cannot say that there has been any abuse of the right of appeal, so far as my experience goes.

8529. Are there many appeals upon preliminary defences?—They are not very frequent. Sometimes it happens in order to get delay.

8530. Is it common to order a proof at the same time that the preliminary defences are disposed of?—The preliminary defences are sometimes disposed of before a proof is allowed, and sometimes they are reserved, and a proof allowed.

8531. Then are there many appeals against the allowance of proof?—No; that is not a common thing.

8532. Are your appeals to the Sheriff generally considered upon oral or upon written argument?—Generally on oral argument. We minute an appeal, and crave to be heard orally. Sometimes there is a reclaiming petition, but they are not frequent in our court; and I would suggest, in regard to that, that a party might have the option of lodging a reclaiming petition, but I don't think he should get a larger fee for it than for the oral hearing. Sometimes reclaiming petitions by their length are abused, when they are allowed to be charged by the sheet. I think a litigant or an agent ought to have the option of one or the other, but I think one fee should be applicable to both.

8533. That would enable a practitioner to rely more upon his pen than upon his speech, and to conduct his clients' cases at the same expense?—Every person is not so able to state a case orally as he would be to state it in a reclaiming petition, and I think it would be but fair to the bar and to the litigants to allow the option; but I think when a person resorted to the reclaiming petition, he should just get the same fee as for the oral hearing.

8534. And the time should be limited?—Yes. Sometimes a reclaiming petition is necessary in this way: a crave for an oral hearing is sometimes lodged to obtain delay in a case requiring despatch. If a person wants to obtain delay, the Sheriff of his own motive orders reclaiming petition. That sometimes happens in cases of ejection, and in summary cases of that description. But in any case, whether ordered by the Sheriff or done by the agent himself, I think the fee ought to be as I have stated.

8535. Have you any further observations to make on the course of procedure?—I cannot say that I have. As I have already said, I think the Act of 1853 is very well framed with reference to the procedure.

8536. Do you approve of the form of summons?—I think it is a very good form of summons. I don't know that I would desire it to be altered or improved on. It is very short, and any agent in any practice at all can state his case in the form in use.

8537. Do you think the jurisdiction of the Sheriff ought to be extended in any direction?—I think it ought to be extended. There are several points in regard to which I think it would be an advantage to extend it. I think it should be extended to heritable rights. Probably we feel the disadvantage of the present system as much in our county as anywhere. We have a great many small properties. Feuing is conducted in a very extensive way in our county, and we have numerous small properties of little value, ranging from £20 to £100. I think it would be very desirable that the judge ordinary should have jurisdiction with respect to heritable rights.

8538. Would you limit the amount of value?—I think adjudications should be competent before the Sheriff; and probably they might be limited to properties from £150 to £200, or to claims from £150 to £200.

8539. But in other heritable questions you don't propose any limit?—No. We have just now irritancy of feus under the Act of 1853, where the subject is of the yearly value of £25. I think that is too limited.

8540. Would you have that to go to any extent?—I would say so. Then, in possessory questions, questions of heritable title come up every now and then, and it is a very great inconvenience and hardship for the litigants under the present system; for instance, when a question arises as to possession, they are limited to the seven years' possession. The Sheriff cannot go into any other question, because it involves competition of titles; and in the most trifling disputes there is considerable expense incurred, and sometimes the Court of Session differs from the Sheriff in such cases. I think the Sheriff should have power, at any rate, to dispose of questions of competition of titles, in order to enable him to give a decision regarding the question at issue.

8541. Would you give him jurisdiction in actions of declarator of right?—I don't know that that would be of very great advantage.

8543. As, for instance, a question of road?—Yes; a question of road, or the like of that; or a question of boundary or encroachment.

8544. That would be substantially a declarator of right?—It would have that effect. I don't think a process should be sisted in a case such as I have put, in order to bring a declarator in the Court of Session.

8545. You would supersede the necessity of a declarator of right, by allowing that to be disposed of in the cause?—I think that would promote the ends of justice in such cases, and save a deal of expense and trouble.

8546. Mr. Paterson.—Do you apply any limit in value to the cases of the kind you are speaking of?—No; I would not. I don't know that you could very well do so. Such a question might arise as between two large proprietors, as well as between two small proprietors.

8547. You would give the Sheriff the power of determining any matter of heritable right, where the question involved possession?—Yes.

8548. That is, virtually, unlimited heritable jurisdiction?—In that department.

8549. Most questions involve possession?—I don't know that. In many questions you can bring your declarator without the question of possession coming up.

8550. The Chairman.—Would you give to the parties the power at an early stage to remove such a case to the Court of Session?—I would not be disposed to do that. I don't see any advantage in doing that. I would take the judgment of the Sheriff upon it, and let that be appealed to the Court of Session.

8552. You say you don't think he should be required to take it in his own hand. Would you allow him to use an amanuensis for the purpose?—Yes; I would recommend that. It is a very great deal of labour for the judge to take down the substance of the evidence—first to try to find out the true meaning of the witnesses' answers, and then to take it down himself. The Sheriff-substitute is frequently engaged at proofs for seven or eight hours a day.

8553. And he may not be a very swift writer, and that adds to the delay?—I think it would be an advantage if there was power given to employ an amanuensis or a shorthand writer.

8554. Dr. Barclay.—Have the Sheriffs not that power by the Act of 1853?—Not excepting in cases of sickness or inability. I think it would be also convenient if inhibitions were allowed in the Sheriff Court; that is to say, if the short form of a warrant of inhibition were introduced into the summons, the same as in the Court of Session summons. A very great improvement has been effected by the last Court of Session Act in that respect, and I think it should be allowed in the Sheriff Court summons as well. We can arrest moveable property to any amount, and I think it is very inconvenient not to have a right to inhibit also, and let notice of such inhibition be recorded in the register in the same way as in the Court of Session. It is a very hard case when a person is pursued who has only a small property worth £20 or £30, and it is the only thing the creditor can get at, that he is obliged to come to the Court of Session for letters of inhibition on the dependence, or after he gets his decree.

8555. It has been suggested that the giving the warrant on the summons might lead to too frequent and oppressive use of inhibition; and that although there might be power to grant warrant to inhibit, that had better be done by a separate application in the Sheriff Court?—I am not very particular as to the way in which it should be done, excepting as to the matter of expense; but I think the jurisdiction ought to be extended as to that.

8556. The Chairman.—Are there any other classes of cases to which you think the jurisdiction should be extended?—I think the proceedings under the Conjugal Rights Act should also be competent in the Sheriff Court. That is, at any rate, that the Sheriff should have jurisdiction co-ordinate with the Lord Ordinary. There are sometimes very small sums involved in such questions, and frequently injustice is sustained by the party in not having a cheap way of getting the property protected. There are also alimentary cases between husband and wife. At present the Sheriff has only power to award temporary aliment, and the time must be fixed. A summons is raised in the Sheriff Court, and our practice is to fix the time within which an action must be raised in the Court of Session. I think the jurisdiction of the Sheriff should be extended to awarding aliment in cases of that description.

8557. Do you think that questions of status should be brought under the jurisdiction of the Sheriff, such as divorce, declarator of marriage, declarator of legitimacy, and declarator of bastardy?—I would leave that with the Supreme Court.

8558. It has been said that it is a hardship on poor people, that they cannot get divorce cheaply in the Court of Session, and that they are obliged to put up with the evil, or that it has the effect of driving them into a course of immorality?—I don't know that the expense of the Court of Session, where the proof is necessarily taken, is much more than it would be in the Sheriff Court. If you were to extend the jurisdiction there, I am afraid you would require to include all cases.

8559. Mr. Baxter.—Have you had any experience of divorce in the Court of Session?—No, I have not.

8560. The Chairman.—Are there any other matters that you think the Sheriff ought to obtain jurisdiction in?—It occurs to me also that he ought to have the power of appointing factors under the recent statute.

8561. Judicial factors?—Judicial factors and factors loco tutoris.

8562. Mr. Baxter.—And other such officials?—Yes. I know a case of that description, where a farmer died leaving a widow and a young family, and the person entitled to the office of tutor-at-law does not care for the appointment, and another competent person who would manage the farm during the remainder of the lease, or till the majority of the children arrived, can be got, but they are afraid of the expense of applying to the Court of Session. A petition to the Sheriff, and decerniture, would be got at a very trifling expense, and would be quite satisfactory to the parties.

8563. Is that an actual case which has occurred?—Yes; a case of that description has happened under my own notice.

8565. The Chairman.—Is there any other matter to which you think the Sheriff's jurisdiction should be extended?—No, it does not occur to me that there is any other matter which I should specially advocate the Sheriff's jurisdiction being extended to.

8566. Does it occur to you that there is any mode of cheapening the expense of litigation in the Sheriff Court?—I don't know that there is, unless there was to be a fee given to the agent for the process according to its amount, in the same way as is fixed—I am sorry to say, in my opinion, at too low a rate—under the Debts Recovery Act. I don't think that the fees of agents in the Sheriff Court are extravagant; and the proportion of the expense of conducting a litigation in the Sheriff Court that goes into the agent's pocket is not very considerable. The expenses of such an action are generally very much increased by the number of witnesses, and the fees paid to witnesses.

8567. You think that slump payment is not a bad principle?—I would not say that it is. I rather think that it is not bad in principle. It would be a check on any abuse of the forms of process, for unnecessary precognitions, and various other steps that one agent might think it his duty to take, where another would not do so.

8568. Would you have an uniform charge, because that would not be paying an agent according to the amount of work he had to do in each case?—There would require to be a scale according to the valuation of the cause. There would be less, of course, in a case where no proof was necessary; and there would require to be a scale in cases where no proof is led, and in cases where proof is led.

8569. Mr. Baxter.—You would require to have a scale according to the work done, as well as according to the value of the cause?—Yes.

8570. Dr. Barclay.—You make the distinction between cases that go to proof and cases that don't go to proof?—Yes.

8571. Mr. Paterson.—You are in favour of an ad valorem scale, distinguishing the cases which go to proof and those which don't, under the Debts Recovery Act?—No; I mean to extend the principle which has been introduced by that Act. I think the fees in the Debts Recovery Act are too small, especially where there is a proof. Witnesses require to be precognosced and examined; there is a debate in the case; and there is all the preparation for that, and I think the fee is too small. I would be afraid that it would turn out that the agents just do less work because of the smallness of the fee, and probably don't always do justice to the cause.

8572. Mr. Baxter.—Don't you think the scale of payment by a slump fee would have that effect?—I don't believe it, if the fee was something like adequate, which I believe the Sheriff could very easily fix, by looking at an average of what the cases had cost for a certain period of time.

8573. Mr. Adam.—Do you think that the fees under the Debts Recovery Act would be sufficient if proofs were paid for extra?—No; my opinion is that they are still inadequate to command proper services upon the part of the agent to his client.

8574. Mr. Paterson. — Could you suggest to the Commissioners a scale of fees that would be more suitable?—I think it might be safely left to the Sheriff, but I could give my own impression of it.

8575. You say that the amount of the fee may in some cases occasion negligence or carelessness in the conduct of the cause on the agent's part. Do you find that in practice?—The Act has only lately come into operation.

8576. Then you mean it is a temptation in that direction?—I don't say it has occurred, for the Act has not been long in operation. But the highest fee allowed to an agent is £4, for recovering a debt of £50. A proof might be led, and a considerable number of witnesses examined; precognitions require to be taken, and so forth. No doubt, in the ordinary case, that is by far too inadequate a fee for the work which has to be done.

8577. Dr. Barclay.—But in another case, where there is no proof, may it not be a great deal too much; for example, where there is a mere reference to oath, which often takes place under that Act?—In that case it would be sufficient.

8578. Mr. Baxter.—Would it not be more than sufficient?—I don't know.

8579. Suppose you had a scheme of payment in that way in the ordinary court, might it not be much more than sufficient?—I don't think it would. At present it is not so. You have the fee for the summons, and for calling, and all that sort of thing.

8580. You don't think the better way would be to remunerate the agent according to his work?—Well, I am not wedded to the suggestion I have made; but that has been enacted, and I don't see any great objection to its being extended.

8581. Mr. Adam.—Do you think that in the Sheriff Court at present there are too many small fees allowed, and that it would be better to have larger fees and fewer of them?—We find a good deal of squabbling and fighting before the auditor, and I think it would prevent that. It would have a tendency to prevent a good deal of the keenness exhibited before the auditor.

8582. The Chairman.—With regard to the mode of appeal from the Sheriff to the Court of Session, do you think you could suggest a mode of appeal more economical than that which has been lately introduced?—I think it is as economical as any that could possibly be introduced. There could not be a simpler appeal than a minute on the interlocutor sheet; but with reference to that, there is a point of practice which may turn out to be inconvenient. A party is now allowed 20 days to minute an appeal. He may not do so, and the decree in the inferior court cannot be extracted for 20 days. I think, in a case of that description, inconvenience and loss may frequently occur by the delay in issuing the extract; and I think it would be better that the time for appealing should be limited to 8 or 10 days—8 days, I think—and then some further time allowed in maturing the proceeding after the appeal is proceeded with. Perhaps the party should be obliged to minute his appeal in a shorter time; and failing his doing so, that the extract should go out, and prevent any misapplication of funds by the debtor, or anything that would be injurious to the creditor.

8583. Allowing him some time afterwards to complete the proceedings or to drop them?—That would be a preferable plan.

8584. Dr. Barclay.—But if the party were to minute the appeal, that would equally stop the extract, and he might fall from it?—Yes; but at present, where they don't even intend to appeal, there are 20 days allowed.

8585. But parties would note the appeal, and fall from it?—They might be subjected in expenses if they noted an appeal, and if they did not follow it up.

8586. The court have the power just now, on cause shown, to allow summary extract, without waiting the days, where it can be shown that the party is vergens ad inopiam: might that not be done on special motion to the court to allow the extract?—In a special case of that description there is a remedy; but parties are not always in a position to make an averment that the party is in that condition, and it is not always safe to do so.

8587. Your remedy is, that they should note the appeal within a shorter period than is allowed by the statute?—That is my view.

8588. The Chairman.—You think an agent would hesitate to note an appeal, if he had no intention that it should be taken?—I think so. I don't think that respectable agents would note appeals merely for the sake of noting them, or obtaining delay.

8589. But it is a more simple mode to remain silent, and say or do nothing, which of itself operates the delay?—Yes; an agent is not then committed to any practice that might be condemned by his opponent.

8590. Mr. Paterson.—But you think the remedy would be to shorten the time for appealing?—Yes; otherwise I admit it is as simple a way of taking the case to the Court of Session as could be devised, and it is a great improvement on the old process of advocation.

8591. The Chairman.—In regard to the ultimate time that should be allowed, it may be necessary to make it longer than in many localities would be required, because parties in certain localities may wish to communicate with their clients who may be at a distance, and wind and weather may interfere with their getting their answers; and therefore to make it so short a time as 8 days absolutely everywhere might not suit?—It might not; there might be places where a longer time should be allowed.

8592. Dr. Barclay.—Have you formed any opinion on the new provision, allowing parties to appeal without finding caution?—I am of opinion that that is not a good provision. I think, if causes are taken to the Court of Session, the party ought to find caution.

8593. The Chairman.—For expenses?—For expenses. I think a party who is able to do so is put to no inconvenience; and the form of juratory caution is so easily carried out, that I regret that that change in the law has taken place.

8594. Do you think it has added to the number of appeals to the Court of Session?—It has hardly had time to tell yet. But I should think it would add to the number of appeals where the parties had not a very good case, and where they might expect, by dragging their adversary to the Court of Session, to effect a compromise. I think it is calculated to increase the number of appeals of that class.

8595. Parties who are not in the condition that would induce their friends to become cautioners for them?—I think it has a tendency in that direction.

8596. Mr. Paterson.—You think the finding of caution tests the good faith of the advocator, in short?—I think it is calculated to do that. The advocator comes to the court of review, then, really desirous to have the judgment of the court, and not for the purpose of punishing his adversary or obtaining delay; and I don't think there is hardship in that case in finding caution for expenses.

8597. The Chairman.—Have you any suggestion to make as to the privileges of agents?—I am not specially desirous to see agents having exclusive privileges.

8598. It has been suggested that it would be expedient that agents, who are admitted upon an examination, should be entitled to practise in any Sheriff Court that they choose; to settle down in one place, and to move to another without undergoing examination there—not that they should be necessarily admitted to the benefit of the Faculties who have property and rights of another kind, but merely that they should have the privilege of practising. What is your opinion as to that?—If any agent were to remove permanently from one Sheriffship to another to commence business, I think he should be entitled to do so; but I don't see any advantage of giving an agent in one county the privilege of going to conduct a particular case in another county. I don't think an agent in large practice would ever do so, and I think the advantage to other agents is too insignificant to alter the rule. I think it is a great advantage to country practitioners to be confined to their own Sheriffdoms, while they are resident within their own district.

8599. Dr. Barclay.—Are there not a number of Forfarshire practitioners in your court?—Some are admitted as procurators in our court.

8600. And still reside in Dundee?—They reside principally at Newport. They carry on business at Dundee, and are admitted procurators in our court; but in almost every case they employ a correspondent in Cupar to conduct their business. Occasionally they come themselves; but that must occasion inconvenience to them, and it must add to the expenses of the client. They can conduct the business much more economically by a correspondent at the seat of the court.

8601. I presume they always give a receipt when they borrow a process?—No; we would not like a process to go to Dundee, except on the receipt of a procurator residing at the seat of court.

8602. Who would be liable to the process of summary caption?—Yes, who would not trifle with the process and keep it up, because he is in contact with his brother agents every day.

8603. The Chairman.—It has been suggested that local practitioners should be permitted to follow their cases into the Court of Session, and conduct them there?—I am not at all in favour of that. I think the agents in the Court of Session should conduct the business in the Court of Session; and I don't think it would pay any country practitioner to follow his case to the Court of Session, and conduct it there. No practitioner in extensive practice would do so, and I don't think it would pay a practitioner not in extensive practice, unless he were to make extra charges against his own client, and I don't think that should be encouraged.

8604. Some suggestions have been made as to the charges of country agents not being allowed in the Court of Session against the losing party, when expenses are given. Have you any experience in that matter?—Yes, I am sorry to say I think there is great hardship occasionally in that case. When a proof is conducted on commission, for instance, it is almost necessary for the interests of the client that the country agent, who frequently takes the precognition, should be present at the examination of the witnesses. It is also necessary and proper that the Edinburgh agent should be present. I understand that the Edinburgh agent gets the fees, and that the charges of the country practitioner are disallowed, and must go against his own client. I think there is a hardship in a case of that description. I admit that to allow his charges would be double agency; but in special cases such as I have mentioned, I think that should be allowed.

8605. Mr. Paterson.—Have you considered what the instruction to the auditor should be in such a case?—I think, when the auditor saw that the precognitions were taken by the country agent, he should allow the attendance of the country agent at proof.

8606. That is in regard to the proof?—That is what I refer to. Attending a proof taken on commission or jury trial.

8607. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—You mean the proof before the judge ordinary?—Yes; my remarks would apply to the proof before the Lord Ordinary in the same way, but I have experienced the hardship of it in the case of proofs on commission.

8608. Mr. Paterson.—Would it meet the difficulty if the auditor had it as an instruction to allow all the charges of the country agent which were necessary or incidental to the cause, and did not infer a double charge?—That would be depriving the Edinburgh agent of his charge.

8609. I mean that the two agents should not be paid for doing one and the same thing?—It would be doing one and the same thing if they both attended at proof before the Lord Ordinary.

8610. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think that many clients in the country are able to give the Edinburgh agent efficient and proper information to conduct their causes?—In my experience, very few are able to do so.

8611. Suppose it is necessary to take the aid of the country agent to do that, do you think the country agent's account should not be allowed if he gains the case?—I think a portion of it should be allowed. It is done on both sides. Very few country clients are able to correspond and instruct the Edinburgh agent, so that it is absolutely necessary to instruct the country agent, if they are to have the slightest prospect of success.

8612. Don't you think that work which is absolutely necessary should be allowed for in the expenses of the cause?—Yes; but that principle applies to precognitions and getting up evidence.

8613. Does it not apply to correspondence also?—As to correspondence it might be abused. The auditor might check that; but I think it would meet the case, without incurring a very great deal of double agency, if the precognitions and the attendance at the proof, and probably the attendance at the debate, were allowed.

8614. Dr. Barclay.—Is not the principle that the auditor goes on, that the Edinburgh agent should correspond directly with the client?—That is the theory of it.

8615. And the practice too?—Yes; and it places the country agent in a very disagreeable position. Even when the client gains his case there is a very large bill to pay to the country agent; and the country agent has all the responsibility of the case, and unfortunately he gets no little of the odium after the case is finished.

8616. And is not that very frequently put down to the debit of the Court of Session?—I am afraid it is sometimes put down to the debit of the Court of Session unjustly.

8617. And people who have gained their case say that they have to pay a large sum to their country agent?—I have often heard that said, and that nothing would induce them to go to the Court of Session again. I have often heard that remark. It is too common in the country.

8618. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestion to make?—No.

8619. Have you any suggestion to make with reference to the criminal business before the Sheriff?—I think the jurisdiction might be extended there also.

8620. Would you give the Sheriff the power of inflicting heavier punishment?—Yes.

8621. Penal servitude?—Yes; and I think the class of gentlemen we have as Sheriffs and Sheriff-substitutes would conduct the business with an extended jurisdiction so efficiently, that probably the Circuit Courts might be dispensed with.

8622. Would you extend the Sheriff's jurisdiction to all classes of cases?—No; I would not extend it to cases of murder; but I don't see why fire-raising, and some of those other pleas exclusively belonging to the High Court, should not be made competent before the Sheriff.

8623. Dr. Barclay.—Such as robbery?—Yes; robbery and fire-raising, and probably rape too. But I would not be disposed to take the trial for murder out of the hands of the Supreme Court.

8624. Mr. Paterson.—Why would you exclude murder, when you take all the other pleas of the Crown to the Sheriff?—I don't think they are at all to be compared in enormity to murder.

8625. Dr. Barclay.—Are you not aware that by the common law of Scotland, the Sheriff has jurisdiction in certain cases of murder just now?—I am.

8626. And that he has also the power of inflicting capital punishment; the last case in which he did so having taken place in Glasgow in 1798, for housebreaking?—I think the jurisdiction of the Sheriff has been rather curtailed than otherwise. In connection with that, I should also wish to mention that, in my opinion, both the Sheriff-substitute and Procurator-fiscal should get their appointment from the Crown rather than from the Sheriff-depute.

8627. The Chairman.—Do you think the appointments have not been satisfactory?—I think the appointments have been satisfactory, and the duties have been very well discharged in all cases, both by the Sheriff-substitute and by the Procurator-fiscal; but I think it would be better that the appointments should be in the hands of the Crown.

8628. Mr. Baxter.—Why?—I don't know that I would go very minutely into my reasons for that.

8629. The Chairman.—Has the Sheriff a special interest in selecting the best person he can get for his substitute?—I should think he has; and he generally does so; but I think a Crown appointment would have more the appearance of an independent appointment than one by the judge who is to review the judgment of the Sheriff.

8630. Do you think that the selection by the Sheriff of his substitutes has been less successful than the selection of the Sheriff-deputes by the Crown?—I don't know that it has; and from anything I have seen, the selection by the Sheriff-depute has been very judicious; but probably it is more a matter of sentiment than anything else, and probably some of the litigants might view it in that light too.

8631. Mr. Campbell.—You think it is not consistent with the respectability of a judicial office, that the person holding it should be appointed otherwise than by the Crown?—I would not put it so strong as that. I don't say it is inconsistent with the respectability of the office; but I think it would give greater public satisfaction, and would be more calculated to prevent observations from the public as to the performance of the duties, if the appointment came from the Crown.

8632. Mr. Paterson.—And it would be more compatible with the independence of the Sheriff-substitute?—Yes. I would go that length; at least I think that might be the popular opinion. At the same time, I think that in practice the Sheriff-substitutes are quite independent, and exercise their independence; and I believe Procurators-fiscal are in the same position; but still I think it would be better that the appointments should be vested in the Crown.

8633. The Chairman.—The Sheriff is the person who is responsible for the criminal duty in his county?—Yes.

8634. Is it not important for him to select the best person he can get for his Fiscal?—As a matter of course, it is of the utmost importance that he should get the best talent that he can command, and I could not point out a case where that has not been the rule.

8635. Would your object not be accomplished by having certain checks upon the appointment and dismissal?—I think there are checks upon the removal of the Sheriff-substitutes at present.

8636. But as to the Fiscal?—I have not given any consideration to what checks might be effectual. I have never known a case of the removal of a Procurator-fiscal.

8637. Mr. Shand.—Nor of a Sheriff-substitute?—Nor of a Sheriff-substitute.

8638. Dr. Barclay.—You are aware that, whilst the Sheriff makes the selection of the substitute, his selection must be indorsed by the heads of court?—I understand so. But I presume that is matter of form. I don't think that the Sheriff would present a name to the heads of court that would likely be refused.

8639. The Chairman.—That is a check on the Sheriff's nomination?—Yes, and I believe the Sheriff's nomination would be good without such a check, for I think the Sheriff would take care, for his own credit and the good of the Sheriffdom, to make a judicious appointment; but I think it would be better that the judge who reviews the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute should not have the selection.

8640. You say you think the approval of the heads of court is a matter of form. Are you aware that they never do approve without having personal knowledge of the individual, or very satisfactory testimonials as to his qualifications?—I quite believe that. I was not aware of the process gone through; but I can quite believe that, so far as the heads of the court are concerned, every precaution would be taken to have that properly done.

8641. Dr. Barclay.—May there not be something in this, that a Sheriff would not wish to put in as a substitute a better man than himself?—There are a great many considerations that would induce me to adhere to the view I have expressed. I have one other suggestion to make on that point; and it is, that the Procurators-fiscal should not only be—as they are, I believe, throughout Scotland—men of eminent capacity for performing their duties, but that they should be remunerated, so that it would not be necessary for them to conduct civil business.

8642. The Chairman.—Have you considered what the cost of that would be in some localities?—I understand that the salaries generally are very adequate even at the present moment for the duties performed—at least they are very fair; and suppose some little addition were made to ensure their devoting their time to the criminal business, I think it would be an advantage. Suppose £700 or £800 a year is given to a competent man in a moderate-sized county for conducting the criminal business, I think that is very fair remuneration, and much more than the average incomes of practitioners in such a county, who perhaps perform more onerous and more arduous duties.

8643. Dr. Barclay.—Does your Fiscal carry on any separate business?—The Fiscals in our county carry on civil business.

8644. Both at Cupar and Dunfermline?—Yes.

8645. In your experience, which has been considerable, do you find that that has been attended with any evil?—I never observed any case where the Fiscals in our county, or elsewhere, have neglected their Fiscal duties; but I think that they should be so remunerated that it would not be necessary for them to conduct civil business. These duties are not always compatible; for in the discharge of their official duties they may come in contact with clients of their own in civil cases, which in my opinion renders the present arrangement unsuitable. I think it would be a relief to the gentlemen themselves, that they should not be put into such a position.

8646. Mr. Baxter.—Then you would require to rearrange the districts?—That would be necessary.

8647. And I suppose you would give them retiring allowances?—Certainly, after certain periods of service.

8648. Dr. Barclay.—Have you thought whether a new arrangement could be made in regard to the Dunfermline and Cupar districts?—I have not considered that specially.

8649. Or whether there should be an amalgamation with Kinross?—I have not considered that; but it might be expedient. I quite admit that the duties in the western district don't occupy the time either of the Sheriff-substitute or of the Procurator-fiscal nearly to the extent that the duties in the eastern district of the county do.

8650. Do you consider that it could be done by one man in each office?—I think it would be too much for one man as Sheriff-substitute.

8651. And the Fiscal?—I think the Fiscal might do the whole duties of the county if he conducted no civil business.

8652. That would enable his salary to be increased?—Yes; but if there was anything about the rearrangement of the county under its present officials, I don't see why Kinross and the western district of Fifeshire should not be allied; but the time of the Sheriff-substitute in the eastern district is fully occupied with his duties.

8653. The Chairman.—Does your Sheriff-depute come frequently to Fife?—He comes pretty frequently; and that reminds me of a suggestion which occurred to me, that if the Sheriff-deputes are to be maintained, they ought to be obliged to come more frequently than they are under the Act of Parliament. The Sheriff-depute comes pretty frequently—probably once in six weeks or two months; and we have no reason to complain of any undue delay in fixing diets of hearing. He comes very frequently.

8654. Lord Barcaple.—That is to say, he comes to the eastern district once in six weeks or two months?—Yes.

8655. And he may visit the western district at times when you have not access to know of it?—I cannot speak to that; but I think I am near the mark, when I say that he is not longer away from our district than six weeks or two months.

8656. You know that he pays separate visits to the western district?—I don't doubt that he is as attentive to the western district as to the eastern district.

8657. Dr. Barclay.—But there is not such a great call upon him there?—Not nearly.

8658. The Chairman.—He tries cases by jury?—Yes; it is very seldom that our Sheriff-substitute is called on to try jury causes.

8659. Dr. Barclay.—You mean that the Sheriff takes the second diet?—Yes; the Sheriff-substitute takes the pleas at the first diet, and the Sheriff-depute presides at the trial.

8660. The Chairman.—He exercises a surveillance over the police of the county generally?—I think he does; but I am not particularly conversant with that.

8661. Have you any Burgh Court in Cupar?—We have the ordinary Bailie Court.

8662. Do they dispose of civil causes?—There is no such thing before them.

8663. Do they dispose of any criminal matters?—Trifling cases.

8664. Police matters?—Police matters.

8665. Do they do so under a special Act, or under the General Act?—Under the General Act. They have also jurisdiction under the Police Act of 1850. We have not adopted the last Act of 1862.

8666. Is that jurisdiction satisfactorily exercised?—I have not heard any complaint about it, but I have little experience of it. I don't think there are any serious cases tried there. They are handed over to the county Fiscal. They are just small breaches of the peace, and trifling cases of that description. The cases that are tried in the Burgh Court are not of any importance.

8667. Do the Justices of the Peace hold Petty Sessions in the county?—They do very frequently.

8668. What kind of cases do they dispose of?—Statutory cases—cases under the Road Acts, the Trespass Acts, and the Public-Houses Acts. In the Cupar district, very little, if anything, is done under their civil jurisdiction in small debt cases. These are all done by the Small Debt Court.

8669. They grant licences for public-houses?—Yes; that is peculiar to them in the county, and the magistrates in the burgh.

8670. Their acts are reviewed by the Quarter Sessions?—Yes; and I think a remedy is required there. The judges in Petty Sessions should not sit in the Quarter Sessions when their judgment comes to be reviewed.

8671. You mean that the particular judges who granted or refused the licence should not review their own judgments?—I think they should not; but they do so regularly at present. I don't know that much injury is caused by it, because the other members of the court are generally more numerous than the Justices of the Petty Sessions; but I don't think that it is a right principle.

8673. Dr. Barclay.—Have you ever heard of Quarter Sessions being packed for that purpose?—Yes; it is too often the case, I believe; and sometimes the judges in the Petty Sessions, probably without meaning it, show a little zeal in defending their own judgments, which is not at all commendable.

8674. The Chairman.—If they are satisfied that the judgments are right, ought they not to maintain them?—It would be difficult to persuade them that they are wrong.

8675. Is the review of the magistrates' acts in that matter satisfactory?—They are very much the same as in the other cases. The Provost of the burgh is generally a Justice of the Peace and a member of the Quarter Sessions, and he appears there to defend the judgments.

8676. Then the same observation applies there?—It applies both to the county and to the burghs.

8677. Dr. Barclay.—Do the magistrates or the Sheriff in Cupar exercise jurisdiction in the aliment of civil prisoners?—The Sheriff alone.

8678. Are you aware that the Prison Act gives a cumulative jurisdiction to both?—Yes; but it is never exercised. They don't clash.

8679. The Chairman.—Have you a Dean of Guild Court in Cupar?—We have.

8680. Does it exercise any jurisdiction?—Yes; in the matter of new buildings, or alterations on buildings.

8681. What jurisdiction does it exercise in regard to these?—They approve of plans; and when an encroachment by one proprietor on another in altering his property takes place, there is a petition presented either for interdict; or when a party wishes to make alterations, a petition is presented for the approval of the Dean of Guild, and answers are allowed by the neighbouring proprietors; and the Dean of Guild and his assessors visit the place, and pronounce judgment.

8682. Do you think that a useful jurisdiction?—I think it is.

8683. Do you think it would not be so convenient to have it vested in the Sheriff?—From my experience of it—and I have had some experience—I think there is no injury done by leaving it in the hands of the Dean of Guild.

8684. How is it as to expense?—The expense is very trifling. The town-clerk, who is always a professional man, and generally a high class professional man, keeps the Dean of Guild and his assessors right in point of form.

8685. Dr. Barclay.—Is he not the assessor?—He is the clerk of court.

8686. Has the Dean of Guild a council?—The Dean of Guild has three or four assessors, appointed to him by the magistrates, that he may advise with them on questions of practical difficulty; but so far as the forms of procedure are concerned, and the judgment to be pronounced, the town-clerk practically does that.

8687. The Chairman.—The Dean of Guild signs the judgment?—Yes; but the town-clerk frames the interlocutor or judgment.

8688. Dr. Barclay.—Are the Sheriff-clerk and the Commissary-clerk one in your county?—Yes.

8689. Do you find any advantage in making the same individual act in a double capacity?—I don't see any disadvantage in it at all.

8690. Have you had any questions arising, where he had to act in the one character as well as in the other?—I have not had experience of such; but I don't see why he should possess, or be supposed to possess, two separate characters.

8691. The Chairman.—Are the records of the Sheriff-clerk and the Commissary-clerk kept in the same building?—Yes; they are kept in the County Buildings.

8692. Dr. Barclay.—Do you see no objection to there being one clerk?—No; I think it is a convenience. I would rather recommend the offices to be combined.

8693. You are aware that the one is a salaried officer, and the other is paid by fees?—Yes; I know the Commissary-clerk is paid by fees.

8694. Is that right?—I think the Commissary-clerk should be put in the same position as the Sheriff-clerk, having a fixed salary, and accounting for the fees. Sometimes we think the fees of the Commissary-clerk are too high. That is our opinion. I don't say they are too high, or that there is anything improper in the charges; but we think they are too high in proportion to the Sheriff Court fees.

8695. The Chairman.—There is a table of fees for the Commissary-clerks?—Yes, but a very old one. It has not been revised so frequently as the Sheriff Court table of fees.

8696. Do you think the recent revisal of the table of fees has tended to reduce the amount of the charges?—I think so. I think the table of fees has been very judiciously revised of late years.

Alexander Nicholson.

8697. You think the tendency has been to reduce them?—I think the tendency has been so upon the whole, and to prevent any unnecessary multiplication of business or steps of business.

William Bishop Dunbar.

WM. BISHOP DUNBAR, Esq., examined.

8698. The Chairman.—You reside in Dundee?—I do.

8699. Are you in the Procurator-fiscal's establishment there?—I am one of the Procurators-fiscal.

8700. For the county of Forfar?—For the county of Forfar at Dundee.

8701. Is there a separate Fiscal for the burgh?—There is a burgh Fiscal.

8702. Dr. Barclay.—And one at Forfar?—Yes. There is one in the Forfar district of the county.

8703. You were assistant for some time at Perth?—For about six years.

8704. The Chairman.—How long have you been in Dundee?—I was in Dundee from 1851 till 1857. Thereafter I was about six years in Perth as assistant Fiscal; and after that I returned to Dundee, where I have been since.

8705. Then you have seen a good deal of the working of the Fiscal establishments?—I have.

8706. I believe you have devoted a good deal of attention to matters of form, the difficulties and inconveniences that may result from them, and the improvements that may be made upon them?—I have.

8707. Have you any suggestions upon these subjects to offer to the Commissioners?—Yes, I have several suggestions.

8708. I think you have written a treatise on the subject?—I have written a pamphlet on Escapes of Prisoners on Technical Grounds. The first matter which I should like to call the attention of the Commissioners to is the amendment of criminal libels.

8709. You think there should be a power of amendment?—I do.

8710. Would you limit that in any way, either as to the extent of the amendment, or the stage at which it should be made?—I would allow it to be made either before or during trial.

8711. What as to the extent of the amendment?—I would allow it on any matter as to time, or place, or modus, or person, or any other particular.

8712. Dr. Barclay.—Without altering the crime?—Yes, without altering the nature of the crime.

8713. The Chairman.—Would you have any check on these amendments, by the judge allowing or not allowing them?—Certainly.

8714. If you alter the time, and place, and name, and modus, that would be a very large alteration on the libel?—Yes; but I do not contemplate amendment in all these particulars in any one libel; and it is just in one or other of these matters that discrepancies have occurred in our practice, whereby parties have escaped punishment.

8715. Are not these the circumstances that constitute the act charged, and bring it within the description of the offence alleged?—No doubt they are; but still it is just in these matters that discrepancies sometimes occur between the indictment and the matter brought out in the evidence.

8716. Does it occur to you that the prisoner might be placed at an unfair disadvantage by such a change on the case that he was called upon to answer?—No, it does not occur to me that the prisoner would suffer prejudice. But I would leave that matter to the court. If the court were of opinion that the prisoner would suffer prejudice, they might adjourn the case, if necessary, to give the prisoner further time to prepare for his defence.

8717. What are your reasons for the alteration which you suggest?—My reason is, that justice would be prevented from being defeated on mere technical grounds by these amendments being allowed.

8718. Do guilty prisoners sometimes escape because such amendments are not allowed?—They do.

8719. Mr. Shand.—Would you leave it in the power of the court to refuse the amendment asked by the prosecutor?—I would be inclined to do so.

8720. The Chairman.—If the court thought it was placing the prisoner at a disadvantage, they would have power to refuse it?—Yes; I would be inclined to leave that in the hands of the court.

8721. What other suggestion have you to make?—I think that if the present form of indictment—the syllogistic form—is to be retained in our practice, the court, in considering the major proposition, ought to look to the minor, to explain the major, and show whether the matter set forth in the major is really criminal or not.

8722. Is not that done?—It is not.

8723. Would you explain what you mean by that? The court sees the major proposition; they judge whether that is an offence or not; then they look to the minor to see whether the circumstances there stated amount to an offence, and amount to the offence which is set forth in the major?—With deference it is not so, and I may refer to a case in point. I refer to the case of Michael Hinchy, who was for some years Chief Constable of Forfarshire. He was charged with fabricating false accounts against Exchequer, and with rendering these accounts with intent to defraud Her Majesty's Exchequer. An indictment was raised against him, which charged, in the major proposition, the fabrication of false accounts with intent to defraud, and uttering false accounts with intent to defraud. The case was brought before the Circuit Court of Justiciary at Perth a few years ago, and the counsel for the panel pleaded that this major proposition might include a mere innocent error in arithmetic, or the mere rendering of an incorrect account. The court sustained the objection to the major proposition, and did not look to the minor, which consisted of about 100 pages, to see whether that minor would support a criminal charge or not.

8724. In that case it came to this, that the statement set forth in the major might or might not be an offence?—Precisely so. But the matter set forth in the minor undoubtedly was an offence, and detailed a long list of fraudulent practices.

8725. The Lord Justice-General.—Would it not be a better amendment in that direction, to abolish the major proposition altogether?—I think so, decidedly.

8726. The Chairman.—Your suggestion would be, that the syllogistic form should not be continued?—Or if continued, that the minor ought to be looked at in determining whether the major sets forth criminal matter. I would rather that the major were abolished. I think it would simplify our libels very much.

8727. It would just be in the form of a complaint against a party for having done certain things?—Very much like our summary complaint.

8728. Would you have any statement of what the offence was that had been committed? Perhaps you would bring it in at the conclusion, 'whereby he was guilty of murder,' or how would you make it?—I would be inclined to adopt very much our present form of indictment, which I think is much neater than our criminal letters, abolishing the syllogistic form, and simply setting forth that a certain party is accused, at the instance of Her Majesty's Advocate or the Procurator-fiscal, of having, at a specified time and place, committed a certain crime.

8729. Dr. Barclay.—Would you name the crime there?—Yes; that, for instance, the accused did at a certain time and place steal certain articles, the property of a certain person.

8730. Would you not say that he did commit theft, in so far as, etc.?—I see no objection to that, provided the naming of the crime before the narrative is not to be construed as a major proposition, and judged of per se, but to be explained by the minor.

8731. The Chairman.—In the case you quoted, it would be that the prisoner committed the crime of fabricating certain documents, in so far as he did so and so?—Yes; under the foregoing explanation.

8732. Have you any further suggestion?—I am of opinion that the Sheriff's power of punishment ought to be extended to penal servitude, in order that the Sheriff might try the various cases of theft aggravated by previous convictions, which are now generally punished by a term of penal servitude. They are cases of a very simple character; and merely because of this aggravation, they are deemed worthy of a sentence of penal servitude. I think the Sheriff might dispose of these cases.

8733. Dr. Barclay.—Would you include house-breaking?—Certainly.

8734. The Chairman.—Any other classes of cases than thefts aggravated by previous convictions?—Yes. I think ordinary robberies ought to be sent also to the Sheriff. The distinction between robbery and theft is exceedingly thin; and sometimes those cases called robbery, which are tried by the Supreme Court, result in a mere Sheriff Court sentence.

8735. Would you extend the power of sentencing to penal servitude, to any length of penal servitude, or would you limit it to a certain period?—I think it might be limited to seven years.

8736. Do you think that the public prosecutor should send to the Sheriff the trial of such cases as did not appear to him to imply a larger amount of punishment than the Sheriff had jurisdiction to award?—Just so.

8737. Have you anything further to suggest?—I think that previous convictions should not go to the jury except in special cases, as an element in proof of guilty knowledge. I think also that convictions for all offences ought to be admitted, and taken into consideration in determining the question of punishment.

8738. The Lord Justice-General.—You mean that they should not be proved till after the verdict has been returned?—I mean so.

8739. The Chairman.—Would you say the same of 'habit and repute?'—I propose to abolish 'habit and repute' altogether, for these reasons: officers differ very much as to what constitutes 'habit and repute.' Some officers think it invidious to be called upon to prove that aggravation, and at present it cannot be proved for a less term than twelve months; whereas I would propose that in any case, whether a party has been previously convicted or not, if he has borne a loose character, although for a less period than twelve months, that loose character should be proved in the same way as the previous convictions.

8740. Would you give him notice that that was intended to be proved?—I have not thought of that.

8741. He might disprove it?—I think a prisoner ought to be prepared to defend his character.

8742. Ought he to bring witnesses if he does not know that his character is to be impeached?—Well, that would be impossible; but I cannot conceive a man's character being challenged, unless it were notoriously bad.

8743. Mr. Baxter.—Suppose at the trial he should attempt to set up a good character for himself, would you not allow the previous convictions to be proved in that case?—Certainly.

8744. The Lord Justice-General.—At what time in the course of the trial would you allow the prosecutor to prove the previous convictions?—It would necessarily require to be after the evidence had been led by the prisoner in support of his good character.

8745. Then it must be a replication?—Yes; and it is so in England.

8746. The Chairman.—Would you allow the prisoner to adduce evidence of his good character before the jury?—Certainly.

8747. And in that case you would allow the proof of previous conviction to be brought before the jury?—Certainly.

8748. But unless the prisoner attempted a proof of good character before the jury, you would not allow the previous convictions to be proved till after the verdict?—Just so.

8749. And if it was a verdict convicting him, you would allow them to be proved in aggravation of punishment?—Yes.

8750. Dr. Barclay.—Would you allow 'habit and repute' to be proved in the same way as previous convictions?—I would allow evidence of bad character; but I would drop the denomination of 'habit and repute.'

8751. But you would adduce that evidence after the verdict, with the view of aggravating the punishment?—Yes.

8752. You must give notice in the indictment that that is to be done?—I have not considered that; but, for the reason above explained, I do not think that would be necessary.

8753. What objection have you to the term 'habit and repute,' if you are going to prove bad character? Is it not a nomen juris which we have been accustomed to?—Yes; but it has got rather into bad odour, and has been so for a long time, and officers think it invidious to be called on to prove it. They don't like it.

8754. If you find a difficulty in proving it before the jury, would not the same difficulty occur before the judge?—No; I do not mean to prove habit and repute before a judge, but bad character generally. In the one case the officer speaks to repute or opinion, and in the other case he would speak to facts—such as, that the prisoner associates with certain known parties of bad character, or lives in a disreputable house. These facts may be patent to him.

8755. The officer is always asked by the judge why he comes to the conclusion that the prisoner is habit and repute a bad character, and he states the very things you have mentioned?—Sometimes he is cross-examined, and states reasons such as these; but sometimes it appears that the prisoner works occasionally, and therefore the judge directs the jury to find the aggravation of 'habit and repute' not proven.

8756. The Lord Justice-General.—And what is the evil arising from that?—If the aggravation of habit and repute is found not proven, then he gets the benefit of a good character, when in point of fact he has not a good character.

8757. You mean, of not having a bad character?—Yes.

8758. Dr. Barclay.—Have you observed that lately the aggravation of habit and repute has gone very much out of practice?—I have.

8759. Have you not observed that, where there are previous convictions, it is seldom supplemented by habit and repute?—It has very much gone out of practice.

8760. At one time every indictment had the words 'habit and repute' on the back?—Yes; it was almost stereotyped at one time.

8761. The Chairman.—Have you any other observations?—In regard to the matter of bail, I think the practice at present is unsatisfactory, and that it works unequally: for example, three acts of theft, or one act of theft with two previous convictions, preclude bail. We are constantly saying that the resetter is as bad as the thief; but a person charged with reset, to any amount whatever, is entitled to demand bail. A person charged with embezzlement or fraud, to any amount, is entitled to demand bail, although he may be a much worse offender than the parties charged with theft.

8762. What do you suggest about that?—I would suggest that, as bail is regulated at present by determining whether the offence charged is capital or no, those offences now theoretically capital should be declared to be no longer so, and that whether a person should be entitled to bail or no should be a matter for the judge.

8763. The Lord Justice-General.—In any case?—In any case.

8764. Mr. Shand.—Are there not some offences that you would still say were not to be bailable?—Yes.

8765. The highest class of offences you would still leave without the right to bail?—Certainly. Undoubtedly murder should not be bailable; also rape and wilful fire-raising.

8766. The Chairman.—Do you think the amount of bail ought to be in the discretion of the judge?—I think so.

8767. Dr. Barclay.—Without any appeal?—I think the judge to whom the application was made should be quite competent to decide as to the amount. But I would further suggest, that in all cases where bail is applied for, intimation ought to be made to the prosecutor, in order that he might appear for the public interest, and object if he thought proper, or see that a fair amount was fixed.

8768. Mr. Paterson.—In your experience, are bail bonds frequently or rarely forfeited?—There have been a number of bail bonds forfeited in my experience.

8769. In those cases where the bail bonds were forfeited, was the amount of the penalty less than the amount of the stolen property?—Yes, very much less.

8770. Supposing stolen property to be of the value of £100, and it is a first case of theft, what would be the amount of penalty in the bond?—At present it would not be bailable.

8771. Suppose the value of the stolen property to be £50?—It depends very much on the judge.

8772. Dr. Barclay.—And the class of the individual?—Yes; but I have seen such a case as has been mentioned, in which the bail was fixed at a sum of about £20.

8773. Mr. Paterson.—Where the stolen property amounted to £50?—Yes.

8774. Is that the class of bail bonds that are more generally forfeited?—The cases in which parties have more frequently, in my experience, failed to appear, have been cases of fraudulent bankruptcy. There are two or three cases in my mind, and one in particular, which I may cite. A party fraudulently put away property to the value of about £600; and had he been charged with theft, he would not have been admitted to bail. The bail was fixed at about £40, and he did not appear. In that case the Procurator-fiscal had no voice in the matter.

8775. Lord Barcaple.—Have you many cases of theft in which bail is taken?—We have not very many cases of theft.

8776. Because you were asked a little while ago as to the bail forfeited being small in proportion to the pecuniary amount of the offence, it being an offence involving the making away with property or money?—Yes.

8777. Like embezzlement or fraudulent bankruptcy?—Yes; the amount fixed is much smaller than the pecuniary value of the property stolen or fraudulently put away.

8778. Mr. Shand.—Would you extend the class of bailable offences?—Some robberies, with slight violence, might be bailable. At present, a theft aggravated by two previous convictions, or by housebreaking, is not bailable.

8779. The Chairman.—Would you have these made bailable?—I would rather not. I don't think they are cases for bail.

8780. Mr. Campbell.—Does not the Lord Advocate frequently sanction bail being accepted in cases which do not fall within the class of cases ordinarily bailable?—Not frequently. He has the power, but it is rarely exercised.

8781. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestion to make?—In the matter of special defences, with which a list of witnesses is lodged, the time at present is much too short for lodging that list. It requires to be lodged on the day before the trial; and in practice it is often lodged the night before the trial, so that it is impossible to examine the witnesses on that list, even suppose they were residing in the town where the list is lodged, and often they are miles distant. I would therefore propose that a list of witnesses for the defence, or any special defence, should be lodged some days before the trial.

8782. Mr. Adam.—Have you seen a fictitious list given in immediately before the trial?—Frequently.

8783. A list of people who knew nothing about the matter?—Yes.

8784. Mr. Baxter.—A long list?—Yes; I had a case a few weeks ago, in which a list of about thirty witnesses was lodged. None of these witnesses in point of fact knew anything about the matter, and I have no doubt the list was lodged for the purpose of causing the prosecutor to move for the desertion of the diet pro loco et tempore.

8785. And that has been done frequently?—Yes; and I knew a case where justice was very nearly defeated; the panel was running his letters.

8786. Mr. Shand.—Would you refuse to allow the panel to examine witnesses unless the names were communicated eight days before the trial?—If a time is fixed within which the panel is ordained to lodge his list, I would refuse to let him examine them, unless notice was given before that time had expired, or unless some special cause was shown.

8787. Would that course at Circuit not often lead to grievous injustice?—I don't think so.

8788. Is not the list of panel's witnesses very frequently sanctioned after counsel have arrived at the Circuit town?—Sometimes.

8789. Would you deprive the prisoner of that benefit which he now has?—I think if an order was made that the panel should within a certain time before trial lodge a list, there would be no difficulty in obeying that requirement. At present the practice is exceedingly loose, because the prisoner does not require to lodge a list till the day before the trial.

8790. The Chairman.—Anything further?—In regard to parties taking a run through different counties, and committing offences in each, such as theft or fraud, unless the case is of a very serious nature, and worthy of the consideration of the Supreme Court, the practice at present is to try that party in one only of the counties for the offence committed in that county, and he escapes from all the other offences.

8791. He can only be tried for the offence he committed within that county?—Yes, at present.

8792. Mr. Adam.—The same thing occurs at Circuit, where crimes are committed in different counties, some of which are not in the same Circuit?—Yes.

8793. The Chairman.—What would you suggest?—I would suggest that there should be power to try the accused for the various offences which he has committed, or with which he is charged, in the county or place where he was apprehended.

8794. Although that may not be one of the counties in which he committed the offence?—I am afraid we would require to make it a condition that it should be in one of the counties in which he committed the offence. I was thinking of the probability of his being apprehended in a county in which he committed the offence.

8795. Mr. Campbell.—I presume you mean that he ought to be tried for all the offences which he has committed in counties in Scotland, in any one of the counties in which he committed any one of the offences?—Yes.

8796. Mr. Paterson.—Would it not be a simpler remedy to send him to the High Court?—No doubt, but it might be a case which was not deemed worthy of the High Court.

8797. Mr. Adam.—If you send to England for a criminal, is it not a hardship that he must be taken to a Border county to be committed?—Yes. That is the statutory requirement at present.

8798. Can you not bring a criminal from London by sea?—No; that would be against the terms of the statute. I think there is a case in which Lord Colonsay was counsel a good many years ago, where a warrant was suspended, because the prisoner, on being apprehended in England, was brought to Scotland by sea instead of by land.

8799. The Chairman.—What was that case? Was it a bank robbery?—It was the case of Matthews against the Glasgow Iron Company.

8800. Mr. Adam.—At present, in practice, criminals are taken to a Border county, and committed there?—I am rather afraid that the officers wink at the statute; and I would suggest that the prisoner, instead of being detained at a Border county, should be brought immediately to the place where the crime was committed.

8801. Mr. Baxter.—The requirement of the statute is, that they shall be brought before the magistrate of the Border county, and that he shall indorse the warrant?—Yes.

8802. I believe that that is very seldom done, now that there is such rapid communication by railway?—I believe it is very seldom done. If the statute were carried out, it would lead to considerable delay.

8803. The Chairman.—You think the statute ought to be amended in that respect?—I think so, decidedly. The provision is unnecessary now.

8804. And inconvenient?—Yes.

8805. Have you any further observation?—I think that the Baron Bailies' jurisdiction in matters criminal ought to be abolished.

8806. Is it much resorted to in Forfarshire?—I am happy to say it is not much resorted to.

8807. The Lord Justice-General.—Is it much resorted to anywhere?—I am not aware that it is much resorted to. But there was a very strong case which came under my own observation—a case in Abernethy. A party was cited at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of Perth to appear to answer to a charge of assault. He appeared, and pleaded res judicata, in respect that he had been already convicted before the Baron Bailie of Abernethy. There had been something like a trial and conviction; but the proceedings were very ludicrous. The complaint was a most informal document. It did not set forth the date or the place, and the court was held in a baker's loft. The sum of 2s. 6d. was imposed as a fine, which the Baron Bailie put into his own pocket. Altogether it was a farce; and it appeared, on inquiry being made, that this was purposely done in order to prevent a conviction before the Sheriff.

8808. Was the defence sustained?—The defence was sustained. I remember Dr. Barclay ordered the whole proceedings to be transmitted to Crown counsel, and the matter was considered by Crown counsel, and no further proceedings were taken.

8809. Then it did not come to trial?—It did not.

8810. Dr. Barclay.—Did not the Lord Advocate send down a very severe censure?—He did.

8811. Mr. Harrison.—That Baron Bailie, I suppose, did not hold regular courts?—He did not.

8812. He got up this one for the purpose?—Yes.

8813. The Lord Justice-General.—I suppose he did not hold any more courts after that?—I am not aware that he did. We did not hear of any. But that is not the only case in which a Baron Bailie conviction has been sustained as res judicata. There are several.

8814. The Chairman.—But that was a fraudulent case?—It was.

8815. Have you any other suggestion?—There is a small matter as to the practice in jury trials. In cases where, upon a second diet under a Sheriff and jury criminal libel, the diet is deserted pro loco et tempore from the absence of witnesses or otherwise, I think it should be unnecessary to go through the formality of having another first diet when the party has already pleaded not guilty, and that he should be cited on short inducie to a diet at which jurymen and witnesses would be present. In this way a good deal of delay would be saved.

8816. The Lord Justice-General.—Cannot that be done at present?—No; we have to go through the formality of two diets.

8817. Are the two diets indispensable in the Sheriff Court?—Yes.

8819. Mr. Paterson.—With special mandate?—Yes; of course the court would require to see that the procurator was fully empowered.

8820. Mr. Adam.—Don't you think a man who meant to plead guilty might plead not guilty by a procurator at the first diet, and come up himself at the second diet, and then plead guilty?—Yes; and I don't see that that would be objectionable.

8821. The Chairman.—Have you any further suggestion?—No.

8822. The Lord Justice-General.—With reference to the amendment of the criminal libel, I think you said you would allow that to be done at any stage?—Yes.

8823. After the prosecutor has led his evidence?—Yes.

8824. And after the evidence has shown that the offence was not committed at the time or in the place specified in the libel?—Yes; but I do not contemplate discrepancies in both these particulars in the same instance, nor such as could have misled the panel.

8825. And in the case of an assault, that it was not committed upon the person libelled?—Well, I would not go the length indicated in your Lordship's question in regard to the case of assault. If it appeared that the assault was committed on a totally different person, I should say the prisoner would be entitled to be assoilzied. But if there was some little mistake in the Christian name—if the party was called John instead of James—or there was some little mistake in stating his trade or his residence, but plainly showing that the party assaulted was the party meant to be set forth in the indictment, I would allow an amendment in that case.

8826. If it sufficiently appeared that he was the same person?—Yes.

8827. But suppose, in a case of theft, that it turned out after the evidence was led that there was a mistake both in time and place, and also in the person whose property the stolen goods were, what would you say then?—Well, I should certainly not say that the panel under that libel should be convicted.

8828. Then there must be some limit?—Yes.

8829. What limit would you propose?—I should like to refer your Lordship to the English statute on that matter.

8830. What is the substance of it?—By the English Act 14 and 15 Vict. cap. 100, amendments on criminal libels are allowed. That Act proceeds upon the preamble that offenders frequently escape conviction by reason of technical strictness of criminal proceedings in matters not material to the merits of the case, and that strictness may safely be relaxed so as to ensure punishment of the guilty without depriving the accused of any just means of defence. The first section sets forth, that whenever, on any trial for felony or misdemeanour, there shall appear to be any variance between the statement, in the indictment, and the evidence or proof thereof in the name of any county, city, parish, or place, or in the name or description of any person stated as owner of property, or persons injured, or in name or description of any person or matter whatsoever, the court may order the indictment to be amended according to the proof; and if they think fit, they may order the trial to take place before another jury. They may adjourn the case, if they think it prejudicial to the panel to go on and finish the trial at that diet.

8831. That is the rule which you would be inclined to adopt?—Yes, substantially.

8832. I understand that to be a permission to amend the libel where there is a variance that under our existing practice would be fatal to the prosecution, but which is not material to the merits of the case. Is that so?—That is so. But the Act sets forth, that an amendment may be allowed where the variance occurs in the name of the county or city, or the description of the person or owners of property—just such discrepancies as occur in our practice. That would exactly meet the evils of our practice.

8833. And the amending of which would not be prejudicial to the interests of the prisoner?—It would not.

8834. It would not take him by surprise in any respect?—I don't think so.

8835. Then that is the limit you would put on the power of amendment?—Yes.

8836. Mr. Adam.—Or to meet the case of surprise, the judge might order the case to be tried by another jury on another day?—Yes.

William Bishop Dunbar.

8837. The Chairman.—That is, in fact, making a new libel, which is to be tried before another jury?—It is amending the libel.

8838. Making it a different libel, to be tried before another jury?—Perhaps it may be so called.

8839. Mr. Shand.—Rather than allow the prisoner to escape?—Yes. I should like to mention a case which occurred recently. A party was charged with the theft of certain property, which was said to be the property of John Hally. John Hally, when he was examined on precognition, said that the property was his. On the trial, it came out that the property belonged to John Hally & Co. The case was tried before Dr. Barclay in Perth, and I prosecuted it. The objection was at once taken, that the prisoner was not guilty of stealing John Hally's property, but he was guilty of stealing the property of John Hally & Co., and he was assoilzied. That is the kind of objection we meet with.

8840. The Chairman.—The English rule would enable you to correct that, and to try the case before another jury, so that the prisoner could not plead that he had tholed an assize. It would be a very different question, if you had then tried him for stealing property belonging to John Hally & Co.?—I apprehend, in such a case as that, the court would amend the libel and go on with the case.

8841. In England generally, the prosecutions are at the instance of private parties?—Yes.

8842. And in Scotland they are rarely—almost never—at the instance of private parties?—I have never known a case at the instance of a private party.

8843. We have in Scotland a public prosecutor, who is supposed to be a person well skilled in these matters, and who can devote his time and attention to them?—Yes.

8844. And to be very accurate in his proceedings, to an extent that can scarcely be expected in private prosecutions?—No doubt.

8845. Do you think there is no risk of giving encouragement to slovenliness, if that sort of power were introduced into Scotland?—I think not.

8846. Mr. Adam.—Do you think the Crown prosecutor would have a sufficient regard to his own reputation?—I have no doubt of it.

8847. The Lord Justice-General.—But his reputation would not suffer so much if these amendments could be made, as it does now by his libel being thrown out. Is not that so?—I do not think that the reputation of the prosecutor suffers at present by any such objection as I have stated.

8848. Dr. Barclay.—You think that the prosecutor is misled by the precognition?—The case I cited is a case in which the prosecutor was not to blame.

8849. Mr. Shand.—And many such cases will occur even with the most careful prosecutor?—No doubt.

8850. Dr. Barclay.—Are you aware of a case of theft from Fife, which was tried by the Sheriff and a jury, where the parish was put in as Collessie; and it was found to be another parish, and the verdict and sentence were quashed?—Yes; I have that case noted. The man was tried for theft in his own house at Rossiebrae, which was libelled as situate in the parish of Auchtermuchty, but in the evidence it appeared that the house was in the parish of Collessie.

8852. The Lord Justice-General.—You have spoken hitherto entirely of amending the libel in the course of the trial, and after evidence has been led. To what extent would you allow amendment of the criminal libel before the trial begins?—I would allow it to be amended in any words of form which were omitted. For example, there was a case at the Circuit Court of Perth about two years ago (Mr. Adam acting as Advocate-depute), in the indictment in which the words 'actor, or art and part,' were omitted.

8853. Mr. Adam.—Was that a case of forgery?—Yes; the omission was discovered, and the case was not called. That is a case in which I think the court ought to have allowed the words to be supplied.

8854. The Lord Justice-General.—You mean, ought to have the power of allowing it?—Yes; I mean so.

8855. Would you allow an amendment in anything more essential than that before the trial begins?—I think the amendments before the trial would relate merely to formal parts of the libel, because discrepancies are, generally speaking, only discovered during the trial.

8856. Mr. Adam.—I suppose, with consent of the prisoner, you would allow that to any extent?—With consent of the prisoner, I would.

8857. The Chairman.—You have had a good deal of experience in regard to taking the declarations of accused parties?—Yes.

8858. Both in the county of Perth and in the county of Forfar?—Yes.

8859. Has it been consistent with your observations that such parties are always warned before they emit their declarations?—Certainly.

8860. Have you witnessed any undue pressure put upon them to answer questions?—I have never done so.

8861. They are told they may speak or not as they please?—Yes; to answer or not as they please.

8862. Mr. Adam.—Do you think it is an advantage to an innocent man that the declaration should be taken at the very beginning?—I do.

8863. Have you seen, in your practice, that an innocent man frequently gets away at once?—Not frequently. I think very few innocent men are apprehended; but there have been a few cases in my experience in which a party emitted a declaration which was forthwith verified, and he got away at once, and the matter was not made public.

8864. The Lord Justice-General.—I suppose there is not a very large percentage of innocent men apprehended for crime?—A very small percentage.

8865. Mr. Adam.—In your practice, do you ask a party if he wishes any witnesses examined?—We do, generally; and particularly in cases which we think are doubtful.

8866. And if he names any parties, you at once examine them?—Yes.

8867. Dr. Barclay.—Especially if he says so in his declaration?—Yes; but we frequently ask prisoners, especially in doubtful cases, whether they wish any witnesses examined; and if they give a list of witnesses, they are forthwith examined.

8868. Do you think it is right to withhold the declaration from the prisoner, if it is libelled on?—No. I would be inclined to concede to the prisoner the power to call for the declaration in all cases.

8869. Mr. Baxter.—You make it a practice to examine into the defence in all cases?—Yes; and to bring out the whole facts.

8870. The Lord Justice-General.—Do you mean that you would give the prisoner a right to have his declaration read to the jury?—I would.

8871. Do you not think that that might sometimes be misunderstood by the jury, as if it were evidence on which they were entitled to rely?—It might; but of course the court would instruct the jury as to that.

8872. But even with the direction of the judge, if the declaration is read, and it contains a very detailed and circumstantial account of the particulars of the supposed offence, or of the transaction which was supposed to constitute the crime, would they not be apt to take it as evidence?—I think those cases would be exceptional in which the jury would be inclined to accept the declaration as evidence.

8873. The Chairman.—To what effect do you think it should be read on behalf of the prisoner?—Simply as his account of the matter.

8874. As the account he gave from the beginning?—If the account which he gave in his declaration was similar to the account which he gave when apprehended, it would be in his favour.

8875. Do you not mean similar to what he gave through his counsel at the bar?—Or to parties who apprehended him, before he was examined.

8876. But if the prisoner is allowed to state in his declaration any story he chooses, and to read it to the jury, without the prosecutor having had any opportunity of cross-examining him on the statement so made, don't you think there is a danger of the jury being led to adopt the prisoner's statement? He is then made practically a witness for himself, without being cross-examined?—Your Lordship puts a very strong case. I must say, from my experience of prisoners' declarations, that they have not contained such statements as I think would be very likely to influence a jury to adopt them as true.

8877. They not unfrequently cast the blame upon other persons—sometimes on other prisoners at the bar along with them?—Frequently.

8878. That of course is not evidence against the others according to our law, and sometimes the court desires such things to be struck out, and not to be read, because they unduly prejudice other prisoners. But in the case I put, might not the prisoner practically make himself a witness for himself?—I do not think, under the judge's direction, the jury would be misled; and there has been so much complaint by prisoners' counsel for being denied the use of these declarations, that the admission of them would remove that complaint.

8879. Is the declaration often refused when it is asked for?—No.

8880. Therefore there cannot be much complaint?—In cases where it is refused, of course the counsel makes a complaint to the jury.

8882. Do you think that, being read by desire of the prisoner, it should be entitled to any different effect from that to which by law it is at present entitled?—No. William Bishop Dunbar.

8883. You don't propose to give it any higher effect?—No; by no means.

8884. And it is not evidence in his favour at present, in so far as regards the facts which he states?—It is not.

8885. Sometimes the prisoner's counsel makes an observation to the effect that the declaration which has been read is not inconsistent with what he is putting to the jury, as a fair interpretation of the import of the evidence at the trial?—The counsel does so.

8886. I suppose it is with that view that you think the prisoner should be entitled to have it read?—It is not only with that view. I would be inclined to let the prisoner have his declaration put to the jury in all cases, and let the jury judge of the truth or falsehood of the story. I don't think the jury, under direction of the judge, would be misled.

8887. The Lord Justice-General.—Do you think that if the prisoner was entitled to require that his declaration should be read to the jury, it might lead to the authorities examining him a little more severely than is now done?—I have not considered the question in that light. Your Lordship has broached a new question to me: but I should think not.

8888. Dr. Barclay.—Would not all these objections be removed by adopting the English practice, in which no questions are put, but where the prisoner is asked if he has any statement to make, with the usual caution that what he does say will be used against him?—The English practice is perhaps more favourable to the prisoner, inasmuch as I think it frequently permits him to escape, when a declaration in Scotland is found to be sometimes material evidence against him; but I would not be inclined to adopt the English practice.

8889. Mr. Adam.—You think the Scotch practice is more favourable to an innocent man?—Yes; and more unfavourable to a guilty man.

8890. The Chairman.—That is one of the ends of criminal law?—Undoubtedly.

MONDAY, 1st FEBRUARY 1869.

Members Present:—

Lord Colonsay.
E. S. Gordon, Esq., Q.C.
Dr. Hugh Barclay.
James Campbell, Esq.
George Harrison, Esq.
James Adam, Esq.
A. B. Shand, Esq.
T. G. Murray, Esq.
James Webster, Esq.
J. B. Baxter, Esq.

The Right Hon. LORD COLONSAY in the Chair.

Andrew Jameson, Esq., examined. Andrew Jameson.

8891. The Chairman.—You are Sheriff of Aberdeenshire?—Yes.

8892. When did you come to the bar?—In 1835.

8893. You were for some time Sheriff-substitute at Ayr?—Yes; I practised till about 1843, with some interruptions from bad health, and then I was appointed Sheriff-substitute at Ayr, for the whole county, in March 1843.

8894. How long did you continue there?—I continued there two years and a half.

8895. You were afterwards Sheriff-substitute at Edinburgh?—Yes,—from October 1845 till October 1865.

8896. You then became Sheriff of Aberdeenshire?—Yes.

8897. I believe there is a good deal of business transacted in the Sheriff Court of Aberdeen?—A great deal of civil business.

8898. You have two substitutes?—Yes, one at Aberdeen, and another at Peterhead; but the business at Aberdeen is much greater than at Peterhead.

8899. Have you considered the matter of the constitution of the Sheriff Courts, as consisting of a Sheriff and his substitutes?—Yes; I have had my attention very much called to that, both before the Act of 1853 was passed, when there was a great deal of agitation on the subject, and also within this year or two; and I entertain the same opinions now that I did in 1853.

8900. Would you have the goodness to inform the Commission what those opinions are?—I am very clearly of opinion that the constitution of the court, as consisting of the Sheriff and the Sheriff-substitutes, is of the greatest importance, and is highly beneficial to the community.

8901. Are there many cases appealed from the Sheriff-substitute to you?—There is a very large number,—I think very nearly all the cases that can be appealed.

Andrew Jameson.

8902. When you state your opinion as to the utility of the Sheriff Courts as at present constituted, do you derive that opinion from your experience as a Sheriff-substitute, as well as your experience as a Sheriff?—Yes; my opinion as a Sheriff-substitute was as strong as it is now as a Sheriff. I view the thing, as it were, from two sides; and the views that I held in 1853 have been confirmed by my subsequent experience.

8903. Would you state generally the advantages that attach to the present system?—There has been a considerable change in regard to the business, both criminal and civil, in the Sheriff Courts within the last 30 or 40 years. I mean that there have been changes in regard to criminal business in this respect, that now very few precognitions require to come to the Sheriff. I remember in my father's time the Sheriff-substitute took a great many of the precognitions, and they were very generally sent to the Sheriff in Edinburgh.

8904. Your father was Sheriff-substitute of Fifeshire?—Yes, for 45 years from the beginning of the century; and I had the benefit of a great deal of his experience, being brought up in family with him. From the improvement of the status and qualifications of the Sheriff-substitutes and of the Fiscals, there is much less of that business now coming to the Sheriffs of counties. That is one change.

8905. You mean before being transmitted to Crown counsel?—Yes. Of course, in very important cases, that duty still remains with the Sheriff-substitute.

8907. Are there many criminal trials before the Sheriff and a jury?—There are more cases that used to be tried at Circuit now sent to the Sheriff.

8908. You mean there are more cases sent by Crown counsel to be tried by the Sheriff and a jury than there used to be?—Yes; but I am not aware that there are more cases upon the whole, because I think that there has been in some districts a diminution of crime.

8909. Does it appear to you that the scheme that has been suggested, of dividing Scotland into five districts, and appointing two Sheriffs as Sheriffs of appeal, to perambulate these districts, would be a beneficial change on the present system?—No; I don't think it would.

8910. Do you see any objection to it?—I think, in the first place, it would diminish one benefit of the present appeal, namely, its small expense. I think it would likely increase the expense, and it would probably lead to delay. And I think it would be a very difficult thing to work. Probably it would not be so difficult if two appeal judges were resident in towns such as Edinburgh, or Glasgow, or Dundee, or Aberdeen; but I understand that is not the proposition. I have a strong idea that if they were to go on Circuit it would be very unworkable. I think that a single judge prepares a complicated case very much better for judgment, supposing it is going to another court of review, and that he sifts a complicated proof much better alone, and on his own individual responsibility, than two men sitting in an ambulatory court could possibly do. Indeed, I don't see how that could be worked at all; at least, I think it would be very difficult. Of course a number of simple cases might be disposed of at once; but I think, in the more complicated and important cases, it would be very difficult to manage. I consider that one of the great benefits just now is the feeling of individual responsibility. I recollect a very important case which has just come into my mind, which commenced by an interdict about a shooting in the Highlands of Aberdeenshire of some value, which was pending in the Sheriff Court of Aberdeenshire when I was appointed Sheriff, and had been pending for five or six years. A proof had been led which, I understand, took nearly six weeks. When it came before me, it was on a judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, who had found that after all this litigation it was a question of heritable right, and he therefore dismissed the case. I held, upon considering the proof very carefully, that it was a question of possession, and that there were materials for regulating the possession, and for giving one of the parties a right of shooting till the question of the right of property was decided. I am perfectly convinced that if any of my neighbour Sheriffs had sat with me in that case, it could not have been easily managed.

8911. Mr. Baxter.—Suppose it had gone to the Inner House, where there are four judges?—I believe it is there now; but the case is now prepared. I had to go over a six weeks' proof, and to take notes of it—to go back on different witnesses, and to compare passages in their evidence,—it is quite a different matter after all that has been already done.

8912. Mr. Gordon.—And printed?—And printed; and references to the proof. I think you must get one man to do that.

8913. Mr. Baxter.—Your Sheriff-substitute is a member of the bar?—Yes.

8914. Both your substitutes are?—No; Mr. Skelton is a Writer to the Signet.

8915. A record is prepared under the Sheriff-substitute's immediate direction?—Yes.

8916. The proof is led before him?—Yes.

8917. He takes notes of the evidence?—Yes.

8918. And afterwards gives his judgment?—Yes.

8919. And in cases where proof is led, you review his judgment, on his notes of the evidence?—Yes.

8920. And the appeal from him, with all these advantages, to you, as a single judge, commends itself to your judgment?—Yes.

8921. And you think that appeal should command the confidence of the public?—I am certain it does command their confidence at this moment. I know pretty well the feeling of the country from the various opportunities I have had, and I must say that the system generally has secured a wonderful degree of confidence on the part of the public.

8922. The Chairman.—Have you considered another suggestion, as to doing away entirely with the intermediate court of review, and allowing an appeal direct from the Sheriff-substitute to the Court of Session?—Yes.

8923. What do you think of that?—I think the operation of that proposal would be to deprive the public of the right of appeal in the great mass of cases. It would be tantamount to depriving the community of the right of appeal in Sheriff Court causes.

8924. Mr. Baxter.—Is that on account of the expense?—Yes.

8925. The Chairman.—In cases of small value, it would have that effect?—Yes. I understand there are upwards of 2000 appeals just now in all the Sheriff Courts, of which hitherto not above 40 or 50 are brought by appeal to the Court of Session. I am not aware of any system that has yet been proposed, of reducing the expenses in the Court of Session, so as to enable any large proportion of these 2000 cases to be brought under the review of that court; and I think it would be a great grievance to the subject, because I believe, both from my experience in Small Debt Courts, which has been very considerable, and in other courts, that there is no country in the world where the right of appeal is more valued than in Scotland. I myself often found in the Small Debt Court of Edinburgh—where at one time my lamented colleague, Sheriff Arkley, and I decided cases to the extent of about £20,000 a year—that there was a very strong feeling of disappointment, on the part, of course, of the unsuccessful litigant, that there was no appeal; and in many of these cases I myself thought it was a great disadvantage. On the other hand, when I saw it was a case of that kind, I endeavoured to get the parties beforehand to agree to remit it to the ordinary roll, in order that they might have the benefit of an appeal; but it was generally very difficult to get them to accede to that. I think there has been another proof of the same thing; when the Act of 1853 was passed, I suggested to the Lord Advocate that a clause should be inserted in order to give the public the benefit of the summary trial of their cases without appeal, and section 23 was then, at my suggestion, inserted. By that section, in all civil cases above £12, the parties may, by minute, agree to have the case tried, proof led, and judgment given after discussion, but without appeal; and I have reason to know that that is almost never had recourse to. I don't think I had half-a-dozen cases during my whole experience.

8926. Dr. Barclay.—You say you are of opinion that in Scotland the right of appeal is a favourite?—Yes.

8927. And yet you tell us that, in the Small Debt Court, when you had an important case, and wished the parties to consent to get it sent to the ordinary roll, it was difficult to get them to agree to do so?—Yes.

8928. And you say that under the clause which you have mentioned in the Act of 1853, the power thereby given is very seldom had recourse to?—Yes. Clause 23 of that Act provides that parties in any case above £12 shall be at liberty to have a case decided out and out according to the small debt principle, but not in the Small Debt Court.

8929. Without appeal?—Yes. I have not had above half-a-dozen of these cases.

8930. I understand the last instance which you gave in support of your opinion, that the appeal was a favourite; but I cannot very well understand the first, namely, that you found the parties were not willing to go into the ordinary court and have the right of appeal. Did that not show rather a desire not to have an appeal?—But that was before the decision was given. If it had been competent after the decision was given, I have no doubt the unsuccessful party would have been very ready to appeal.

8931. But had they not made up their minds that one or other of them would lose the case?—They don't think of that. It is like a lottery,—every man expects to win.

8932. The Chairman.—And it would have required the consent of both?—Yes.

8933. Mr. Gordon.—And you have generally found, I suppose, that what requires the consent of both litigants is very seldom done?—Very seldom.

8934. Dr. Barclay.—You are aware that below £25 there is no appeal to the Supreme Court?—Yes.

8935. Where the Sheriff-principal has reversed the judgment of the resident Sheriff, do you think that there should be no appeal in that case?—I think that is unsatisfactory. I don't myself like to be a judge in cases where there is no appeal from me. I think it is a benefit to every judge to know that there is an appeal from his judgment.

8936. Then you would allow an appeal in that case?—I would allow an appeal beyond £12. Wherever there is an appeal to the Sheriff-principal, I think an appeal should be competent to the Court of Session.

8937. My question was applicable to cases where the Sheriff-principal differs from the Sheriff-substitute, and the case being below £25 there is no appeal; but you say you would allow an appeal in all cases above £12?—Yes.

8938. The Chairman.—But where the Sheriff-principal confirms the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute in cases of small amount, would you then allow an appeal, just as if he had reversed the judgment?—That requires some consideration. I am rather favourable to appeal in every case.

8939. Mr. Adam.—Would you be inclined in that case to qualify it by any condition, such as consent of the judge, or caution for expenses?—I think there should probably be caution for expenses.

8940. Dr. Barclay.—Do you approve of the late Act, by which parties may now appeal to the Court of Session without finding caution?—No, I do not; and I am told that it is not working very well.

8941. Is it increasing the number of appeals?—It is increasing the number of appeals taken; but I understand it does not increase the number of appeals discussed, because they are brought into court and then compromised. However, I cannot speak to that from experience.

8942. Mr. Harrison.—You have said that at present nearly all important cases are appealed. I observe, in a return which I have here, that about three-fourths of all defended causes are appealed. Now, is not the first appeal from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff-depute almost a matter of course?—Yes, it is very much a matter of course.

8943. Is it not taken very much because from its cheapness to the loser it is worth risking the expense of that appeal?—Yes.

8944. Would it not therefore save time and expense if there was a direct appeal to the Court of Session? Would a final judgment not be got sooner than having this matter-of-course appeal?—I think in the end it would not be an improvement, because you cannot go to the Court of Session under an expense of about £25 a side, as compared with from £1 to £2, 10s., which is the expense of an appeal in the Sheriff Court.

8945. Do you think there would be many more appeals from the resident Sheriff, supposing there was only a resident Sheriff without a Sheriff-depute, than there is at present from the Sheriff-depute to the Court of Session?—I don't think the cases would be so well prepared. I don't think the judgments would be so carefully prepared if there was no appeal, because three-fourths of the cases could not bear the expense of being brought to the Court of Session, and practically the appeal would be taken away. The great mass of the cases would be practically unappealable.

8946. Would it not rather be the case that the resident Sheriff would give more attention to preparing his judgments carefully, if there was only an appeal direct from him to the Court of Session, than when he knows that there is a mere matter-of-course appeal in almost every case, without reference to his judgment being careful or careless?—I think that at present he knows it may be appealed to the Court of Session as well as to the principal Sheriff above £25, and I think it is an advantage for every judge to feel that his judgment may be appealed. In the case that you put, that is to say, the doing away with an intermediate appeal in the court itself, practically three-fourths of the cases would not go to the Court of Session at all, and it would have a very bad effect on the general conduct of the cases.

8947. Mr. Baxter.—When the Sheriff reverses his substitute's judgment under the present system, do you think it is calculated to give satisfaction to the clients?—When he gives good grounds for it, I think it is.

8948. Dr. Barclay.—From your long experience, do you think the number of appeals from the resident Sheriff to the principal Sheriff might not be advantageously diminished?—I think so. I think that appeals at various stages of the case are sometimes taken for purposes of delay, and I think it would be an advantage not to allow these appeals without leave of the Sheriff-substitute.

8949. Mr. Baxter.—You refer to preliminary appeals?—Preliminary appeals, such as on questions about sisting procedure, or in regard to the proof. There would be more difficulty in regard to the exclusion of any necessary witness; but there are not many of these cases now.

Andrew Jameson.

8950. Dr. Barclay.—Would you allow an appeal upon the dismissal of a process at a preliminary stage?—If there was a dismissal of the case, it should be appealable.

8951. If there was a case in which a preliminary plea was repelled, and a long proof took place in consequence, might it not be an advantage to have an appeal before the proof was taken?—Yes; that might be an advantage.

8952. The Chairman.—It has been suggested that there might be a saving of an appeal if a judgment repelling a preliminary defence, followed by a judgment allowing a proof, were both appealed together, instead of allowing an appeal first on the repelling of the preliminary defences, and then on the allowance of proof?—I don't see any objection to that.

8953. Mr. Adam.—Supposing the present system to be continued, of one Sheriff and a substitute, do you think that counties might be amalgamated with advantage, further than has been done?—With great advantage. Indeed I think that is absolutely necessary, in order to remove some of the objections that are at present very current, and in order to improve the system.

8954. Mr. Baxter.—Would you enlarge the territories so as to give the Sheriff constant work?—Yes; I would enlarge the territories.

8956. Dr. Barclay.—But is not territory a very important element?—The territory is very large in Aberdeenshire, and I believe the number of appeals is larger than in any other district except Lanarkshire; but I don't think it is too much for one Sheriff.

8957. Mr. Adam.—Do you think it an advantage that the Sheriff-principal should be a practising lawyer?—I think it is.

8958. Then you would not be disposed to give him so much work as a Sheriff as would interfere with a counsel of eminence taking the office?—I think it is of great importance to keep up the connection of the appeal Sheriff with the Court of Session and the bar. I think there are many advantages in that arrangement. I think that when Sheriffs are appointed, it should be absolutely necessary that they shall have been at the bar for a much longer period than three years; I would say that they should have at least ten years' practice; and, in fact, I believe that very few are appointed under that, but I think it should be made the law. By amalgamating the counties as I have proposed, and distributing the business, I think you would probably have, in the long run, a higher average of men of capacity, and talent, and experience, and at the same time you would have the benefit of the same appeal as now, and of the same supervision of the whole county or district. I think there are many advantages in the present system of the connection of the Sheriffs with the Court of Session and the bar.

8959. Dr. Barclay.—You have not turned your attention to drawing out a scheme of amalgamating the counties?—Not with any great pains; but it appears to me that, putting Edinburgh and Glasgow aside, about ten Sheriffs could easily manage the business without being separated from the bar.

8960. Mr. Baxter.—Ten additional Sheriffs?—Twelve altogether, instead of twenty-two as at present.

8961. Dr. Barclay.—Would you propose any amalgamation of resident Sheriffs, doing away with the Sheriff Court in any small place?—That would depend on what is to be done with the Justice of Peace Courts. If the judicial duties of the Justices of the Peace are to be preserved, I think that matter would require to be considered. Even if the Justice of Peace Courts remain as they are, I should think much fewer Sheriff-substitutes would be required. I know that several of them have told me that they have not enough to do, and it is very difficult to get their time employed; and I know others complain very much that they cannot get their salaries raised, because there are some men of the whole number who can hardly ask to have their salaries raised. I believe that, excluding the Highlands and Islands, which, I think, must be regarded as exceptional, there might be probably ten of the Sheriff-substitutes dispensed with.

8962. Mr. Adam.—Do you think one Sheriff-substitute could do the work of your whole county?—Mr. Comrie Thomson, in the height of strength and health, thinks that he could do it, and he is one of the most active men I know; but I don't think he would be always able to take the whole business of the county. But I think the business of Stonehaven and Peterhead, and also of Aberdeen, could be taken quite well by two, and that that would be a better arrangement than the present one, of three substitutes.

8963. Dr. Barclay.—I suppose the introduction of railways has changed these matters very much?—Entirely.

8964. Mr. Baxter.—You spoke of the Highlands and Islands. Do you think that Sheriff-substitutes are necessary there as police magistrates?—Yes; and I think it a great advantage to have a resident officer of the Crown, responsible to the Sheriff in Edinburgh, and to the Lord Advocate, even in districts where there is little crime.

8965. And little civil business?—Yes. For instance, take Lochmaddy; I think it is of great advantage to have a Sheriff-substitute there; so also it is an advantage to have one in the Isle of Skye, for it would be awkward to have these places without any magistrate.

8966. Dr. Barclay.—You don't think the Justices of the Peace would be sufficient in these places?—No; because I don't think the public have the same confidence in them as in a professional judge.

8967. Mr. Adam.—Would you think it desirable that the Sheriff-principal should be required to go more frequently to his county than he is now required by statute?—I think so.

8968. Mr. Baxter.—How often is he required to go?—Only four times a year. And I think a good deal of the outcry in the public prints just now about the office generally, arises from there being some counties where there is almost no business, and where it is said, with some reason, that these gentlemen have considerable salaries and have really no employment to show for them. I think that is an objection which would be better removed. The office generally would be strengthened in that way; and I think it is of great importance to improve and strengthen the office of such a functionary.

8969. And in counties where there is business, does the appeal business sometimes lie over longer than is desirable?—I think it does. And that is the difficulty of having a man in high practice. But I think a man in very good practice might very easily take large counties by going to them once a month or oftener.

8970. If the districts were enlarged as you propose, would the Sheriffs not require to go to them once a month?—I find I require to go to Aberdeenshire about twelve times in the year; and if Scotland were divided into twelve districts, that would just be about my proportion.

8971. Dr. Barclay.—You would not propose putting a Sheriff in large practice at the bar in a small county, and one with little practice in a large county. I suppose you would rather put the best men where there was the most work?—Certainly, if the counsel in high practice would take those large districts, it would be a great advantage. One objection just now is that some of the counsel of the very highest talent have very few appeals to dispose of.

8972. The distance of the counties from Edinburgh comes in there, does it not?—I think that ought to be considered. At the same time I think there is a good deal of delay in appeals, that could be remedied by proper regulation. A good deal of that delay is caused by the parties themselves or their agents.

8973. Don't you think the time for entering the appeals is rather long?—I think so; that might be shortened. There is no occasion for seventeen days.

8974. Is it seventeen days?—It is not quite that; but by taking seven days for minuting the appeals, the parties have so many days more to decide whether they will give in a reclaiming petition, so that they can extend the time more than is at all necessary.

8975. I suppose you see no difficulty when they minute an appeal in six days, and ask an oral debate; but that time would be too short to prepare a written petition?—Certainly.

8976. Mr. Gordon.—Do you approve of the system of written pleadings?—I think they are valuable in certain cases. I think they ought not to be abolished altogether; but I am not very sure that they should be paid according to their length. I think they should be paid according to the same fees as oral debates.

8977. Perhaps it might be left to the judge to say whether he thinks it is a case for an oral pleading, and not to the parties?—I think that would be an advantage. I am certain that there are some cases that could not be well discussed without them.

8978. Dr. Barclay.—But if the same fee were allowed, there would be no temptation to adopt the one more than the other?—No; I think that would be a decided improvement.

8980. The Chairman.—Have you any suggestions about the form of pleadings and procedure beyond what you have hinted at?—I think the Act of 1853 was an immense improvement, and has worked remarkably well in practice; and it would work still better if it were more thoroughly carried out. I believe there are still too many cases made up in the long form of condescendence and answers and revisals, where that is not necessary.

8981. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think the Sheriff has the power of determining whether it shall be made up by a short or a long record?—I think he has, to a certain extent.

8982. Is there not a difficulty about the parties signing?—When the parties will not consent, he can scarcely avoid granting a condescendence.

8983. But is there not a difficulty about parties being required to sign the short record?—There is a great difficulty.

8984. Dr. Barclay.—Have you seen the abuse prevented by an award of expenses?—No, I never saw that done; but I have seen many cases in which it ought to be done.

8985. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think many cases are made up by long records which ought to be made up by short records?—A great many. After the Act of 1853, I found in Edinburgh that almost every filiation case was made up in the long form. I immediately had a meeting with the procurators, and pointed out to them that that was one of the cases in which the form of summons and minute of defence would better suit the circumstances of the case, because there was no use of telling beforehand all that they were to give in as evidence about the intimacy of the parties, and all the outs and ins of it. All they required to tell in the summons was the places where, and the times when, the intercourse had taken place, and then a denial by the defender. And at last, after some little education, I got the procurators to adopt that, and it has worked admirably. When I went to Aberdeen, I found the old system still there; but with Mr. Comrie Thomson's assistance, I got the new plan introduced, and it has worked well there also.

8986. The Chairman.—In that case you introduced a condescendence into the summons by stating time and place?—Yes, in one line. The summons simply said, 'Being the result of intercourse on certain days and at certain places.'

8987. Dr. Barclay.—Supposing there were half a dozen of these, you could not do it in one line?—That occurs very seldom.

8988. Mr. Baxter.—If the procurators had not agreed, do you think you had the power of compelling that?—No, I don't think it; at least I never ventured to try.

8989. Dr. Barclay.—The minute must be subscribed under the Act of Parliament?—Yes.

8990. These paternity cases go over a long tract of time, and involve pecuniary consequences?—Yes.

8991. They also involve the status of the child?—Yes.

8992. Have you not frequently found that in defence, connexion with another man is alleged?—Sometimes.

8993. Have you not found difficulty in cases of that kind?—No. If there is a case of alibi, or a separate defence, the judge can then order a condescendence, and that is very proper; but in the great mass of cases it is a simple allegation, and a simple denial.

8994. Have you never found surprise?—No.

8995. I suppose you have a large number of these cases in Aberdeenshire?—A very large number.

8996. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestions to make as to procedure?—I have sometimes seen a disadvantage from evidence not being taken down sufficiently full. I do not know if I could propose any different arrangement; but I think that sometimes there is a difficulty in deciding cases from the evidence not being fully taken down.

8997. Mr. Baxter.—Would you approve of having a shorthand writer?—I think in important places that would be an improvement; but it would increase the expense very much.

8998. There is a complaint made in some districts, that when the Sheriff is taking down the notes, he writes in silence, and the agents don't know what he is taking down. Do you think it would be an improvement that he should dictate the evidence to a clerk or to a shorthand writer?—I think in very important cases that is very necessary.

8999. It is objected that the reading of the deposition at the end is so rapidly done, that omissions are not noticed?—Well, that is sometimes a difficulty; but, on the whole, I think the system works well.

9000. Mr. Gordon.—The deposition is always read over to the witness before he leaves?—Yes; that is a check.

9001. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think that is a sufficient check?—Scarcely.

9002. Dr. Barclay.—Don't you think that the other system would lead to continual altercation at the bar, in presence of the witness, regarding the mode in which it was to be taken down?—I think if the Sheriff would take down the evidence more fully, and give himself more time to do it, any objections as to the working of the thing might be obviated; but the difficulty is that some of them are very hard-worked, and it becomes very severe labour. For instance, in Aberdeenshire, the work is very severe; and I remember even in Edinburgh I used to find it very severe in long proofs; but I always found it much better to take down the evidence rather full than otherwise, because that obviated a great deal of dissatisfaction.

9003. The Chairman.—That was the safe side to err on?—Yes. I also think it would be well that the Sheriff-substitute should have a power of allowing an amendment and opening up of the record, reserving to the Sheriff the same power.

9004. Dr. Barclay.—At present that can only be done by the Sheriff?—Yes; and I think that is a disadvantage.

9005. I think the words of the Act are, 'When before him by appeal.' I have once or twice made avizandum to the Sheriff to open it up, and that has been objected to. Has that ever occurred with you?—No.

9006. Do you see any objection to that?—Yes; the Act requires that it shall be on appeal.

9007. Under the present system, would it not lead to this: that the resident Sheriff must decide what he knows to be wrong, in order to give an appeal to put him right?—I think the real remedy is what I have suggested.

9008. Mr. Baxter.—Have you anything to say about the Debts Recovery Act?—No; I have very little experience of that Act. I think it acts very unfairly in regard to the fees given to the solicitors, and I think that part of it would require amendment.

9009. Have you had any appeals under it?—Several.

9010. Dr. Barclay.—Has your bar complained about the fees?—I am not aware.

9011. Have no complaints come before you officially?—No; but I have seen cases appealed to me, where it was a grievous hardship that there was no power of proportioning the expense to the labour, according to all other kinds of professional remuneration.

9012. Then I suppose you would not recommend that the same principle should be carried into the ordinary court?—That would be most fatal; and if carried through all departments of the public service, it would be most unjust.

9013. Would you rather have a scale according to the amount of work done carried into the Debts Recovery Act?—Yes.

9014. The Chairman.—Do you think there are too many forms of procedure? There are the small debt, the debts recovery, and the ordinary action forms. Do you think the procedure might be more assimilated?—I think so. I think it would be an advantage to simplify the ordinary writ bringing the parties into court. At present there is a want of some provision in questions as to the delivery of a moveable, both under £12 and under £50. The only competent process seems to be the ordinary court process, which is expensive. I have had cases of delivery of a moveable, of the value of two or three guineas, or £4 or £5, where we had to go through the whole protracted procedure as if it had been a case of £25 or £50; and I devised a system in the Small Debt Court of Edinburgh, where such cases were very common, by which I recommended the parties to bring their action for the value of the article, and then, after hearing proof, and deciding that the pursuer was right, I gave the defender a week to deliver over the article, failing which he was to pay the amount craved; but there were some doubts as to whether that was altogether competent.

9015. Did the action contain a conclusion for money value failing delivery, or without saying 'failing delivery?'—It said, 'The defender is owing the sum of £2, being the value of a certain article which he has failed to deliver,' and that raised the question whether there was a failure to deliver. I heard proof on that; and if the pursuer was right, I gave the defender a week to deliver the article, certifying that if he did not deliver it, he must pay the amount shown to be the value.

9016. And the amount was always the amount which the pursuer was willing to take if he did not get the article?—Yes. I found that of great benefit to the poorer classes; but I had always a doubt as to its competency. It was an invention of my own.

9017. Mr. Baxter.—Have you a good deal of maritime practice in Aberdeen?—No; not a great deal. Though there is a good deal of trade, and navigation, and shipping, we have not many maritime cases.

9018. Have you ever desiderated a summary form for the settlement of freight? Have you had cases where a foreign vessel came into Aberdeen, and a merchant objected to settle the freight, and the captain was obliged to submit to the terms of the merchant, as his ship was to sail immediately?—I have had no experience of that.

9019. The Chairman.—Have you considered whether the jurisdiction of the Sheriff might with advantage be extended to classes of cases that it does not reach at present?—Yes. I think it ought to be very largely extended, under the check of an appeal to the Court of Session.

9020. In questions of heritage?—I think that is very necessary.

9021. Would you carry that to any extent, or would you have it only in cases of a limited value?—I don't think it is of very great importance which way that is decided, because I believe that all cases of magnitude and importance would come at once to the Court of Session, as is the case in important personal actions. I think that might, with safety, be left to the public, and it would have the advantage of getting quit of the preliminary discussion in regard to value. At the same time, I believe that the great mass of cases which at present come into no court whatever, and as to which there is a sort of denial of justice, greatly to the loss of the poorer classes, would in this way be adjudicated upon.

9022. Would you give to the parties, or to either of them, the power, at an early stage of the case, to remove the case to the Court of Session?—Yes; I think that might be proper in cases beyond a certain value.

9023. Mr. Baxter.—What value would you suggest?—Under the Act of 1853, the Legislature has fixed £25 as to feu-duties, and as to irritancy of feus; and I think that a safe amount.

9024. Dr. Barclay.—Above that, would you give either party a right to remove the case to the Supreme Court?—Yes.

9025. Mr. Adam.—You mean annual value?—Yes.

9026. Dr. Barclay.—Would you require caution in that case, for you seemed adverse to the abolition of it in regard to appeals to the Court of Session?—But it is different where there is a judgment. I don't see any reason in legal principle why there should be a distinction between the cases of heritage and moveables. I believe the original practice was, as we learn from Erskine, that the Sheriff had as ample jurisdiction in his territory as the Court of Session has throughout the whole of Scotland; but the later practice has been so different, that perhaps it would be satisfactory to have some limit at first.

9027. The Chairman.—Do you think that jurisdiction should be given to the Sheriff in cases of personal status, such as questions of divorce, declarator of marriage, declarator of bastardy, and declarator of legitimacy?—I think that admits of a good deal of doubt, and I cannot speak very decidedly upon it, but my inclination is to admit all these actions.

9028. Dr. Barclay.—Even divorce?—Yes; I understand, from gentlemen who have practised in the courts of the old commissaries of Edinburgh, that these old commissaries were not men of higher qualifications than the present Sheriffs of Scotland are; and it appears to me to be not a fair thing that people of the lower ranks should be denied the remedies which are given to the richer classes. I think that in some cases that is attended with great evil, and occasionally leads to crime. I have had such cases brought under my notice.

9029. The Chairman.—Is that remark applicable to divorce?—To divorce, and also to applications for protection of the property of wives. I think the latter is often more important than the former. I don't know anything, indeed, connected with the state of our lower classes in large towns which more urgently demands a remedy than this. During the long time that I was Sheriff-substitute at Edinburgh, I had constant applications from clergymen, and also from benevolent individuals throughout the city, sending to me poor women in a state of the greatest misery from being unfortunately coupled with bad husbands, who, after deserting them for a while and living in debauchery, occasionally came back and swept away the whole earnings of the poor women, who had been in the meantime maintaining themselves and their families by their own exertions.

9030. Mr. Adam.—In the cases of divorce, do you think there is more perjury than in the ordinary run of cases?—I think there is more temptation to it.

9031. Mr. Baxter.—Not more than in cases of paternity?—Well, it is a more serious sort of case.

9032. The Chairman.—Do you think that declarators of marriage should also be competent in the Sheriff Court?—My inclination is to hold that they should be competent there. There are not many cases of irregular marriage in this country, though there is great talk about them. I think it appears from the returns made, that out of 20,000 marriages there were only between 20 and 30 irregular marriages in a year; and I don't think there would be many of these cases coming before the Sheriff, except at the outset of such a change, and these from places like Glasgow and Dundee. I think these cases might be safely trusted to the Sheriff Courts.

9033. Would you, in such cases, give the power of removal to the Court of Session at an early stage?—I am inclined to think so.

9034. Mr. Baxter.—Would you give that power in cases of divorce?—I think, if the husband was compelled to give the wife the additional expense of the higher court, there would be no great hardship.

9035. Don't you think that in an action of divorce by a husband against a wife, if she had the power of going to the Court of Session, she would be very apt to do so if her husband was obliged to pay her expenses; and would that not be debarring the husband from his remedy?—I don't think so.

9036. Would it not be the same thing as if he was bound to go to the Court of Session?—I don't think it would be entirely the same thing.

9037. But supposing a wife had a paramour who would assist her to go to the Court of Session, and drag the husband there, would that not be depriving the husband of his remedy?—That might occasionally occur.

9038. The Chairman.—Would you give the same power of removal in cases of declarator of legitimacy or declarator of bastardy?—I think so. It would be safer to do so.

9039. Do you think the Sheriff should have power to appoint judicial factors?—I believe it is found that, in regard to estates of small value, the necessity for coming to the Court of Session leads to a great deal of expense, and eats up a considerable part of the estate. I think it would be well to give that power under a certain limit.

9040. A limit as to value?—Yes.

9041. Mr. Baxter.—A limit with reference to the amount of the estate?—Yes. I think it is of great advantage to maintain the nobile officium of the Court of Session; but I think that, in the class of cases which could not afford much expense, it would be advisable that the local court should have a power to appoint a judicial factor.

9042. Dr. Barclay.—Would you place the factors so appointed under the Accountant of the Court of Session?—I think so. I think that is very valuable.

9043. In that way you would have unity of practice over the whole country?—Yes; I think it is very necessary to have that check.

9044. The Chairman.—Have you any suggestion to offer as to procedure in criminalibus?—None in regard to procedure; but I think it would be important to give the Sheriff more extensive power to punish in summary cases.

9045. Dr. Barclay.—Without a jury?—Without a jury. I have noticed, in the practical administration of the criminal law, that great evil arises from the frequency of short imprisonments. It is a bad thing to award short imprisonments in cases of a first, second, and even third conviction, as is frequently done. When there is a decided case of theft, I think it is an unfortunate thing to send a young lad to prison for thirty or forty, or even sixty days. It would be an immense advantage that he should then get a pretty long term of imprisonment, because very often he is without education, and he would get some education in prison. I am told by chaplains and teachers in jails that they can do nothing almost with prisoners who are sent to them on sixty days' sentences, but they can do a great deal with those who are sent for four or six months' imprisonment.

9046. Could they not be sent to reformatories?—But I mean prisoners above the age at which they can be sent to reformatories. I think great evils arise from the present system of punishing in first cases of crime. Probably a lesson might be given to a lad which might stop his career, if he were sentenced to a longer term of imprisonment at the outset, whereas at present they begin with a small sentence, which is repeated on a second conviction; then they go to the Sheriff with a jury, after two or three convictions; then they go up a second time to the Sheriff and a jury; and at last they land in the Circuit Court trained criminals.

9047. Does that not apply rather to magistrates of burghs than to the Sheriff?—A great deal more; but I think the Sheriff has not sufficient power, in the first instance, to deal with cases of crime.

9048. Are you aware that the resident Sheriffs very seldom, in the first instance, pronounce a sentence of sixty days' imprisonment?—I think that is a wrong system.

9049. Then that is an error of the judge, not of the law?—They don't like to go the whole length of their tether, and they proportion the sentence, the limit being sixty days. Very often there are two thieves, and in order to proportion the sentences they give the younger man thirty days and the other sixty days.

9050. What power would you give the Sheriff without a jury?—I think I would give him power to sentence to six months' imprisonment; but I think it would be wise, in the first instance at least, to give the criminal the option of being tried by a jury when the sentence may be above sixty days. I think it would be well to do that as a check, and also to require the Sheriff to take notes of the evidence.

9051. Mr. Baxter.—Are you aware that many of the magistrates of burghs have power to sentence to ninety days' imprisonment, while the Sheriff has only power to sentence to sixty days?—I was not aware of that.

9052. Mr. Harrison.—Is not the being sent to jail at all so destructive of a young man's prospects, that it is scarcely possible for him to reform afterwards?—That is one result of the short sentences, that you thereby neither deter a prisoner nor reform him.

9053. Could you suggest any other mode of punishment?—No; I don't know of any other mode of secondary punishment; but I think it ought to be more severe if really merited. In a great many police cases I think there ought to be no imprisonment at all.

9054. The Chairman.—You think the present system rather tends to contaminate than to reform?—Yes; they get the character of being 'jail birds,' and are not the least deterred. I know that at this moment, after a prisoner has been punished with sixty days' imprisonment, he goes out and commits an offence again, and goes back to prison. He speculates in this way: 'They cannot send me to a jury, and I will only get sixty days.' I know that is what they go upon; whereas, if they got six months at first, I think a more powerful impression would be made upon them, and there might be some advantage got in the way of education in the jail.

9055. You think that having the prospect of release in ten, twenty, or thirty days, they are not so ready to accept tuition as they would be if they knew that they were to be in prison for a lengthened period?—I think so, and chaplains and teachers have told me that they can make nothing, or very little, of those who receive short sentences.

9056. Mr. Gordon.—Are those prisoners who are sentenced to short periods of imprisonment put in a cell with other prisoners?—I don't know; that depends very much on the state of the prison. I don't think they are, in any well-regulated prison.

9057. Dr. Barclay.—Separation is the rule in Scotland?—Yes. I visit the Aberdeen prison occasionally, and I have seen nothing of that kind. And when I was in Edinburgh I don't think I ever saw anything of the sort. I think there is a great improvement in that respect in prison discipline; but I know that the most enlightened governors of prisons, Mr. Smith, for instance, the governor of Edinburgh prison, has told me that he has a very strong opinion of the bad effect of these short imprisonments.

9058. Have you known instances of these short imprisonments running up to the number of a hundred?—There are some old hands in Edinburgh who have had twenty and even sixty short sentences.

9059. Have you formed any opinion with reference to having a stipendiary magistrate in large towns?

Andrew Jameson.

You acted as a police magistrate, did you not?—Yes, for many years. When Mr. George Tait was senior Sheriff-substitute, I had the whole police duty; when I succeeded him, I had less of it.

9060. Mr. Gordon.—In Edinburgh the police duties are managed in this way, I understand, that the Sheriff-substitute takes one month and the magistrates take the next month?—Yes, it is so.

9061. Dr. Barclay.—Did you find any difference in regard to the terms of sentences pronounced by the Sheriff and the magistrates?—I cannot speak to that. It was more in operation after I became senior Sheriff-substitute, and had less to do with the police. Sheriff Hallard has acted more in the police court since that arrangement was made.

9062. The Chairman.—Do you think that there being three Sheriff-substitutes in Edinburgh, they would be able to overtake the whole of the Police Court duty?—Yes; I think that, if the civil business is in the same state as when I left Edinburgh, they might do so, so far as I am acquainted with it.

9063. Mr. Gordon.—How long does it occupy the police judge each day?—I think it generally took from one to three hours daily.

9064. The Chairman.—It was a daily court?—Yes; and it was a very disagreeable court.

9065. Dr. Barclay.—During the month that the Sheriff sat the magistrates exercised no police jurisdiction?—None in the court.

9066. Do you think that was a good arrangement?—I think a better arrangement would have been, with great deference to the magistrates, an arrangement which I proposed—namely, that the magistrates should be relieved of all judicial duties in matters of crime, but that they should have the whole cases of contravention of police regulations. I thought the Sheriff was the best judge in cases of crime and evidence, but that the magistrate was the best judge in questions about the police and about sanitary regulations, and so forth. I recommended that, at the time that the last Act was procured; but I believe the magistrates were very much opposed to it, because they had always had a strong opinion in favour of their criminal jurisdiction. And I must say that, so far as I know, they have administered that jurisdiction very well for many years, and in a much better way than many of their predecessors did. At the same time, I do not think it is the best system.

9067. The Chairman.—If the same judge sat always in these cases of crime, there would be greater uniformity of punishment probably?—Yes; there are often in the Police Court of Edinburgh as delicate cases of evidence in regard to theft and embezzlement as in the highest court.

9068. Dr. Barclay.—Have they not the benefit of an assessor there?—No, not further than the prosecutor.

9069. Mr. Linton?—Yes.

9070. Does the burgh clerk not sit?—No.

9071. In Glasgow I think they have an assessor?—Yes.

9072. The Chairman.—Mr. Linton is the superintendent of police?—Yes.

9073. Do you think it would be expedient to extend to the Sheriff the power of sentencing to penal servitude?—I cannot speak very decidedly upon that point. I believe there is a certain hardship sometimes in the case of prisoners who have committed offences immediately after one Circuit, being kept till the next half-yearly Circuit; and where there are cases of theft with aggravation, I think they might be very safely entrusted to the Sheriff.

9074. Mr. Baxter.—Would you keep up the distinction between theft and robbery?—No.

9075. Dr. Barclay.—The distinction is very slender?—Very slender.

9076. Mr. Baxter.—You think the Sheriff should have jurisdiction in those cases?—Yes.

9077. Dr. Barclay.—I think you said that police offences should not be punished by imprisonment?—I said there were many police offences that ought not to be punished by imprisonment.

9078. But suppose a person could not pay the fine?—I think a good deal might be done in the case of young offenders by caution, and in the case of older offenders by fine. Of course you can neither enforce caution nor a fine, except by imprisonment; but I think the alternative makes all the difference.

9079. That is leaving it a good deal to the discretion of the judge?—Yes, it must be so left.

9080. But you would still have imprisonment as the coercive power?—Yes.

9081. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think it is an advantage to have the criminal investigation in the first instance made privately?—I think, in the general case, it is of great importance that it should be in private, as at present.

9082. Have you known any innocent person sheltered from infamy, from the examination being in private?—Yes, I remember of one case which made a great impression on me, of a very highly respectable gentleman in Edinburgh, who was charged with indecently assaulting some young girls at a bathing-place on the coast; and when the Fiscal came to me with the information, I said it was very extraordinary, but of course we must do our duty, and I recommended the gentleman to be summoned in a quiet manner. He came, and being warned, gave his declaration, and told all the circumstances, denying the charge entirely. The precognition went on, and in consequence of the statements that he made, Mr. Lothian, the Procurator-fiscal, was enabled so to conduct the inquiry, and so to cross-examine the witnesses, that it turned out, in the course of two days, to be an entire misapprehension, if not a gross fabrication, leaving not the slightest stain on this very honourable gentleman, who was a man moving in good society, of most unblameable character.

9083. Supposing the inquiry had been conducted in public, don't you think the feelings of his friends would have been greatly lacerated?—I think it would have been very hurtful, and it would have served no good purpose whatever. There was no more of it, and I don't think anybody but the Fiscal and myself knew of it.

9084. The Chairman.—Has your experience in preparing criminal cases been such as to enable you to say that you have seen any undue pressure put upon criminals in taking their declarations, or any exclusion of evidence that they thought ought to be produced?—I never saw anything of that kind. On the contrary, I think our system is almost perfect. The whole system is carried on with great fairness to the criminal, and great benefit to the public, and without giving undue advantage either to the prosecutor or to the prisoner. I think further, that the prisoner should be entitled to call for his declaration when he thinks it necessary, and to have the benefit of it being read to the jury. I don't think it is just that it should be used against him and not used in his favour.

9085. You mean that it should not be capable of being used against him, and not capable of being used for him?—Yes; that is what I mean.

9086. To what effect do you think the declaration should be read in his favour?—To show that he made a certain statement when first brought before the magistrate.

9087. Would you have it read as part of his evidence?—Yes, it might be as part of his evidence.

9088. If the prosecutor's evidence was closed, and if he has not produced the declaration, you think the prisoner might begin his case with the declaration?—Yes; I think I have often seen prejudice to the prosecutor's side resulting from his denying the prisoner the benefit of the declaration. I think it had a bad effect on the jury.

9089. Have you frequently seen it withheld when the prisoner asked that it should be read?—Yes; but of course that was commented upon to the jury, to the disadvantage of the prosecutor.

9090. Sometimes the declaration contains certain statements implicating other parties, and these are frequently struck out before it is read?—I think there would need to be some discretion in regard to that.

9091. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think it would have a tendency to lead to a more strict examination of the prisoner, if he could insist on his declaration being read to the jury?—I don't know.

9092. I suppose you think it would not be desirable that that should be the case?—No; it would not be desirable to make them more lengthened documents than they are.

9093. The Chairman.—Or to subject the prisoner to the pressure of interrogation?—Certainly not.

9094. If the prisoner had a right to make any statement he pleases, and have it read to the jury, without any power of cross-examining, it would be, to a certain extent, enabling him to be a witness for himself, without the power of cross-examining him?—Yes.

9095. Dr. Barclay.—Are you aware that in England no questions are put to the prisoner, and that he is merely asked if he has any statement to make, while in Scotland questions are put, and if he declines to answer, it is written down that he declines to answer? Has that any prejudicial effect?—I don't see why it should not have a prejudicial effect in some cases.

9096. Then you think questions should be put?—I think so.

9097. The Chairman.—Suppose a man is found recently after a theft, in possession of the stolen goods, and he is asked how he came by them, and he says, 'I decline to answer,' should that not have any effect on the jury?—I think it ought to have an effect.

9098. Your opinion, as I understand it, on the question of the constitution of the Sheriff Court, is favourable to its existence at present, only you think the territory should be enlarged, some of the smaller counties being absorbed by the larger counties?—Yes.

9100. And important to be preserved?—I think that is of great importance. I think I have noticed cases in which errors in administration have been quietly rectified in that way, which could not have well been put right without some very troublesome inquiry or procedure. And I think that, for instance, in the case of a contested election, or in cases of riot or public disturbance, it is of very great importance. I recollect feeling so when I was Sheriff-substitute in Ayrshire. The first year that I was there, there were some Orange disturbances, and I remember feeling the great benefit of having the assistance of Mr. Sheriff Bell, who corresponded with the Lord Advocate, and who gave me advice and counsel. Then again, in the case of the riots at the Fushiebridge Railway—serious riots which took place in 1846 or 1847—Sheriff Speirs was unfortunately absent, and I was obliged to go to the spot. The whole country was in a state of very serious riot; an immense number of railway labourers were burning cottages, and in a state of great excitement. I called out the dragoons from Jock's Lodge; but I recollect quite well the great value and advantage there was the moment that Sheriff Speirs came to my assistance, which he did before the riot was put down, or at least soon afterwards.

9101. Dr. Barclay.—In that last case both Sheriff Speirs and yourself were resident in the county?—Quite so.

9102. The only advantage there was having another to consult with?—There was the advantage of having a superior and responsible officer of experience, and of high legal capacity.

9103. But you were a responsible officer?—I was; but I did not feel that I had the same responsibility as he had, and I had not the same experience.

9104. In the other case which you mentioned in Ayrshire, there could be no local bias there. You were neither an Orangeman nor a Ribbonman?—No; but I was a young man.

9105. The Sheriff-principal might be a younger man in many cases than the Sheriff-substitute?—He might, but not generally.

9106. Mr. Adam.—Was there not a criminal trial arising out of the Fushiebridge riots?—Yes; there was a man murdered.

9107. The Chairman.—Have any other suggestions occurred to you which you would like to make to the Commission?—With reference to the matter of private precognitions, I forgot to mention that I think there are some cases in which an open precognition would be very valuable, and would give great satisfaction to the public without any detriment to the prosecution. I allude to cases of serious accident leading to destruction of life. I think 30 lives were lost one night in the High Street of Edinburgh by the tumbling down of a ruinous house, and I recollect quite well that there was a strong feeling of public dissatisfaction that the evidence was not taken in public; and it would have been of great advantage if the whole of the evidence, instead of being taken in the Council Chamber, I believe at great length for several days, had been taken in open court, before the Sheriff or before the Lord Provost. In cases of railway accidents I think that is absolutely necessary now-a-days when the public are so greedy for information, and will have it in some way; and if they do not get it in that form, they get it by bribing different people to give the information. In that class of cases, and perhaps in cases of sudden death, I think we might have the benefit of the coroner's inquest without its abuse. But I would put it within the discretion of the Lord Advocate, or of the court. I think the Sheriff might have the discretion of fixing what cases should be open, and what cases should be private. But in cases of murder and serious offences I think it is very important to have them conducted in private, and also cases of a private character, such as I have alluded to.

9108. Mr. Baxter.—Don't you think that in the case of sudden deaths arising from natural causes, it would be a great hardship to relatives to have the inquiries in public?—Yes; but in other cases I think it would be a great advantage to have the Sheriff going to the spot and making the inquiry. It would quiet a whole neighbourhood.

9109. Dr. Barclay.—You would not have a jury in these cases?—No; and what I am proposing would not interfere with future proceedings.

9110. Is there any law which prevents that at present?—I don't know; but it would be thought odd if the Sheriff ordered it. I remember, in the case of the 30 deaths in the High Street, there was a great demand for information in the public journals, the excitement was so great, but Mr. Dymock understood that it was not competent to make it public.

9111. Mr. Baxter.—Where there is any excitement or suspicion just now, you are aware that it is the duty and the practice of the Fiscal always to go to the spot?—Yes, that is of great advantage, and I would not interfere with that; but in certain cases I would have the power of making it an open precognition.

9112. The Chairman.—If it was a precognition pointing at the guilt of an individual, would you be disposed to have that in public?—No, certainly not; because I have seen cases in England where it resulted in the whole advantage of the inquiry being lost, the guilty parties getting a hint, from the proceedings being published from day to day, how the evidence stood against them.

9113. Or public feeling being unjustly directed against an individual before the investigation was completed?—Yes.

9114. In regard to cases of sudden deaths, you would also leave the discretion with the Sheriff?—Yes.

9115. There might be cases in which it would be harrowing to the feelings of relatives to have the inquiry made public?—Yes.

9116. Mr. Adam.—But you would not give the Sheriff power to have an inquiry in public in any case where a party was committed for trial?—I don't know. There was, for instance, the railway accident at Winchburgh some years ago, and in these cases you might arrest all the guards concerned, or the stokers or pointsmen; but I think it would be a great satisfaction to the public that such inquiries should go on in public.

9117. Mr. Shand.—And the conclusion might be that the Sheriff might commit some party?—Yes. That might be necessary at the very outset.

9118. The provision you propose would be in very exceptional cases?—Yes.

9119. Cases in which there was great public excitement?—Yes; and it ought to be in the discretion of the Sheriff or the Lord Advocate.

9120. Would it serve your purpose that the power should be vested in the Lord Advocate for the time?—I think so; or the Sheriff might be safely entrusted with it. There is just one matter of detail which I wish to notice, and which I think very important to have regulated. I allude to the vacations in the Sheriff Courts. They were changed, I think unfortunately, by the Act of 1853. That Act was a great improvement on the previous procedure in other matters, but in regard to the matter of vacation it was positively the reverse. Formerly there was a proper spring vacation in the Sheriff Courts, as in other courts, but now it is limited to fifteen days, at the very worst season of the year—the last fifteen days of March—when nobody can get any recreation or any benefit. Then, instead of a short recess, they gave them a long vacation at Christmas, extending to about four or five weeks, which is a positive interruption to public business. The courts cease on 15th December, and don't require to meet till the first day after the 15th of January. In this way they have about five weeks of vacation, which is a great deal too long for any good purpose; and, in fact, it interrupts the business in the thick of the winter session for no end. I would therefore propose that that should be abolished, and that they should get a week for the Christmas holidays, like the Court of Session, and that the spring vacation should extend from the beginning of April to the beginning of May. The Sheriff-substitutes would feel that a considerable boon. I took charge of this matter about the time I was appointed Sheriff, and Mr. Patton had actually a clause framed to that effect which he intended to put into the £50 Debt Bill, but he thought it would be rather awkward to put it into that bill, and it was not done at all. There is also another matter which I may mention. I know that some of the Sheriff-substitutes complain of the difficulty which they have of getting leave of absence. I never myself found much difficulty in that, and I am sorry to say that I had several periods of bad health, and I always met with great consideration from the Sheriffs with whom I had to deal; but probably it might be of advantage to allow the Sheriff-substitutes of adjoining counties sometimes to act for others, so that a hard-working Sheriff-substitute might be able to go away for a month or six weeks to Switzerland or the Continent, if he thought proper, with the leave of the Sheriff of course. Just now they cannot do that without employing an advocate from the bar of considerable experience. Then several of the Sheriffs-principal think there is a greater hardship in regard to their case; for although the Sheriffs-substitute have great latitude in getting away for a considerable period by making an arrangement with the Sheriff, and having a gentleman from the bar, whom they remunerate out of their own pockets, the Sheriff himself cannot do this. The Sheriff has no power at this moment, however unavoidably he may be obliged to go to a distance, or however ill he may be, to appoint a person to do his peculiar work, which cannot be done by the Sheriff-substitute,—that is to say, his appeal duty; and there seems to be a want of some provision by which either the heads of court, or perhaps the Lord Advocate, upon an application of a Sheriff, might allow the Sheriff of an adjoining county, or some other qualified barrister, to take the appeal business when he is unavoidably absent. I know that in one case, where a Sheriff was obliged to live abroad for his health for four months, there was the greatest difficulty in making an arrangement. That is a matter which would require consideration, more especially if the number of Sheriffs is reduced.

9121. Dr. Barclay.—You say that your spring vacation is from 15th March to 3d April. Must you not have a court in that time?—Yes, one.

9122. Is there not an intermediate court, which makes the vacation only a week?—That makes it more obnoxious; so that, in point of fact, there is no vacation at all except the long Christmas recess.

9123. In regard to the Commissary Court, had you in Ayrshire a Sheriff-clerk and a Commissary-clerk?—I think not; but I am not sure.

9124. Are the offices held by two persons in Edinburgh?—They are.

9125. In Aberdeen?—They are held by different persons in Aberdeen.

9126. Is there an advantage in having the Commissary Court a separate court?—I don't see any; but in Edinburgh I think you must have them separate. It is the commune forum, and there is large business. The Commissary-clerk of Edinburgh gives in about £2000 yearly of fees to the Government.

9127. Do you think they should be separate in Aberdeen?—I don't see any advantage in it.

9128. If a question was to arise in Aberdeen regarding whether it was a Commissary case, would that not be a question as to who would get the fees?—Very much.

9129. Mr. Baxter.—Is the Commissary-clerk of Edinburgh paid by salary, or by fees?—I think he is paid by salary, and hands the fees to the Exchequer.

ROBERT BRUCE JOHNSTON, Esq., examined.

9130. The Chairman.—You are Procurator-fiscal for the county of the city of Edinburgh?—I am.

9131. How long have you been so?—Since September 1867.

9132. What is the area of the jurisdiction?—It is the municipality prior to the Act of 1856.

9133. Does it comprehend the ancient royalty, the extended royalty, and the Parliamentary boundary?—As these existed prior to 1856, but not the present police boundary.

9134. Does the jurisdiction of the Sheriff extend over all or any portion of that same territory?—I believe the Sheriffs maintain, and I believe, practically, the magistrates of the city have acquiesced in the contention, that they have a cumulative jurisdiction throughout the entire police bounds; although there was a question raised upon that point, and I believe never satisfactorily settled.

9135. The bounds of the jurisdiction of the magistrates are clearly defined; is there any difficulty about that?—I believe not.

9136. Have you any observations or suggestions to make with reference to the area of jurisdiction?—I should say that, at the least, it must appear to be an anomaly that the magistrates of Edinburgh should exercise jurisdiction within what is practically only a portion of the city, and even that portion not defined by any regular boundary, but, in fact, just consisting, as near as may be, of what forms the parish of the city, so that there are outlying scattered portions within their jurisdiction; while the Sheriff exercises jurisdiction in certain other portions lying, as it were, within what the magistrates' jurisdiction extends over.

9137. The magistrates exercise police jurisdiction over the whole police limits?—They do; but not as Sheriffs of the county of the city.

9139. You say they sit in the Burgh Court. Do you mean that they sit there to try criminal causes?—Yes. There is a certain class of cases which, by section 169 of the Edinburgh Police Act, cannot be tried in the Police Court, but must be remitted either to the Procurator-fiscal of the city, or to Mr. Lothian, the Procurator-fiscal of the county.

9140. What class of cases are these?—They are a pretty large class. They are such cases as those in which parties have been convicted of theft on two previous occasions; those who have been twice previously convicted of reset of theft; those who are charged with falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition beyond the amount of £10, or breach of trust and embezzlement to an amount exceeding that sum; or with assault to the danger of life, assault whereby any limb has been fractured, assault with any knife or other lethal weapon, or assault aggravated by two previous convictions, and other serious crimes.

9141. Mr. Baxter.—That is a common clause in all Police Acts?—I believe it is; but in the Police Court of Edinburgh you have what does not exist in other places, viz. that the same men are held competent to decide a class of cases which, practically, they are considered incompetent to decide sitting in another court.

9142. Do they try cases of that other class?—Yes.

9143. Cases that they cannot try in the Police Court?—Yes. I may mention that we only do so in such cases as we consider may equally well be disposed of in the Police Court.

9144. You don't try by jury?—We have not done so for many years. The magistrates consider that they are entitled to do so qua Sheriffs; but in practice I believe it has not been done since 1830.

9145. You always send such cases to the Sheriff?—They are reported by me to the Crown, and the Crown sends them to the Sheriffs or to the High Court. Cases in which we take precognitions are tried before the Sheriff and a jury, or before the High Court.

9146. The Chairman.—What kind of cases do you try in that court which the police do not reach?—For example, we have cases of this kind of almost daily occurrence. We have parties remitted to us on a charge of assault, who have been twice previously convicted of that crime. The assault is very frequently trifling, and we never think of taking a precognition in such a case, because the punishment which we believe would be awarded would not come up to 60 days, or would not exceed that which the magistrates have power to award; and accordingly I prepare a summary complaint, and they are brought up that day or next before the magistrate in the Burgh Court. Other cases of a like trifling character—such as petty theft, or even a case of breaking open a lockfast place, where the offender may be a child—we never think of reporting; because the punishment awarded is usually a sentence to a reformatory which is administered by the magistrates in the Burgh Court, and which could only be done by a Sheriff.

9147. You take up these in the first instance, without their coming before the police and being remitted to you?—The offender is always brought before the police magistrate in the morning, and the case is remitted by him.

9148. Dr. Barclay.—To himself?—It may be so.

9149. The Chairman.—Is there a large number of these cases?—A considerable number.

9150. How often do the magistrates hold that court?—Daily.

9151. Mr. Baxter.—Would it not be better to dispose of these cases in the Police Court?—I see nothing to prevent it.

9152. Dr. Barclay.—What is the limit of punishment?—The same as by the magistrates in the Police Court—60 days' imprisonment.

9153. The Chairman.—Upon what does their jurisdiction rest to impose 60 days' imprisonment?—These cases are all brought by me under the Summary Procedure Act.

9154. Dr. Barclay.—But their power of punishment rests upon common law?—Yes. Before the Summary Procedure Act passed it was the same.

9155. The Chairman.—Then, when you said you saw no reason why they should not be disposed of in the Police Court, you mean that you see no reason why that court should not have power to dispose of them?—Precisely. Robert Bruce Johnston.

9156. It has not the power now?—I don't say that I would give the Police Court power to dispose of all the cases which are at present remitted to us, by any means; but I would give them a larger power with reference to such as those I have adverted to, viz. petty assaults and petty thefts; and all the more that there is a clause in the section which gives the judge of police power to remit any case where he thinks the offence merits a higher or greater punishment than he can award.

9157. Dr. Barclay.—To remit to the magistrate or to a higher court?—To a higher court. The notice of remit is given to the Procurator-fiscal of the city or county within whose jurisdiction the offence has been committed.

9158. The Chairman.—Does any inconvenience arise from the present state of the jurisdiction in the two courts?—Not perhaps beyond the fact that in many cases the public are not aware what Procurator-fiscal they should apply to, if they are going to give information. I am very frequently called upon by a party who will go so far with his story, when I ask him where the offence of which he is complaining was committed, and that very often results in an answer which obliges me to send him to Mr. Lothian. Very often one side of a street is Mr. Lothian's, and the other side mine.

9159. That is an inconvenience arising from the clashing of the jurisdiction of the Sheriffs of the county and the magistrates of the city?—Exactly.

9160. What is the remedy which you would propose? Is it that the one should absorb the other?—The only ways in which I can imagine that the thing might be arranged would be, either to extend the jurisdiction of the magistrates throughout the entire police bounds of the city, or to abolish their jurisdiction in criminal matters as exercised in the Burgh Court, the effect of which would be that they would have no summary cases to dispose of remitted from the Police Court, and no examination of prisoners whose cases are afterwards reported to the Crown.

9161. Mr. Baxter.—How do you conduct the taking of prisoners' declarations?—In presence of a magistrate.

9162. Who dictates the declarations?—I do; and I believe that is sometimes the case even in counties where there are professional Sheriffs.

9163. Dr. Barclay.—You put the questions and dictate the answers?—I do.

9164. Mr. Adam.—You said that the Sheriff of the county claimed and exercised a cumulative jurisdiction over the whole territory?—Exactly.

9165. Does his Fiscal ever interfere in the investigation of crime in your admitted territory?—He does, and so do I in certain cases under his jurisdiction. Under the Municipal Act of 1856, the magistrates have a cumulative jurisdiction in the entire police business, though they don't exercise it except in those cases where the crime is committed partly in my boundary and partly in Mr. Lothian's. In these cases he generally acts, because he held his jurisdiction before the magistrates' jurisdiction was extended in 1856, so as to cover the entire police boundary. That, I believe, is the reason of it. In other words, he is paid for it.

9166. The Chairman.—Might not the case you give of a person coming to complain to you, and after he has proceeded a certain way in his statement you find that the locality is beyond your jurisdiction, occur also if your jurisdiction was pushed out to the police limits?—I think not; at all events not to anything like the same extent. While my jurisdiction embraces a very populous portion of the city, so does Mr. Lothian's. Leith Street, for instance, is partly within his district and partly within mine; and of course the public are not supposed to know that one Procurator-fiscal acts within a certain area, and another within another area. To some extent it might also be said to apply, if the suggestions of your Lordship were given effect to—that the magistrates' jurisdiction should be extended to the limit of the police bounds, though, of course, not to anything like the same extent, because the boundary there is well defined all round.

9167. It is a better defined boundary?—And in a very much less populous district.

9168. The other suggestion was, that the magistrates should abandon their jurisdiction in criminal matters altogether, except in the Police Court?—Yes.

9169. Mr. Shand.—Do you think it a good practice that the prosecutor should dictate the prisoner's declarations?—I see nothing against it if the prosecutor be assumed to be a judicious prosecutor. I would be strongly in favour of it.

9170. Do you think that would be a desirable thing to occur all over Scotland?—Supposing the assumption that I put, I see nothing against it all over Scotland.

9171. As matters now exist?—I don't say so. I don't say that a professional Sheriff being there, he should not examine the prisoner. I think probably that is the best course. At the same time, my experience shows me that unless a Sheriff has made himself acquainted with the general bearings of the case, so far as he has opportunity, when it comes that length, he is not in so good a position to examine a prisoner so as to get at the truth—for that, I submit, ought to be the object in all examinations—as the Procurator-fiscal would be.

9172. The Chairman.—I understood your former answer to be in reference to dictating the answers of the party to the questions put. It is one thing that the Procurator-fiscal should put the questions, and it is another thing that he should dictate the answers?—I did not understand that to be Mr. Shand's question. I see no reason why the Sheriff should not dictate the answer. On the contrary, I think it is matter of indifference, supposing the Procurator-fiscal is dictating it in the presence of the Sheriff, or the Sheriff doing it in presence of the Procurator-fiscal, if the Sheriff is undoubtedly the judge of what ought to be put down as the answer.

9173. Mr. Webster.—But take the case of an unprofessional magistrate?—That is another matter. I am certainly quite prepared to say that it would never do for an unprofessional magistrate to dictate the declarations of prisoners.

9174. Mr. Baxter.—Don't you think it a little dangerous to allow the prosecutor to put the questions and to dictate the answers?—Assuming that the prosecutor is one-sided, it is most dangerous.

9175. Mr. Shand.—Is not the magistrate there, in a great measure, for the protection of the prisoner?—I consider that the public prosecutor is also there for the protection of the prisoner. I don't consider myself against any prisoner who is brought up for examination.

9176. The Chairman.—You think you are there to investigate the truth?—Precisely; and the result may be that there is no committal.

9177. Dr. Barclay.—Have you ever heard the magistrates find fault with anything you dictated?—Never.

9178. Mr. Shand.—Is there any limit to the class of cases in which you take declarations?—None.

9179. Even in cases of murder are declarations taken by you before a magistrate?—Always.

9180. And in such cases is the declaration dictated by the public prosecutor?—It is.

9181. Do you think that is a practice which can be upheld as reasonable?—If I were asked whether such a practice should be followed throughout Scotland, I should say no, because, as already said, where there is a professional Sheriff, there can be no objection to his dictating the declaration.

9182. Then you think it depends on the accident of the character of the individual holding the office of public prosecutor?—To some extent it must; but that also applies in the case of all individuals.

9183. As a rule, I suppose you would say that it is a bad practice?—Judging from my own experience, and that is all I have to go upon, I cannot say that it is. If you ask my opinion very much as you might have done before I had any experience at all, I would have said that I was not in a position to give an opinion.

9184. Don't you think it would be better, if it can be done, that such declarations should be taken before the Sheriff rather than before a magistrate in the way you have described, and that the Sheriff should dictate the declarations?—I am not prepared to say that it would, because there are cases in which, if the Sheriff came there without knowing anything whatever beforehand, he might not be so well fitted to understand and give effect to the statement of the prisoner, even in his own interest.

9185. Mr. Baxter.—The charge is always read over?—Yes.

9186. Mr. Shand.—The Sheriff in every case is assisted by the Procurator-fiscal with all the knowledge he has?—That is just what I am not in a position to say. With us he is not, and that is why I am not able to give so satisfactory an answer to your question as to what might be done elsewhere.

9187. But assume the Sheriff has the assistance of the complaint being read, and of a Procurator-fiscal acquainted with the case, in taking the declaration, don't you think it would be much better that such declarations should be taken by him rather than by a magistrate, who merely looks on while the Procurator-fiscal dictates it?—I don't understand exactly what you mean by assisted by the Procurator-fiscal.

9188. In bringing out the case?—Certainly; I think that is quite enough.

9189. Then, on that assumption, you would be disposed to supersede the present system of taking declarations in Edinburgh, and to have them taken before the Sheriff?—Not having found the present system work anything but well in Edinburgh, I don't know that I can go that length.

9190. Mr. Baxter.—Has the objection ever been taken in court, that the declaration is not dictated by the magistrates?—In no case of mine has that been done. In the Greenock stowaway case I heard the Solicitor-General take it. I happened to be in court, and I heard the cross-examination of the Procurator-fiscal, and the Solicitor-General brought out from him, or from some other witnesses, that the Procurator-fiscal and the Sheriff had each partially dictated the declaration of the prisoner. I don't think that is a good plan.

9191. Mr. Adam.—When you have taken the precognitions in a case which is remitted to the Sheriff, do you prosecute before the Sheriff?—Never.

9192. Then you don't see your own case to the end?—Never.

9193. Mr. Lothian does that?—Yes.

9194. Is that a good system?—I can conceive very strong objections being stated to one prosecutor getting up the case, and another prosecutor conducting the trial; but that may be equally said in all High Court cases.

9195. Then Mr. Lothian acts as counsel would do in High Court cases?—Yes.

9196. Dr. Barclay.—You send your precognitions to the Fiscal in the Sheriff Court?—No. I send them to the Crown Office.

9197. Mr. Baxter.—And they are returned to you?—No. If the case is to be tried before the Sheriff, it is sent to Mr. Lothian. The only intimation I get of its going to the High Court is the indictment in proof to revise.

9198. Dr. Barclay.—I suppose you are called as a witness to the declaration in the High Court?—In the High Court I am.

9199. After the case has gone to the Sheriff Court, are you aware if a second declaration is ever taken?—I have never had such a case.

9200. Are you aware of supplemental precognitions having ever been taken in your cases?—Never to my knowledge.

9201. Are these cases sometimes tried in the High Court?—Very frequently.

9202. And in the Sheriff Court?—Yes.

9203. Are they never sent back to the magistrates to be tried in the Burgh Court?—Never. But certain of our cases are sent by Crown counsel to the Sheriff to be disposed of summarily; and in that case the magistrates of the city may be supposed to have been equally competent to dispose of them, because the sentence is the same.

9204. Could you not have done that without reporting it?—I do it in many cases; but there must be a difficulty somewhere; and there are many cases in which I don't take the responsibility. I don't consider that I am the proper party to judge in all cases.

9205. Mr. Baxter.—Do you say that all cases remitted by the Crown counsel for trial, whether summarily or by jury, are sent to the Sheriff?—Or to the High Court.

9206. They are never sent back to you?—Never.

9207. Dr. Barclay.—Are you paid by salary from the town?—I am paid by the Exchequer.

9208. A fixed salary?—A fixed salary.

9209. Do you attend the Police Court?—No.

9210. Who is prosecutor there?—Mr. Linton.

9211. Does he not call for your assistance?—Whenever there is a case falling under my jurisdiction, which cannot be disposed of in his court, we have communications together.

9212. Do you never appear in the Police Court?—Never. I may explain that besides the criminal jurisdiction which the magistrates exercise in the Burgh Court, there is a sort of quasi criminal class of cases which they also dispose of daily there, viz. cases under the Weights and Measures Acts, where a statutory penalty is exigible, hackney coach regulations, etc.

9213. Is that in the Police Court or in the Burgh Court?—In the Burgh Court.

9214. And contraventions of publicans' licences?—No; that is dealt with in the Police Court. There are various other Acts under which penalties are exigible.

9216. But in cases of double convictions, I suppose the same sentence is given in both courts?—Yes, in some. There are many parties brought before the court for the tenth or twentieth time, charged with a trifling assault; but in these cases, under the Police Act, it is necessary to remit to the Procurator-fiscal. In such cases he does not take a precognition, but he disposes of the cases summarily, either in my court, if it happens to be a case of mine, or in the Sheriff's Summary Court, if it happens to be a case of Mr. Lothian's.

9217. Do you see any advantage to the criminal or the public in trying them in that way rather than before the Police Court?—None in these cases.

9218. Mr. Adam.—In investigating serious cases of crime, where, for example, there are several charges of theft, some within your boundary, and some within Mr. Lothian's, do you complete the case, or does each of you complete that part of the case falling within his own jurisdiction?—If I have begun the case, and it afterwards transpired that the offence was partly committed within Mr. Lothian's boundary, I would exhaust it. On the other hand, if he had begun the case, and found that any part of it was in mine, he would exhaust it. In neither case is there a division of labour. The one Procurator-fiscal who begins the case conducts it to the end, as far as the taking of the precognition is concerned.

9219. I am supposing distinct acts of theft committed by the same man?—Precisely.

9220. Mr. Baxter.—Do you commit the prisoner for acts of theft beyond the jurisdiction of the magistrates?—The 3d section gives them a jurisdiction over the police bounds.

9221. Mr. Adam.—But I was speaking of the police bounds and the rest of the county?—I could not do anything in a case which occurred beyond the police bounds.

9222. You don't investigate anything beyond the police bounds?—Nothing; and if I were investigating a case within the police bounds, and it turned out that an offence had also been committed by the same party beyond the police bounds, I would probably hand it all over to Mr. Lothian. I never had such a case; but I would probably hand over to him all that I had done, and he would be responsible for the whole case.

9223. Dr. Barclay.—Is there some difficulty in discovering the exact limits of the boundary?—There is.

9224. Supposing that you were to take up an individual within your jurisdiction, and it turned out that the offence was not committed within your jurisdiction?—There is no difficulty at the outermost limits of the police bounds. If there is any difficulty within that, it is overcome by either Procurator-fiscal conducting the case, because each has a cumulative jurisdiction throughout the police bounds.

9225. But have the magistrates a cumulative jurisdiction?—Yes. Section 3 of the Municipality Extension Act gives them that jurisdiction.

9226. Then the difficulty apparently is about which Procurator-fiscal can take it up. There is no difficulty as to the tribunal?—The Procurator-fiscal has the same power as the magistrate has, within the same jurisdiction. The difficulty, if difficulty there is, consists in this, that in point of practice the Sheriff exercises jurisdiction beyond what were the limits of the Royalty in 1856, and within the limits as then extended, while the magistrates of the city only exercise jurisdiction within the limits as these existed prior to 1856, in practice; but as regards the power, each has power to exercise it throughout the entire police bounds.

9227. I thought you said there was a difficulty arising between you and the Procurator-fiscal of the county as to knowing whose duty it was to take up a particular case?—Yes.

9228. Can you suggest any remedy for that, or do you think it works quite well just now?—It works pretty well. There is this objection, that the police themselves have often a difficulty in deciding to which Procurator-fiscal the case falls to be remitted. It goes sometimes to Mr. Lothian, and he sends it to me, saying it is not within his jurisdiction. I believe that occasionally the same thing is done in our office; but, in point of practical result, there is no difficulty.

9229. The Chairman.—I understand you to say that the criminal jurisdiction of the magistrates extends over the whole police bounds?—Yes.

9230. But the Procurator-fiscal does not act to that full extent?—Neither do the magistrates of the city.

9231. What is the reason of that?—Simply this, as far as I understand it, that the Sheriff of the county and his deputes were officers appointed and paid for performing the whole duties within the county of Edinburgh beyond the boundaries as they existed prior to 1856, and that state of things has since continued; while, on the other hand, the Procurator-fiscal of the city was only appointed and paid for doing duty within the old city boundary.

9232. Then the magistrates think the matter is sufficiently provided for by the jurisdiction of the Sheriff, and that it is unnecessary for them or their Procurator-fiscal to do anything there?—I do not know what they think.

9233. But they so act?—Yes.

9234. You said the reason was that the Sheriff had the jurisdiction before?—Yes. I don't know that the magistrates would have time to take all cases falling within the police bounds, because they are not stipendiary magistrates.

9235. Do you think it a bad thing that they should have jurisdiction beyond the former police bounds, and within the extended bounds?—I see no reason against their exercising that jurisdiction, if they were competent to exercise it within the Royalty prior to 1856.

9236. The magistrates have a jurisdiction there which they don't exercise, because somebody else has a jurisdiction there. Is there any advantage in their having that jurisdiction which they don't exercise?—I do not say that there is.

9237. Do you think it is better that they should not have that extended jurisdiction, if it causes any confusion?—If I am asked my individual opinion, I don't see how they could undertake it.

Robert Bruce Johnston.

9238. Is it a bad thing that they should have a jurisdiction which they cannot exercise?—Which they have not time to exercise.

9239. As to cases that occur within the city boundaries, exclusive of the extension of the police boundaries, who regulates the distribution of business between you and the Fiscal of the county of Edinburgh?—I believe Mr. Linton, in cases remitted from the Police Court. He judges by the limits. I have the limits laid down on a plan here.

9240. He sends to you all the cases that he thinks are within your limits?—Yes.

9241. And he sends to Mr. Lothian those that, in his opinion, are not within your limits?—Yes.

9242. Sometimes it turns out that he is mistaken?—Yes.

9243. Does any practical disadvantage arise from that?—I don't think so.

9244. When you get a case remitted to you, you consider whether it is one worthy of precognition?—I do.

9245. If it is not worthy of precognition you proceed immediately, if it is within the jurisdiction of the magistrates, to have it tried summarily before them?—I do.

9246. If you think it merits precognition from its serious character, you take a precognition?—Yes.

9247. Having taken the precognition, do you sometimes proceed to try the case before the magistrate, or do you remit all such cases to Crown counsel?—Occasionally, but very rarely. I have had cases where I have begun the precognition and been satisfied that the case was not one which merited a complete precognition and report, and perhaps I have even gone the length of taking a declaration before a magistrate, and then disposed of the case summarily; but I think in all such cases I have deserted the diet. I have merely disposed of it summarily in that way. I have called it before the magistrate, but have deserted the diet, being satisfied that there was no case at all.

9248. Have you brought cases to trial upon precognition; or is it your practice, when you consider them so important as to merit a precognition, to send the precognition to Crown counsel?—Always.

9249. Then it comes to this, that practically there is a certain class of small cases that the Police Court has no power to deal with, that are sent to you to be dealt with by the magistrates, but you think the Police Court might perfectly well be empowered to deal with these cases?—I do.

9250. If they were so, do you see any use of the criminal jurisdiction of the magistrates in regard to trials?—That raises a very important question. I can conceive that if there were a proposal to abolish the magistrates' jurisdiction entirely qua criminal matters—

9251. I speak of trials?—No; I see no use in the case of trials in the Burgh Court. In the cases in which precognitions are taken, it might be objected that this was taking away a great deal of what constitutes the dignity, and character, and status of the office of the magistrate.

9252. They would cease to be terrors to evil-doers?—Precisely; and I would regard their jurisdiction—if I might so put it—as much more social than criminal, because it is for the social order and welfare of the community that they dispense justice in that class of cases.

9253. Mr. Baxter.—But they never do try any cases in which you report precognitions?—They do not; but nevertheless they are there as the magistrates before whom the declaration of the prisoner is taken, and who have the power of committing the prisoner for trial, or not, as they shall think fit.

9254. The Chairman.—My question was as to whether there was any advantage in their having the power of trying people?—Personally, I don't see that it would do much, if anything, to derogate from the power and authority of the magistrates to take away that limited class of cases from them in Edinburgh; but I can understand that different views may be held upon that subject with some reason.

9255. Some magistrates might wish to retain it, and some might not?—Precisely.

9256. Dr. Barclay.—After taking a precognition or declaration you commit the prisoner, I presume?—If we are satisfied that it is a case to be reported, the prisoner is committed.

9257. Do they apply to the magistrate for bail?—They do. In all cases they apply to the magistrate in the first instance. If, under the instructions from Crown counsel, the case is not bailable by the magistrate, the petition is refused. It is then reported with the case to the Crown Office, and the magistrate receives instructions from the Crown as to whether or not bail shall be accepted; and if so, the amount is left to the magistrate.

9258. Mr. Baxter.—Do you report all applications for bail to Crown counsel?—No; only in cases of a certain character which may be bailed on the instructions of Crown counsel, but which cannot be bailed by the magistrate otherwise.

9259. Dr. Barclay.—As to the declarations, have you ever made use of them in a trial before the Burgh Court?—Never.

9260. If you were to throw those cases which are mentioned in the Edinburgh Police Act into the police jurisdiction, do you think Mr. Linton would be able to manage them, or would he not require the assistance of a professional Procurator-fiscal?—I think he is quite competent as regards capacity to overtake these cases also; but I am not in a position to say whether he has time to overtake them.

9261. Does he assist you in the Burgh Court?—In no way.

9262. In that court do professional gentlemen sometimes appear in defence?—Occasionally; counsel occasionally.

9263. Has the magistrate an assessor?—He has. The Solicitor-General and Mr. M'Laren are assessors at this moment.

9264. Is that not in civil matters only?—In both civil and criminal matters.

9265. Have you known these assessors to sit in criminal matters?—I never saw that. I may state that any remark which I have made as to the class of cases which might be dealt with by the police judge in future, but which he cannot now deal with, equally applies to the cases within Mr. Lothian's jurisdiction as to those within my own; so that a greater number would fall upon the police judge than those from my court.

9266. Mr. Campbell.—Do you think it a desirable thing that the Superintendent of Police of Edinburgh should act as public prosecutor in the Police Court?—My own opinion is, that he ought to have duties as Superintendent of Police to occupy his whole time fully, without adding that one to the number.

9267. From your knowledge of the work that passes through the Police Court, in so far as it refers to crime in Edinburgh itself, are you aware that a very large portion of his time must be taken up in his preparations as Procurator-fiscal in the Police Court?—I should think it must necessarily be.

9268. And that a large portion of his time, therefore, is abstracted from his direct control over the police force?—I should think it is.

9269. Dr. Barclay.—He never calls for your assistance in the Police Court?—Never.

9270. The Chairman.—The judge in the Police Court in Edinburgh is the Sheriff and one of the magistrates of the city month about?—Yes.

9271. Does that system operate well?—I believe it does; at least I know nothing against it.

9272. Do you think that the continuous presence of the same judge, without being changed in that way, would be calculated to promote uniformity of punishment in dealing with cases. Would it not be better than the system of changing the police magistrate?—I believe it might.

9273. Do you see any reason why one of the Sheriff-substitutes might not do the duty of the Police Court?—If that arrangement were to be made, I would suggest that he did no other duty; I mean that he should not be accustomed to dispense justice in more important cases.

9274. What is your reason for that suggestion?—Because I think that a judge who is accustomed to sit in a court trying important cases, is not so apt to give the same amount of consideration to trivial and unimportant cases as a judge who is entirely occupied with such a class of cases.

9275. Do you think that cases that are tried in the Police Court receive more attention from the Bailie who sits there than they do from the Sheriff who sits there?—I cannot say so, for I never was there. My view may be said to be a theory more than anything else.

9276. Dr. Barclay.—Would you not draw a different conclusion, viz. that the man whose time and attention were taken up with important cases would honestly attend to the trivial cases?—The argument may be said to cut two ways; but I think the man of practical common sense, without any law at all, and nothing more than a brief experience of the duties, is as well fitted as any man can be to deal with police cases.

9277. But you are of opinion that if one Sheriff-substitute had his attention and time wholly devoted to the Police Court, that would be an improvement?—I would not like to say so; but I don't think I am a judge on that point. I would require to have some experience of the way in which police cases are disposed of in the Police Court, which I have not. I have no doubt that if you took away from the magistrates the whole criminal jurisdiction of the city, and prevented their sitting even in the police cases, you would strike at the root of municipal institutions. You would not get people in the city to take an interest in municipal affairs, to the extent that I would submit is necessary for their proper conduct.

9278. The Chairman.—Their authority would not be so great?—It would not. The name and the dignity attached to the office is a thing which people like.

9279. People like to see their own bailie in the court?—Yes.

9280. They had a share in placing him there, they look on him as one of themselves, and they are pleased to see him exercising the jurisdiction?—Yes.

9281. Mr. Murray.—And the bailie is pleased?—I should think so.

9282. Dr. Barclay.—Would not the best men take the civic position without the annoyance of the Police Court?—My opinion is, you cannot get the dignity without the annoyance.

9283. Are you aware that judges of the Court of Session have sometimes declined to take the Justiciary business?—I believe the judges of the Court of Session have a position independent of any Justiciary business, which the giving of that class of business can never affect.

9284. The Chairman.—Have you any experience of the Dean of Guild Court?—I am Procurator-fiscal in that court.

9285. Have you any suggestions to make about it? Do a good many cases come before you?—Not very many. The only class of cases in which I am called on to interfere are those in which parties have begun to build or to alter buildings in an important manner without a warrant of the court, or cases in which danger is apprehended from the existing state of any building.

9286. Is it a rule of the court, that no person can make any considerable alteration on his premises without the authority of the Dean of Guild?—That is the custom.

9287. And when such authority is applied for, how does the Dean of Guild proceed?—The party employs a solicitor before the Guild Court, which, by the terms of my appointment, I am expressly prevented from being, so that the public interest may in no way clash with the interest of the private party. The party proceeds by way of petition, the form of which is regulated, I believe, by Act of Sederunt of the Court of Session. With that petition he produces the plan to which he refers, and he asks warrant to erect or to alter the building, as shown upon the plan. The court invariably, I believe, appoints a visit, and being composed of practical men, experts, they are considered to be good judges as to the way in which the building or the alterations for which leave is craved should be carried out.

9288. Who selects them?—They are appointed, I believe, by the Dean of Guild himself.

9289. Are they his council?—Yes; but he alone is the judge.

9290. They report whether the operations should be permitted or not?—Exactly.

9291. And the Dean of Guild decides?—Yes.

9292. Mr. Baxter.—Suppose any one should attempt to build without a warrant, would you interfere as Fiscal?—I do; and if he has begun and not finished, I apply for an interdict.

9293. To the Dean of Guild Court?—Yes.

9294. On the ground that he has not obtained a warrant?—Yes.

9295. Dr. Barclay.—Without any encroachment on public or private property?—Yes; and I further ask him to be amerced in a fine for contempt of court.

9296. Mr. Baxter.—And that whether he is merely exercising his legal rights within his own property or not?—Certainly.

9297. Dr. Barclay.—Have you a separate salary for acting in the Dean of Guild Court?—I have no salary for that.

9298. The Chairman.—When a petition is presented for authority, is it appointed to be served upon the neighbours?—I believe in some cases no one is called except, perhaps, the City Chamberlain for the city's interest. Parties do not always call the adjoining proprietors; in fact, I understand that unless it is anticipated that they may have a possible interest, they don't call them.

9299. They may sometimes get their consent, and present that along with the petition?—Yes. There are cases in which, though the adjoining proprietors are not called, the court has thought fit to order intimation to them.

9300. There are cases where tenements become dangerous. How do you get knowledge of these?—Sometimes through reports of my own officers, and occasionally from hearsay, of course leading to my giving directions for a report being made to me.

9301. By your own officers do you mean officers of police?—Officers of the Guild Court; but my notice is chiefly got from the burgh engineer, in terms of the Provisional Order passed a few years ago.

9302. Mr. Campbell.—Mr. Macpherson?—Yes; he is obliged to give me notice; and if, within three days after he has given notice, the party does not proceed to remove the danger, I take the case up.

9303. The Chairman.—Is he always on the alert to see whether there is danger?—There are many cases in which he cannot possibly be aware of the fact. For example, we had a case only a few weeks ago, where we heard quite incidentally that a certain very trifling alteration as regards extent was being carried on, in an old tenement in High Street. I then applied to the Guild Court; and on the place being visited, they were quite satisfied that it was very dangerous. The party engaged in making the alteration was a mere joiner, and he was breaking through the main bearing-wall of the tenement inside the house, to make a doorway.

9304. Dr. Barclay.—In that case did you call the proprietor or the joiner?—Both.

9305. The Chairman.—Do you think it would be any advantage to have a surveyor who should look after these matters?—I think so. I think the system which is adopted in England, moulded into conformity with our own, would be a very great advantage.

9306. Dr. Barclay.—Does the town engineer not look after that?—He has so many other statutory duties to perform, that he could not possibly overtake the duty which I think should be imposed on the surveyor whose appointment his Lordship has suggested.

9307. The Chairman.—When the police observe or hear of any building that is dangerous, are they in use to give information of it?—I never obtained information through the police.

Robert Bruce Johnston.

9308. Do you think there is a want of some person of that kind?—I think so; and I think there is a want of an officer to see that the warrants granted by the Dean of Guild Court are carried out.

9309. Mr. Murray.—Does the town engineer receive a salary?—I believe he does.

9310. Is his whole time given to the duties of his office?—So far as I know, it is.

9311. There are a number of duties imposed upon him, such as seeing that water is brought into tenements?—I did not know that the burgh engineer was responsible for that; but I can easily conceive that there is no public office in Edinburgh more inundated with complaints than that of the burgh engineer.

9312. Is he controlled by the Town Council or the magistrates?—Yes, he is. He is their officer.

9313. The Chairman.—You think the Dean of Guild jurisdiction is a useful one?—I do.

9314. You think that it could not be beneficially transferred to the Sheriff?—I would not be very particular as to the court. I think the office of surveyor is the more important part of it. At the same time, I think the present court works well, and that if the Sheriff were the judge, he would in many cases require to be advised by such men as the present Dean of Guild assessors.

9315. These assessors receive no remuneration?—They receive no remuneration whatever, and I believe they willingly give their time to the duties of the office.

9316. Are they just professional men selected from the community?—They are always builders, and in my experience they are builders of the best class in Edinburgh.

9317. Have they any official position in consequence of being members of the Dean of Guild's Council?—None.

9318. They give their services gratuitously to support the Dean of Guild?—They do.

9319. Dr. Barclay.—I suppose these persons are elected annually?—I think so.

9320. And the Dean of Guild every three years?—Yes.

9321. The Chairman.—Are there fees exacted in the Dean of Guild Court?—There are.

9322. Is there a table of these fees?—I believe so.

9323. Can you furnish us with the table?—I shall send a copy of it.

9324. Dr. Barclay.—When you gain a case, do you get your costs?—Yes.

9325. According to what table of fees?—I really do not know. But while I would not in the slightest degree abolish or even limit the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild Court, I think some arrangement might be made by which parties could, at smaller expense than at present, apply to the court for warrants to make trifling alterations; I think it is in many cases a hardship that when a party wishes to make a very trifling alteration on his property, he should have to be at the expense even of a few pounds.

9326. The Chairman.—Are there any fees paid to the Dean's councillors?—There are not.

9327. Mr. Baxter.—What would you suggest in the case of these minor improvements?—If the office of surveyor were established, I can conceive of an arrangement by which his sanction and authority might be got, without a formal application to the Dean of Guild Court.

9328. Dr. Barclay.—These councillors are builders?—Yes; but I believe they are not always all builders.

9330. But I mean the proprietor?—A builder ought not to touch a stone until he has got from the proprietor a warrant put into his hands. The builder is therefore the responsible party for failure to obtain the warrant before commencing operations; and if I bring no other respondent into court than the builder, I am entitled to decree if I prove that the work has been done without a warrant.

9331. I was referring to ruinous tenements?—There have been very few of these in my experience.

9332. My question was, whether these men had an interest to condemn a house which might perhaps stand for another century?—I never heard of complaints of that kind in Edinburgh.

9333. Mr. Webster.—What is your opinion as to having Dean of Guild Courts in small burghs?—I do not think they are of the same importance, or perhaps even at all necessary.

9334. In small burghs a suitable staff of practical assistants cannot be got?—Possibly not.

9335. Dr. Barclay.—I suppose you are aware that the small burghs on the coast of Fife have Dean of Guild Courts?—Yes.

9336. Would you make exceptions of Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, and Dundee?—Yes.

9337. The Chairman.—Are all new streets laid out for feuing sanctioned by the Dean of Guild?—Yes. Within the Dean of Guild's jurisdiction, which is almost synonymous with that of the magistrates in criminal matters, and does not extend beyond the limits prior to the Act of 1856, parties building ought to apply to the Dean of Guild Court for a warrant; and I never knew of a case in which the warrant was refused, where there was not a successful opposing party except one, a very recent case, where a party applied for a warrant to erect a storm window in a house in Charlotte Square, and I believe ex proprio motu the Dean of Guild refused the warrant.

9338. Dr. Barclay.—In the public interest?—Yes.

9339. The Chairman.—On account of departure from the plan?—Yes.

9340. Dr. Barclay.—Was there opposition from any one?—No. I would not make the Dean of Guild Court a court of taste, although, I believe, there are many architectural monstrosities that every one would condemn; it would be impossible to get a court to act consistently on such grounds.

9341. The Chairman.—Tastes vary?—Yes.

9342. Mr. Webster.—Where a warrant has been obtained for a building, is there any course followed for ascertaining whether the warrant has been properly carried out?—No.

9343. Is the party left to the freedom of his own will?—Yes; there is no security for ascertaining that what is authorized to be done, is done.

9344. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestion to make as to the Dean of Guild Court, except as to the expediency of having a surveyor or inspector?—I would extend the jurisdiction to the police bounds, or to include within it all the largely inhabited part of the city.

9345. Mr. Murray.—Would you leave the Court in the same relative position to its assessors as at present?—I think it works well; but I don't think that is a matter of so much importance.

9346. Supposing a legal question arises?—That is another question; and I can conceive its being objected to the Dean of Guild exercising jurisdiction in any case where a question of right arises.

9347. Dr. Barclay.—What would you do there?—They might sist procedure, giving parties a certain time to bring a declarator before the Court of Session. At the same time, though they have no legal assessors, I believe, in point of fact, the present system has been found to work well; so that there have been no complaints of ill-advised judgments having been given even in questions of right.

9348. The Chairman.—They take the advice of the city assessors, Mr. M'Laren or Mr. Young?—Yes.

9349. Dr. Barclay.—And they only decide in possessory questions?—No; in questions of legal right.

9350. Mr. Murray.—Do you see any mode by which that class of cases might either originate with the Sheriff, or be sent to the Sheriff?—I think it is frequently only after the proceedings are in the Guild Court that the question of conflict of interest arises.

9351. The Chairman.—If the Dean of Guild cases were tried before the Sheriff, there would be an expense in getting persons to report, which is avoided by the Council of the Dean of Guild?—Entirely. I believe it would be a very costly procedure to the country, because I should think you would require an additional Sheriff for nothing else, and also to the inhabitants, in making applications for warrants. I may observe, that if the utility of the Guild Court is recognised, I see very great difficulty in distinguishing between such a case as I mentioned a little ago as having occurred recently in High Street, and a case where the same sort of thing often happens in the New Town, and where no danger can be apprehended, because the law must be uniform. If a person in High Street is obliged to come to the Court for a warrant to break a hole in a wall, a person living in Heriot Row ought to be obliged to do so, though in the one case there may be danger, and in the other there is not.

9352. But in a case of that kind, if there was a surveyor, it would be enough for the party in Heriot Row to get the surveyor's authority?—Exactly, and possibly enough for the party in High Street; but I would always give the surveyor power to bring the matter before the court.

9353. Mr. Webster.—Are not owners sometimes delayed in their building operations by the necessity of obtaining warrants?—I do not see how they can be. If a man is going to build, it is a thing he thinks about for some time before he does it, and he has ample time to go to the court for a warrant. It is a very summary court in its forms of procedure. It meets every week. I never knew any delay.

9354. Mr. Baxter.—Supposing there is opposition?—That is a case which arises whether there is a Dean of Guild Court or not.

9355. But the other parties there would have the responsibility?—Yes; but if there is a question of right involved, it does not matter who takes the initiative. Robert Bruce Johnston.

9356. Mr. Webster.—It gives the opponents the benefit of an interdict?—Yes, without showing cause.

9357. The Chairman.—When a party does appear to oppose, do you make him the practical pursuer, and require him to make out his case, or do you require that the applicant shall make out his case?—I think the court holds that the original petitioner for the warrant has to make out his case.

9358. Dr. Barclay.—Would not the conflict between the Fiscals' jurisdictions be removed by making you sole Fiscal over the extended boundary?—That is hardly a question for me to answer. I may mention that in Glasgow there are two joint Fiscals, who have the jurisdiction throughout the entire Middle Ward of Lanarkshire, which includes all Glasgow.

9359. Mr. Murray.—And there is no Burgh Fiscal?—There is not; and there the magistrates, who, I presume, attach as much importance to the dignity and weight of the office of magistrate as is done here, only exercise jurisdiction in the Police Court.

9360. The Superintendent of Police there does not act as Fiscal?—I believe not. But the Fiscal in the Police Court in Glasgow is not one of the joint Fiscals who are Sheriff-fiscals.

9361. Mr. Campbell.—Do you know whether it is the case that in each of the Police District Courts in Glasgow, the magistrate is provided with a paid professional assessor?—I do not know whether that is so or not.

FRIDAY, 5th FEBRUARY 1869.

Members Present:—

Lord Colonsay.
The Lord Justice-General.
The Lord Justice-Clerk.

George Harrison, Esq.
James Adam, Esq.
T. Graham Murray, Esq.
James Webster, Esq.
John B. Baxter, Esq.

The Right Hon. LORD COLONSAY in the Chair.

W. F. Ogg, Esq., examined. W. F. Ogg.

9362. The Chairman.—I understand you are a practitioner before the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen?—I am.

9363. Have you been long a practitioner?—Since 1841.

9364. Do you hold any official position there?—No; I hold no public office.

9365. Have you considered the matter of the constitution of the Sheriff Courts, as consisting of a Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute?—I have. I was a member of a small committee appointed by the Society of Advocates to consider that question. We reported, and our report was adopted, and I was asked by the society to come here and state their views, and the grounds on which they arrived at the conclusions in their report.

9366. Have you the report?—Yes. I produce it.

9367. What is the substance of it with reference to the constitution of the courts?—We think that there ought to be, as now, an appeal within the Sheriff Court. Probably it would be an improvement if there were two Sheriffs in place of one in the appeal court. The grounds upon which we arrived at that opinion are, that the great majority of cases in the Sheriff Court are regarding matters of so small an amount, that they cannot afford an appeal to the Supreme Court. I myself was originally of opinion that we ought to have one resident Sheriff, and an appeal direct to the Inner House; but fuller consideration, and an inquiry specially on the matter of expense, has convinced me that such an appeal is impracticable. I have excerpted from three cases, which seem to me to be illustrative cases selected for that purpose, the expense of appeal to the Inner House. They show that the expense of the appeal—the mere discussion in the Inner House—is so much beyond the whole expense of preparing the record in the court below, and also of the appeal, as to be practically inoperative in the great majority of cases. I shall mention the cases to which I refer, as showing the amount of expense in the court below in the preparation of the record, and the cost of the appeal in the Inner House. The first is Barclay v. Thomson, in 1865. It was a right of way; a good many witnesses were examined, some of them professional witnesses, and the costs were taxed in the Sheriff Court at £37, 19s. 5d.

9368. Mr. Baxter.—Are these the pursuer's expenses?—Yes; and the pursuer ultimately prevailed. The Sheriff recalled the substitute's judgment, but the Inner House reverted to that judgment. The expense of the appeal was £57, 15s. 7d. on one side. That is the amount of the taxed expenses, but of course there would be a considerable sum to add for extrajudicial expenses. The second case was not a case of my own.

9369. The first was a case of your own?—Yes. The second is the case of Pirie v. Warden, in 1867.

W. F. Ogg.

9370. Mr. Webster.—That was a difficult maritime question?—Yes; a question of law. The expenses in the court below were £30, 10s. 2d., and in the Court of Session £65, 18s. 1d., on one side, besides extrajudicial expenses. The other case is not a case of my own, and I give it because it was decided in the Supreme Court in about three weeks; having been advocated for jury trial, it was put to the Summar Roll. It is the case of Roy, decided the other day. The whole costs were £52, 16s. 7d., and of that sum the costs in the court below were under £20, leaving upwards of £30 as the costs of hearing the appeal in the Court of Session.

9371. Mr. Baxter.—Was that a case under the Debts Recovery Act?—It was not. A merchant in Glasgow pursued a merchant named Roy, in Aberdeen, for an account about £50; it was the simplest of all cases. We think that, in the great majority of cases in the Sheriff Court, the judgment by such a court as I have mentioned, which would be got, according to the amount of the matter in dispute, either for £1, 30s., or £2, would be satisfactory to the litigants. We also think that the emoluments of the Sheriff-substitute should be increased, in order that the best men, or very good men, might be got; we think they ought to be equal to those of the judges of the County Courts in England, because their duties are more important.

9372. The Chairman.—You mean that the emoluments of the Sheriff-substitute should be at least equal to those of the English County Court judges?—Yes, at least equal; and we are of opinion that, in order to get good men from the bar to be Sheriffs in the appeal court, there should be two or three counties united together, and two Sheriffs appointed to be judges in appeals in these united counties, that they should have probably £2000 a-year, or some such salary as would ensure the obtaining of first-rate men for the office.

9373. Mr. Baxter.—Would you restrict their duties to those of the appellate court, leaving the resident Sheriff to do the executive and magisterial duties?—Yes; and I would propose that they should give their whole time to these appeals. They could have such a number of counties as would ensure them full employment.

9374. Mr. Campbell.—Then I understand you to mean that there should no longer be such an officer as a Sheriff-substitute, but that each county should have a resident Sheriff, and that his judgment should be subject to review by the Sheriffs on appeal?—Yes. It does not matter by what name you call him—resident judge or Sheriff-substitute, but that he shall be judge in the first instance, and that his decision shall be subject to review by two Sheriffs.

9375. Mr. Webster.—Taking, for example, the counties of Aberdeen and Kincardine or Banff, would you propose that there shall be a separate Sheriff for each of these counties as heretofore, and that these, or two of them, shall in combination form the appeal court for that district; or do you point at a set of appeal judges merely?—It does not appear to me that that makes much difference. We did not consider whether they should be called Sheriffs. If there were two, and they had only two counties, there would be no objection to each being Sheriff of a particular county, nor do I think there would be any advantage even if they were not called Sheriffs of the particular counties. I have not considered that particular point, and I don't see that it would make any difference, so far as the public are concerned, whether they were nominally Sheriffs of counties.

9376. That is, that as regards the mere appeal business it would be immaterial what name they went under?—Yes.

9377. The Chairman.—Have you anything more to say as to the constitution of the court?—I don't think I have anything further to say on that subject, except that the small proportion of cases that are advocated to the Court of Session shows either that the litigants are satisfied with the judgment of the Sheriff, or that they believe the cost of an appeal to be so great that they don't venture upon it. I believe that they are generally satisfied; that is, as far as a judgment against a man can be satisfactory. Upon the whole, I think that the Sheriff Court is a satisfactory tribunal to the public.

9378. Mr. Murray.—If so, why would you change the present system?—I think that, although one Sheriff is satisfactory, perhaps two Sheriffs would be more so. With such an appeal court there would probably be no advocations in causes of trifling value. Occasionally there are now advocations where parties get excited about sums that cannot well afford such advocations, and they repent when it is too late.

9380. Mr. Murray.—Are you aware how many advocations there have been from the Sheriff of Aberdeenshire within the last few years?—There have been a number of bonds of caution lodged, but very few advocations have been insisted in. In 1868 there were two bonds lodged, and in 1867 there were two bonds lodged, but none of them were insisted in. In 1866 there were four bonds lodged, and only one of these cases was discussed in court; and I think the result of the other three is very illustrative of what usually takes place. It so happens that I was in these three cases, all of which went off. One of them was an action of accounting for a large sum. The Sheriffs gave effect to the report of the accountant in all points, and we would have taken it to the Court of Session if we had not got an additional £100 from the defender; but we got that, and the case was settled. Another was an action of damages against the Caledonian Railway Company with reference to sheep. I was agent for the railway company, and the Edinburgh agents for the company advised that though the case involved a principle, the cost of the appeal would be too great for the sum at issue, and it was not insisted in.

9381. The Chairman.—Too great for the Caledonian Railway Company?—No. Too great for the sum at stake. The amount that they would have got cut off from the damage found due would probably have been less than the expense of the appeal. The other was a case in which the party opposed to me appealed to the Court of Session. I never thought he had any ground for an appeal except merely delay, and he did not go on with it. That kind of thing is perpetually going on; the litigant is dissatisfied in the first instance with the Sheriff's decision, and is very anxious to rush into the Court of Session; but when he comes to reflect and is advised upon the matter, he finds that the judgment is well founded, or that the expense of an appeal would be too great for the sum at issue.

9382. One of the cases you have mentioned was a case of an extensive accounting?—Yes; and it was settled by the defender paying an additional £100 to the sum found due by the Sheriff.

9383. Found due against the defender?—Yes.

9384. What was the cost of that case in the court below?—I have not got the cost here, but I can send it. Speaking from memory, I think it was about £30, which was exclusive of the fee of the accountant. It was a very intricate question of marine accounting, involving a good deal of money; and there were voluminous reports by the accountant.

9385. Have you any recollection what the fee of the accountant was?—I think it was £80, or about that sum.

9386. Mr. Murray.—Do you know how many appeals the Sheriff decided in 1867 and 1868?—In 1868 he decided 127; in 1867, 143; and in 1866, 127.

9387. And of the cases decided in 1867 and 1868 not one appears to have been followed out to the Court of Session?—Not one. Two bonds were lodged, but none were followed out.

9388. Mr. Webster.—Can you state what was the course of procedure in the right of way case of Thomson, which led to the heavy cost of the appeal there?—There was nothing special in the case. It was a question of fact on the proof, and went directly to the Inner House.

9389. The case of Pirie v. Warden gave rise to new and difficult questions of maritime law and jurisdiction?—Yes; it was a pure question of law.

9390. The Chairman.—Would you leave the parties the free choice, as now, of raising their action in the Sheriff Court or in the Court of Session, where it was above a certain sum?—Certainly. I think the litigant ought always to have the right of choosing the tribunal; but, at the same time, I think that, to prevent oppression, there ought to be some restriction. If, for example, a comparatively small sum was found due, the pursuer ought to be allowed only Sheriff Court expenses; because I can conceive cases where a wealthy litigant might try to concuss a poor man by threats of expensive proceedings; and we know very well that that is too frequently done.

9391. But if he were successful, would you deprive him of the proper expenses in the court?—No. If, for example, he recovered a sum over, say £50, I would limit it in that way. We considered that matter, and we thought that there ought to be some restriction to the bringing of cases in the Court of Session for trifling sums. There is no doubt that the body of practitioners before the Supreme Court are highly respectable men, but it is equally well known that there are one or two who do foment frivolous litigations; and what I suggest would be a check to that.

9392. There is a certain restriction at present?—Yes. £25 is the limit.

9393. Would you alter that?—I would extend it to at least £50.

9394. Then you would exclude cases not exceeding £50?—Above £25 we proposed that the litigant should have the choice of the tribunal; and if he came to the Court of Session, and was successful to the extent of over £50, he should get Court of Session costs.

9395. But if his demand was between £25 and £50?—Then he should be obliged to go to the Sheriff Court; and we propose, in order that the expenses of the Sheriff Court under that limit should be as low as possible, that cases not exceeding £50 should be tried summarily, and that there should be no appeal on questions of fact; but that in all cases there should be an appeal to the Sheriffs, and from them to the Court of Session, on cases stated on points of law under £50.

9396. Mr. Baxter.—Are you aware that in England, where decree is pronounced in an action brought in the Supreme Court below the sum at which it could be introduced into the County Courts, the successful party is only allowed County Court expenses, unless the court shall certify that there was something peculiar in the case which made it proper to bring it before the Supreme Court?—We considered that rule at the time we came to the resolution, and we thought it was an excellent one. I omitted to say that we were also of opinion that the same privilege should be given to the litigant, of being able to get a certification from the judge; and, in that case, to get his costs.

9397. The Chairman.—Would you limit the application of that rule to cases not exceeding £50?—Yes.

9398. Mr. Adam.—On what principle do you propose to exclude review on matters of fact, when you don't do so on matters of law? Is it not all one to the litigant whether he loses his case on matters of law or of fact?—In a summary trial, if it is to be cheap, you cannot have a review of the facts; the witnesses come before the judge and tell their story, and he decides the case; in fact, it is something like an extension of the Small Debt Court. Probably there ought to be some kind of fees allowed to procurators for attending. All the judges that ever I have talked with on the subject, say that they never would get through their work with satisfaction to themselves if they were not assisted by procurators, because a party comes into court with no notion of where the point of his case is; and when he goes to a procurator he tells a long story, and the procurator has to find out where the gist of the case lies. In the Small Debt Court the judges would never get through their work in large counties if they had not assistance.

9399. It is simply on the ground of the difficulty of review?—And the expense. We are of opinion that these small sums ought to be recovered in the most expeditious way, and at the least possible cost.

9400. The Chairman.—Have you any observations to make on the jurisdiction of the Sheriff?—We are of opinion that the Sheriff's jurisdiction ought to be extended, so as to be co-ordinate with that of the Court of Session. The grounds of that opinion are, that every country procurator knows that many cases occur which never can be tried, because the value is so much under what would afford the expense of a decision in the Supreme Court. The consequence is that the matters remain undetermined, a festering sore between neighbours and friends. I think that would be pretty obvious if one just takes the matter of heritage as an example, and considers that the average values of heritable properties in Scotland is, say £500. Of course the great majority of properties are house properties, and in Aberdeen £500 would probably be over the average of the value of the houses, taking them all together. In Edinburgh and Glasgow the average would probably be higher; but assume the average to be £500, if a question arises in regard to a heritable property of £500, you cannot get that discussed and decided in the Court of Session except at a cost, judicial and extrajudicial expenses included, of about £500—the whole value of the property, or not much less; and if it were a jury case the expense would probably be double, so that it is an absolute denial of justice at present that the Sheriff should have no jurisdiction in these small matters of heritage. It has been suggested that the Sheriff's jurisdiction in that matter should be limited; but we think there is no necessity for that, because every important case would come direct to the Court of Session, just as important cases in moveables do, where the Sheriff has jurisdiction to try cases of any amount. One never sees in the Sheriff Court a case for thousands of pounds; and so, in the matter of heritage, whenever the case was an important one, it would come direct to the Court of Session. Another reason for our opinion that there should be no limit, is that there is a difficulty in deciding the value. The Sheriff must either appoint somebody to inspect the property, or he must take some kind of proof, and that would be unnecessarily expensive. And so in other matters, where the Sheriff's jurisdiction is at present excluded—cases of lapsed trusts, where the trust is of small amount—cases of curators and of factors, where the sum is small.

9401. In questions of heritage, would you think it proper that either party should be entitled, at an early stage, to remove the case to the Court of Session?—Yes, I would give that power, the Sheriff hearing the parties, and certifying that in his opinion it is a case for removal; because a rich litigant might, in regard to a sum of small amount, try to get the case removed just in order that he might concuss the other party, who might be poorer. I would give the Sheriff the cognizance of the question of removal.

9402. The rich litigant would probably concuss the other party more effectually by making him run the gauntlet of two courts?—I don't know. If the decision of the Sheriff was in favour of the poorer man, he would probably get support to go to the Court of Session, whereas nobody would assist him to go to the Court of Session in an untried case, because before the case is tried you cannot know the whole strength of the other party's case. You may have a notion of it, but you cannot judge with accuracy what the case against you may be till it has been discussed.

9403. Mr. Murray.—But you don't propose finality in any question with reference to heritage?—No, unless the value was under £50,—in very small cases.

9404. How would you determine the value?—Probably the better way would be to allow an appeal in all cases of heritage—in all cases of extended jurisdiction, to get rid of the cost of determining value.

9405. The Chairman.—What would you say as to questions of status?—That is a vexed question. Our society at first, by a small majority, were of opinion that these cases should be excluded from the jurisdiction of the Sheriff; but, on reconsideration, and on hearing that their brethren in other places had come to the conclusion that it would be better to make no exception, they acquiesced in that. But there is very great difference of opinion upon that point.

9406. There is still difference of opinion?—I think there is, among professional men throughout the country.

9407. Do they draw any distinction in that respect between questions of divorce and questions of declarator of marriage?—Some people are of opinion that if cheap divorce were allowed, very many men would rush into that court, and would probably form conspiracies against co-respondents. That is the fear of many people. Others think that it is a very great hardship that a poor man should be compelled to live with a woman with whom he cannot agree, and that it would be better for both of them that they were separated. There is a great diversity of opinion as to that.

9408. I observe that you put the case as it has been put to and by several witnesses here—the case of the man's right to divorce. Do you think that the woman should not be entitled to divorce if her husband commits adultery?—I think the woman should be entitled to divorce as much as the man.

9409. These are the conflicting views which you say exist as to whether it would be expedient, on the whole, to give the Sheriff the power of dissolving marriage?—Yes; there is very conflicting opinion on the expediency of it.

9410. What is your opinion as to the Sheriff's jurisdiction in declarators of marriage?—We put that in the same category as the other. We have agreed to report in favour of the Sheriff having jurisdiction in all these questions.

9411. What were the grounds of that decision as regards declarator of marriage?—I, for one, am in favour of the Sheriff's jurisdiction being extended to these; but some objected to that. I really don't remember at this moment the grounds of their objection.

9412. What is your reason for giving that power to the Sheriff?—I see no grounds of expediency, but many on the other side, for holding that, if a man has really been married, and if it appears that there are interests of importance which may follow his obtaining a decree of marriage, he should be excluded from it merely because he is poor.

9413. Would you give a power in such cases to transfer the cause to the Court of Session at an early stage?—Yes; I would give the same power as in heritage.

9414. Only it would not be measured by value in any way?—No; in that case you must give the power without any limit.

9415. Mr. Baxter.—Here is a sentence which is embodied in the report of the Commissioners on the Marriage Law: 'That, in cases of disputed marriages, the present law, which renders actions of declarator of marriage competent only before the Supreme Court, involves a process so expensive as in many cases to render its benefits beyond the reach of the humbler classes, to the deepest injury of the wife and children; and that to remedy this great evil, jurisdiction should be extended to the Sheriffs to dispose of such cases, subject to appeal to the Supreme Court.' Does that express your opinion?—That is exactly what I have thought upon that point all along.

9416. Mr. Adam.—Do you think that, if you allowed declarators of marriage in the Sheriff Court, many of the actions now brought as actions of affiliation would take the form of declarators of marriage?—Probably they would; but if there was really a promise of marriage, I don't see why it should not be implemented.

9417. The Chairman.—Have you any other observations to make as to the question of jurisdiction?—No.

9418. Mr. Baxter.—Are you aware that, under the Conjugal Rights Act, petitions for the protection of a wife's earnings, and for provision to her in case of desertion by her husband, are only competent in the Court of Session?—Yes.

9420. The Chairman.—Have you any observations to make upon the procedure and writs in the Sheriff Court?—With the view of reducing the expense in the Sheriff Court as far as possible, we propose that, in all cases, a writ or citation should be issued, having endorsed upon it the particular claim or demand made; and if the defender does not, within a certain number of days, say that he means to resist that claim, then decree should pass. If, within a certain number of days, he states that he means to object to it, then the pursuer would lodge his grounds of action; the defender would then answer these grounds by a minute of defence, and we think the short form in the Procedure Act would answer very well. In the case where the defence consisted, besides denial, or besides other defences, of a counter-claim, there ought to be a replication, or answer to the counter-claim, written upon the minute of the grounds of action, and then the record should be closed. We think that the least expensive form of procedure.

9421. You mean that, at the first calling of the cause, the defender should state whether he meant to oppose decree?—We mean that, before the calling of the cause, he should state that; and at the calling of the cause, or before it, the pursuer would lodge his grounds of action. The defender would then see these grounds, and minute his defence.

9422. Mr. Webster.—To whom would he communicate that he means to oppose the action?—He would just lodge it in the Sheriff Court, as a minute of appearance is lodged now. He would lodge a minute of compearance.

9423. Mr. Baxter.—The writ would be merely calling the defender into court?—Yes; summoning him.

9424. Mr. Webster.—With a note indorsed, specifying the amount of the claim?—Yes.

9425. Would it specify what it was for?—Yes; it would specify that shortly, so that it might be extractable.

9426. Mr. Baxter.—And so as to form res judicata?—Yes; sufficiently specific for that purpose, and sufficiently specific to form a warrant for extract.

9427. Would that be your form in all cases?—Yes; that would apply to all cases.

9428. Mr. Campbell.—Would you take from the Sheriff the power of ordering condescendence and defences, which he has at present?—No. Some of my brethren would have it taken away altogether; but I would allow the Sheriff to order condescendence and defences in cases where he thought these necessary. Their reason for wishing it taken away altogether is, that they suppose the Sheriff-substitute would grant it in every case where it was demanded. I don't see that that follows. I think he would do his duty, and would only allow it where he thought the case was suitable for it.

9429. Mr. Baxter.—Has he the power now of determining whether the record is to be made up in the short form?—Yes. I believe the practice is rather loose. Our present Sheriff-substitute, Mr. Thomson, does inquire, but formerly a condescendence and defences was always granted when asked.

9430. That is not done now?—No.

9431. Supposing the party refused to sign the minute of defence?—I suppose he would oblige him to sign it. I have never known a case in which a procurator before the Sheriff Court of Aberdeenshire refused to sign a minute. I presume he would be bound to execute an order of court.

9432. Mr. Clark.—In practice, are most records made up in the short form, or by condescendence and defences?—With us now, in the short form; formerly it was different.

9433. Do you find in taking proof, when the record is made up in the short form, that a necessity arises for an adjournment, in consequence of surprise being pleaded?

—Very seldom. It does occasionally, and in these cases our Sheriff-substitute allows the adjournment.

9434. But do you find that, when the record is made up in the short form, the probation may be taken, generally speaking, without any necessity for adjournment?—Generally it is so. I believe the intention of the Act of 1853 was, that at the first calling of the cause the pursuer should state his grounds of action, and the defender his grounds of defence. If that is properly done, each should be aware of the case of the other. At one time that was not done at all, but it is done now, at least with us. The Sheriff-substitute insists on the pursuer stating fully his grounds, and the defender his defence, and from that discussion they have an idea of what is to be proved.

9435. From the recollection of what took place at the oral discussion, they are informed of the particulars of the defence?—Yes.

9436. The Chairman.—Does the Sheriff make a note of that for his own guidance?—I do not know that he does. I think the object of it was more to inform the parties what was the case against them. No doubt the Sheriff considers it at the time in reference to the question of whether or not he will grant condescendence and defences, or insist upon a minute of defence being lodged.

9437. When you come to the court, does he keep it in his mind with reference to the question whether there is surprise or not?—The Sheriff cannot keep it in his mind, but the parties ought to keep it in their minds. If the Sheriff were to keep a note of it, it would furnish him with a record of what took place, and he would be able to say whether there was any ground for asking additional proof in consequence of surprise.

9438. Mr. Clark.—But you find that the short form of record in the majority of cases works well?—Yes.

9439. Would you say the great majority of cases?—Yes, I would say the great majority of cases. I think that the cases are exceptional where condescendence and defences are necessary. There is one matter in regard to the taking of proof upon which I personally have a very strong opinion, and so have some of my brethren. I mean the system of taking proof by short notes. I think that very objectionable. The reason for it is said to be that the Sheriff-substitute has an opportunity of observing the demeanour of the witness when he is giving his evidence. Now, if he is writing, he cannot see properly the demeanour of the witness. My impression from experience is, that the proofs so taken down are not sufficiently full, and that they are not very satisfactory. I don't mean in reference to any one Sheriff-substitute, but in reference to all the Sheriff-substitutes whom I have ever seen take down evidence.

9440. What would you suggest? Shorthand writing?—Yes, a shorthand writer; the Sheriff having the opportunity of seeing the witnesses while he dictates to the shorthand writer. I think that by shorthand writing a proof would be taken much more quickly than it is now, and much more satisfactorily; and if there were attached to the Sheriff-clerk's office a young man who could be taught shorthand writing, the expense would be a trifle.

9441. Mr. Baxter.—In that way the Sheriff-substitute would have a better opportunity of observing the demeanour of the witnesses, and the agents would be aware of what was taken down?—Certainly. You refer to one great fault of the short way of taking the notes. An agent is examining a witness, and he does not know what the Sheriff-substitute is taking down. It is read over, but I have never seen a case, where I have been leading evidence, in which I have not observed that something has been omitted which in my opinion was important; but it is all read over at once from beginning to end, and you cannot go back upon everything. Besides, the present system does not give to the judges on appeal the same opportunity that the Sheriff-substitute has of judging of the case, because the Sheriff-substitute supplements his notes by his memory of the evidence, and of the demeanour of the witnesses.

W. F. Ogg.

9442. How does the Debts Recovery Act work with you? Have you had any cases under it?—Oh yes.

9444. The Chairman.—What is the feature of that Act which they apprehend as likely to lead to that result?—It is that the fees are less, in proportion to the work done, than those allowed to the Sheriff-officer who executes the writ. Looking at what the officer has to do, and at what the procurator has to do, and measuring it by time, the payment awarded to the Sheriff-officer is higher than to the procurator. A little straw sometimes shows how the wind blows. In the Act of Parliament with reference to the taking of the University votes, a Vice-Chancellor or Sheriff who takes the votes is allowed by that Act the same fee as his clerk, viz. a guinea a day. He is always taken from the county procurators. We see also that it has been proposed the other day, by a gentleman very highly respected in the profession, as an improvement, that the Sheriff Courts should be made more inferior than they are now. The whole tendency hitherto of the policy in this country, as far as I can understand it, has been to raise the character of the practitioners in the country, and to raise the Sheriff-substitutes and the Sheriffs, in order that the tribunal, as it is increasing in importance and increasing in business, should be up to its work. If by legislation you do anything to lower the character of the procurators, I think there cannot be a greater injury done to the public.

9445. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think the fees under the Debts Recovery Act are not such as to induce respectable men to practise under it?—I believe that respectable men would not practise under it. They may be doing so just now as a matter of probation; but if a similar table of fees were extended to the Sheriff Court, they would not remain in it, because they would feel themselves degraded by accepting such fees. We are of opinion that the expense of litigation in the Sheriff Court ought to be reduced, and the steps of procedure reduced as far as possible, consistently with efficiency; but if you give fees that are less than tradesmen get, it is out of the question, I think, to expect that educated men will do the work.

9446. The Chairman.—Do you object to the principle of slump payment, which is introduced into that Act?—I don't object to that peculiarity; but many do. I think it not very fair, because in one case there may be little trouble, and in another case there may be a great deal of trouble; and, applying that principle, you may get too much for one case and too little for another. I don't think it is a just rule. It is said that the fees under that Act are similar to those in the County Courts Act; but it is not so. The County Court practitioners are well enough paid; their fees are very different from those in the Scotch Courts.

9447. Mr. Adam.—Supposing that proofs were to be paid for separately, by time, under that Act, would you consider the fees allowed sufficient?—I don't remember what the scale is.

9448. £4 is the maximum?—Well, for £4 the highest, or 30s. the lowest fee, you have in the first place to receive from your client a statement of his case; then you have to precognosce the witnesses, more or fewer; you have to prepare the record; you have to attend the proof; debate the case twice, once before the Sheriff-substitute, and once before the Sheriff, necessitating double preparation; besides meetings, correspondence, etc.,—the work extending over months.

9449. I was putting the case that the proofs were paid for separately, and over and above the present fees. Do you think that if that were done, those fees would still be insufficient?—I think the amount of responsibility and of actual labour in preparing satisfactorily a case for trial, and attending the discussions, cannot be paid for by the fees under the Act. I think that any respectable journeyman's labour would come to much more for the same time.

9450. The Chairman.—Have you any other remarks on the procedure?—I think not.

9451. Mr. Webster.—What is your opinion as to having written argument in appeals?—We are of opinion that all appeals should be discussed in open court, as being the more satisfactory mode of proceeding. Something may escape the writer of a reclaiming petition, or answers, which in the Sheriff's view is important, and he can explain it if the argument is oral. Besides, written argument gives an opportunity of increasing the expense unduly.

9452. The Chairman.—Might not that evil be checked by allowing the same fees for a reclaiming petition as for an oral hearing, and that whether the petition was long or short? The fee for the speech does not depend on the length of it?—If there is to be a fee for a reclaiming petition and answers, it ought to be a rule that the fee should not be larger than the fee for the speech. But I think there is an advantage in an oral hearing over a written paper.

9453. Mr. Campbell.—Are you aware that in Edinburgh and Glasgow, where the appeal Sheriffs are resident, reclaiming petitions and answers are all but unknown?—I don't know that it is so, but I think it is a very good practice. They are all but unknown now with us. There is an oral hearing in almost every case.

9454. Mr. Clark.—I suppose in all the Sheriff Courts the oral pleading is very much in excess of the written pleading?—I should think so.

9455. The Chairman.—Have you any observations to make on the privileges of agents?—Our president has sent a statement to the Commission of the privileges that we claim. We have always been an educated bar. We insist upon our students attending the university for three or four years, and also attending the law classes of the university, two sessions for conveyancing and two for common law, and in most cases they come to Edinburgh as well, before they pass; so that there is full provision with us for their being properly educated in their profession.

9456. Do you deduce from that, that no one should be admitted to the profession who has not had the advantage of these studies?—No; we would not go as far as that, but we think it would be a great advantage if the educational test were raised in other places.

9457. Mr. Baxter.—Are you aware that under the Procurators' Act there exists a system of examination that did not exist before?—Yes, that is a great improvement, and probably that will answer the purpose. At the same time, if you can get men to enter, I don't think you can make the test too high.

9458. The Chairman.—Looking to that recent enactment, do you think it would be expedient that gentlemen who were admitted as Procurators in one Sheriff Court should be allowed to go and practise in another Sheriff Court,—I don't mean that they should be admitted to the benefits, whatever these may be, of the Society of Procurators, such as library and widows' fund, but that they should be entitled to practise before the court?—We are of opinion that they ought, and we are quite willing that procurators from other counties should be admitted to practise before our courts. We are of opinion that the privileges of agents should be extended to all courts, as they are in England, where the agent of the litigant is the agent in the cause. It is rather anomalous that an agent employed in the country by the litigant, and being responsible to him for the conduct of the cause, and being responsible also to the agents in Edinburgh for the costs of the cause, should not have the power of directing it.

9459. Are you aware in what court these gentlemen in England are admitted?—I understand they are admitted in London to be solicitors for any part of England.

9460. But they are admitted by the Supreme Court?—Yes.

9461. Not by any local bodies?—No.

9462. You are talking of the privileges you would give to gentlemen admitted by local bodies?—Well, if what we think the fair rule were carried out, we would have no objection to those that were qualified being admitted now.

9463. Do you think there is any advantage in the Sheriff retaining a control over those admitted to practise in his court?—I should think if any one came to any particular court from another court, he would have to be admitted as a procurator; it might be only a formal admission, but it should be such an admission as would give the Sheriff jurisdiction over him.

9464. Mr. Baxter.—But you don't think there should be any re-examination?—No.

9465. The Chairman.—Do you think that a country practitioner, even under the present system, should be allowed to follow his case into the Supreme Court?—I think he should. I don't think he would do it, probably; he would very likely employ an agent in Edinburgh, as he does now; but the advantage of the agent employed by the litigant being the agent in the cause is this, that he is then paid for the work he does. At present his account is not passed by the Auditor of the Court of Session, while he is responsible for the whole costs incurred in Edinburgh.

9466. Do you mean that he and the Edinburgh agent should both be paid?—We think that what are called extrajudicial costs should be allowed as costs in the cause; that whenever a person is completely successful in a litigation, all the proper and necessary expense incurred in that litigation should be awarded to him. It is very hard that a man should be dragged into court, to go through a long litigation, to be found in the end completely right, and yet have a large sum of money to pay.

9467. Does that imply that the country agent is to conduct the cause in the Court of Session?—No, it does not imply that he is to do it. He would only have the power of doing it. I don't think he would do it.

9468. How would he practically carry it out, if he had the power?—If he were agent in the cause, he would examine the witnesses, prepare the case, and send the precognitions to his Edinburgh agent, instructing him to do what was necessary in Edinburgh. The agent in Edinburgh would do that, and he would be paid for what he did in the cause, as would also the agent in the country, but only one account would be given in, viz. that of the agent whom the litigant employed, and that account would include the items for the work done by the agent in Edinburgh, who would be paid by the country agent.

9469. But if the country agent were himself to conduct the cause in Edinburgh, how would he go to work?—I don't see that he could conduct the cause in Edinburgh unless he were to go there.

9470. Supposing he were to go there, would he remain there while the cause lasted?—It could only be done by his going to Edinburgh altogether.

9471. By becoming an Edinburgh practitioner?—Yes; and that is a thing which, of course, he would not do.

9472. Mr. Webster.—Except that the accounts are not amalgamated, is not the present system exactly what you describe as the right system?—Well, it professes to be that; but in point of fact it is just this, that the country agent's account is disallowed, except for a letter or two.

9473. Mr. Baxter.—I suppose you find few clients in the country who would be able to conduct their own defence?—Even intelligent merchants frequently don't know the points of their case. They will tell you the whole story, but they would be quite incapable of conducting the defence.

9474. The Chairman.—I suppose you don't profess to be able to give us any information about criminal matters?—No; except that we reported that the Sheriff should have power in his ordinary jurisdiction to sentence to penal servitude, and that in his summary jurisdiction he should be allowed to impose sentences of six months' imprisonment. The reason of that suggestion is, that a vast proportion of the prisoners brought up in the Criminal Court are professional thieves. They live by plunder; they are well known to the police; and they come up time after time for conviction, and are sent to prison. It is a great expense to the country to have them confined in prison waiting the assize, and then there are all the expenses connected with their conviction. Perhaps nine-tenths of the criminal cases are cases which come from what are called the criminal population.

9475. Mr. Baxter.—And the cases are very simple in their nature?—Yes; thefts.

9476. The Chairman.—Have you a Bailie Court in Aberdeen?—Yes; and it has an assessor; but there are no civil cases now brought before it.

9477. Mr. Webster.—There is a Dean of Guild in Aberdeen?—Yes.

9478. Is there a Dean of Guild Court?—It does not hold sittings, but the Dean exercises his jurisdiction. I think it would probably be an improvement if the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild were extended to the Sheriff. I had a practical exemplification lately of the inconvenience of the present system. A man proceeded to take down a house, half of which belonged to him, and the other half to another person; by his operations the house was likely to fall, and I had to apply to the Sheriff for an interdict. He then applied to the Dean of Guild for an inspection under his authority. So there was a process going on before the Sheriff, and another process going on before the Dean of Guild, which was awkward. W. F. Ogg.

9479. The Chairman.—You used the expression that the jurisdiction should be extended to the Sheriff. Did you mean transferred to the Sheriff?—Yes.

9480. Mr. Baxter.—Do people who intend to build houses in Aberdeen apply to the Dean of Guild for warrant to build?—No; not to the Dean of Guild. By a Police statute they are bound to get the authority of the Commissioners of Police, and to submit their plans to them.

9481. The Chairman.—Would you abolish that?—No. That is a statutory power, and it is useful; and the commissioners have power, wherever there is an encroachment on the street, or wherever they require part of the ground for public purposes, to take it at a valuation, as under the Lands Clauses Act.

9482. Do you think the Commissioners of Police are good judges as to regulations for building?—I think they are good enough judges of what is useful for the community. They only interfere in cases where it is for the public advantage to widen a street, and where they deem it expedient to take part of the property of a person proposing to build; but they are not allowed to interfere till he does propose to build. I think it is a useful power.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD COLONSAY IN THE CHAIR.

JAMES WHITE, Esq., examined.

9483. The Chairman.—You carry on business in Glasgow?—Yes; I am a manufacturing chemist in Glasgow, a partner of the firm of John & James White. James White.

9484. You are a member of the Merchants' House?—Yes; and I am a director of the Chamber of Commerce. I may explain that I practised professionally in Glasgow as a partner of the firm of Couper & White, writers, for about seventeen years.

9485. As a practitioner before the Sheriff Court?—Yes.

9486. When did you cease to be so?—In 1851. I was so from 1834 to 1851.

9487. You have had an opportunity of observing the working of the Sheriff Court in Glasgow?—Yes, to a considerable extent, and also from communication with mercantile men, having a knowledge of the general opinion that prevails in regard to the efficiency of the court.

9488. Have you any observations to submit as to the constitution of the court, as consisting of the Sheriff and his substitutes? The Sheriff has three substitutes in Glasgow?—Yes. I don't see that any improvement almost could be made upon the system of the Sheriff-substitutes, with an appeal to the Sheriff-deputes in civil cases; but I think that the number of Sheriff-substitutes throughout the country might with advantage be reduced, and possibly also the number of Sheriff-deputes, throwing different counties together.

9489. Do you think that could be done in regard to Lanarkshire?—I don't think it could in Lanarkshire, because, with the amount of work which the Sheriffs have to do there, it would be hardly practicable to throw more work upon them, or to reduce the number of substitutes. In fact, if the work of some of the other courts were thrown on the Sheriff-substitutes, they would probably have more to do than they could overtake, and it would be necessary to have an increased number of them.

9490. That is in the city of Glasgow?—Yes.

9491. As to Hamilton, Lanark, and Airdrie, do you think that it is expedient to have a Sheriff-substitute at each of these places?—I think so. In these districts there is a large mining population, and a considerable amount of commercial wealth.

9492. Mr. Paterson.—Does that hold equally in regard to Lanark?—I am not quite prepared to go into details as to the districts from which the substitutes should be taken away. But I know, for instance, that in Bute the Sheriff-substitute has comparatively little to do. I would therefore be disposed to throw more work upon an efficient Sheriff-substitute in one district, and to amalgamate various counties or districts. I see no difficulty, for instance, in the Sheriff-substitute of Renfrewshire undertaking the work at Bute.

9493. The Chairman.—Do you mean the Sheriff-substitute at Greenock?—Yes.

9494. Do you think he could undertake the work of Paisley also?—I hardly think so, as Paisley is a large place, and in Greenock a good many maritime questions arise; but I am not prepared to give an opinion in detail as to these matters.

9495. You merely give a general opinion that there might be a reduction of the number of Sheriff-substitutes?—Yes.

9496. You think the system otherwise is a good system?—I think so. I think it is an immense advantage to have a simple and expeditious appeal from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff-depute.

9497. Do you form that opinion entirely from your own observation, or is it partly founded on what you understand to be the feeling of mercantile men in Glasgow?—Both from my own experience, and also from communication with other mercantile men in Glasgow. As to the Sheriff-deputes, I would be very much disposed to reduce their number. Of course, necessarily, their salaries must be increased, because if you give a man more work to do, you cannot ask him to do it for the same remuneration; and in regard to Sheriff-deputes I am very much disposed to have men in that position who have had large experience and practice in the courts before their appointment as Sheriff-deputes.

9498. Mr. Adam.—Would you think it an advantage that they should still continue to practise?—No; what I propose would preclude them from practising altogether.

9499. Mr. Baxter.—Would you give them larger districts than they have just now?—Yes.

9500. Mr. Webster.—So as to be fair occupation for their whole time?—I would look very much to the extent, population, and valuation of the districts where they were, because in many cases I am satisfied that Sheriff-deputes have not that amount of work that they could undertake; from their professional occupation otherwise in Edinburgh, they are very often unable to overtake the work that falls on their shoulders, and a good deal of delay is necessarily caused by their making their judicial position subordinate to what they feel to be their personal position as advocates practising at the bar.

9501. The Chairman.—That is the ground on which you form your opinion?—Yes.

9502. Mr. Baxter.—You propose that their whole time should be devoted to their appellate duties?—Yes.

9503. And you would pay them accordingly?—Yes.

9504. Have you considered where you would place them, or do you think they should reside in Edinburgh?—I don't see any advantage in fixing their place of residence. Edinburgh is perhaps as central a point as any; and from associations, as well as local interest, they would probably mostly centre there. There would be this advantage, that in cases of difficulty they might be able to consult with one another, if they had doubt or hesitation in their own minds as to the course they should take in any particular case.

9505. Mr. Adam.—Supposing you were to diminish the number of Sheriff-substitutes, have you considered how the summary criminal jurisdiction would be provided for in such a case as taking away the Sheriff-substitute from Bute?—I think the facility of getting from Greenock to Bute is now so great that there would be no difficulty about that.

9506. You think the Sheriff-substitute at Greenock might go to Bute to try the summary cases there?—Quite well; and the facility of travelling all over the country by railways is now so easy and cheap, that I don't think there would be any difficulty about it.

9507. You would not take the prisoners to Greenock to him?—If it were thought better to do so, I think the one would be as easily done as the other. It depends very much on the amount of business.

9508. Mr. Webster.—If you took the prisoners to Greenock, you would require to take the witnesses there also?—Clearly.

9509. Mr. Adam.—That would be a great expense?—I suppose you get from Rothesay to Greenock for sixpence or a shilling, so that it is not a very serious matter.

9510. Might it not be serious for a prisoner to take all his witnesses that distance?—A prisoner has not generally very many witnesses to take. The witnesses are generally on the other side.

9511. But if the prisoner had witnesses to take, it might become a serious difficulty?—It might; but the same question arises in that district just now with regard to Arran. There is no resident Sheriff-substitute there; and throughout the whole of the country you might just as well have a Sheriff-substitute at every little village for the facility which would arise of trying all questions which might come up. It is only on the general principle that I would be disposed to speak, rather than with reference to the details of each individual case.

9512. Mr. Baxter.—In the appellate courts would you have the Sheriffs to sit singly or cumulatively?—I don't see much benefit to be got by having two Sheriffs sitting in the appeal court.

9513. Then you think they should sit singly?—Yes.

9514. The Chairman.—The alteration that you would make would be to reduce the number of Sheriff-substitutes, and to reduce the number of Sheriffs, by enlarging the area over which they would exercise jurisdiction; and you would prohibit the Sheriffs from practising at the bar?—Yes.

9515. You would allow them to reside in Edinburgh, and you think there would be an advantage in their doing so, because they would have an opportunity of consulting with each other?—Yes; and Edinburgh is so central that they could go to any part of the country with facility.

9516. Do you think it is also a reason for their residing in Edinburgh, that they would have an opportunity of seeing the practice of the courts of law, and of keeping their minds up with the progress of cases there?—I think that would be an advantage, although I would consider it such an advantage as to compel them to reside in Edinburgh. I would leave that very much to the individual Sheriff.

9517. Have you considered the question of extending the jurisdiction of the Sheriff?—My feeling is, that the jurisdiction of the Sheriff should be very materially extended.

9519. Have you formed any notion as to the extent to which it should be limited in the meantime?—My own feeling is to make it unlimited, because if a Sheriff-substitute or a Sheriff-depute is allowed to have an unlimited range in regard to moveables, I don't think there is any peculiar reason applicable to heritage why they should not have the same unlimited jurisdiction in disposing of questions of a heritable nature.

9520. When you said that perhaps it might be as well in the meantime, as a tentative measure, to limit it in some degree, had you any idea as to the extent of the limit?—It occurred to me that questions of £500 or £1000 of value, and an equivalent of say 5 per cent of rental, might be a safe measure to commence with.

9521. Mr. Campbell.—Don't you think the difficulty would be very much obviated by giving either party to the litigation a right to transfer the case, without any reason assigned, at once to the Court of Session, if he was dissatisfied with the tribunal to which he was called?—Do you mean that, if a pursuer had raised an action in the Sheriff Court, it should be transferred to the Court of Session of consent of parties?

9522. No; that the defender might, by putting in a minute, have a right to get the case transferred to the Court of Session?—I don't see why a defender more than a pursuer should have that in his power.

9523. As a tentative measure it would give a defender a right to take the case to another court; and if defenders generally did not do so, would that not show that the litigants were satisfied with the Sheriff Court as a tribunal for disposing of these questions?—I cannot see any reason why the public should be dissatisfied with the judgment of the Sheriff on a question of heritable right, any more than in a question regarding moveables.

9525. Would you give the same kind of power in reference to questions of heritable right?—Does that mean before the merits of the question have been disposed of?

9526. Yes?—The practical working of that had not occurred to me; but I do not see any difficulty in acceding to it. I don't see any reason against it.

9527. Mr. Campbell.—If you were informed that that power was scarcely ever exercised of late years by the litigants, don't you think that the question I asked before, as to a similar power being conferred with regard to questions of heritable right, might be a good mode of trying, as a tentative measure, whether the Sheriff Court was a satisfactory tribunal for disposing of questions of heritable right?—My feeling is so strong in favour of the Sheriff Court, and I have such a dread of the Court of Session, that I would rather be disposed to let the case remain within the jurisdiction of the Sheriff, than even give the defender power to take it to the Court of Session. I would give it a fair trial, making it a compulsitor on the parties to take the decision of the Sheriff.

9528. The Chairman.—And then have a second run in the Court of Session?—To a certain extent I would preclude that too. I would be very much disposed to extend the power of the Sheriff, and to preclude appeals or advocations on questions involving questions not exceeding £100 or £200 in value. I would rather have these final in the Sheriff Court, with the decision of the Sheriff-depute, and preclude the parties from carrying such cases any further.

9529. You would limit the finality to questions of that value?—Yes.

9530. Would you apply the same rule to heritage?—I would.

9531. Mr. Webster.—Your view would be, to have all the facts investigated in the Sheriff Court?—Precisely so.

9532. Mr. Shand.—Would you make the Sheriff's decision final, both in fact and law, in regard to such cases?—Both in the one and the other.

9533. Do you think it would be satisfactory to the mercantile community, that there should be no power of appeal in cases of that value?—That subject was considered at a meeting of the directors of the Chamber of Commerce the day before yesterday, and the members had a considerable variety of opinion as to amount; but they had no difference in opinion that the power of appeal should be fixed at a higher limit than it is just now.

9534. What do you understand the limit to be just now?—£25.

9535. What was the range of sums that was suggested?—I think the general feeling seemed to be something like £100; but my own feeling is, that it might be extended with perfect safety to £200.

9536. Do you not think that if an action for £200 was raised, which was of much importance to the defender, and the defender was anxious to have a decision of the Supreme Court upon it, he should have a power of removing it from the Sheriff Court?—I would say not. In my experience, questions of that kind often arise from feeling, and the litigation is carried on, not so much for the real value of the question, as ultimately for the expenses that have been incurred.

9537. In many cases, may not such a sum as £200 involve a party's whole means almost?—So it may; but supposing he loses it in the Inner House, the expenses are by that time so enormous that he may be a loser in the end; and if he is to be ruined, it may as well be done early as in the end.

9538. The case you put involves his going through two courts, whereas the case I am putting is, that he should be enabled to remove the action at once from the Sheriff Court to the Supreme Court?—And then to the House of Lords. You would leave that open too?

9539. That may be another question?—Well, my feeling is, that great benefit would accrue from prohibiting appeals in questions that do not exceed in value from £100 to £200.

9540. And you would not couple with that, a privilege to the defender, if he thought the case of vital importance to him, of removing it from the Sheriff Court before it had gone through all its stages in that court?—No, I would not.

9541. Mr. Gordon.—Why would you give the pursuer the privilege, and not the defender?—They are both in pari casu.

9543. Where a party did not wish the cause to be concluded by the Sheriff's judgment, but wished the opinion of a higher tribunal, would you not give him a power of transferring it to that higher tribunal?—I don't look to the position of the pursuer or the defender individually, but to the general advantage that would accrue to the community, whether a party is pursuer or defender; and I think it would be of great benefit, if the finality of the judgment of the Sheriff were recognised by both parties before they engaged in the lawsuit.

9544. Mr. Webster.—You would have all such cases brought before the Sheriff?—Yes.

9545. The Chairman.—Would you preclude any case beyond £200 from being brought into the Court of Session?—No; I don't think I would do that either.

9546. Then you give the pursuer a choice of his tribunal?—Yes.

9547. But no choice to the defender?—No.

9548. Mr. Baxter.—If the defender had a power of removing a case in its first stage, would that not be giving the power of selecting the tribunal to the defender?—Yes, clearly it would.

9549. Mr. Paterson.—Supposing a defender to be convened before the Sheriff in an action which ostensibly involved £50 or £100, but really a question of heritable right, might it not be that the decision of that question would settle the validity of his title to a large estate? The rent of one farm might be selected to try the whole question?—You mean, holding it as res judicata in any other like question that might arise?

9550. Holding the decision for what it might be worth?—I don't see that you can preclude such cases as that from arising.

9551. Would you not, in that case, give the defender a right to remove the case at a preliminary stage to the Supreme Court?—It would be very difficult, I think, to provide for all such questions.

9552. The question as to the validity of a proprietor's right to a large property, might be brought by a multiplepoinding raised as to the rent of one tenant. Would that not be practically giving the Sheriff jurisdiction to an unlimited extent, unless you give the defender power to remove the case to the Court of Session?—I don't think any drawback would arise from that. My feeling would be, on principle, to extend it unlimitedly; but as a prudential and tentative measure, I would be inclined to fix the value at £500 or so.

9553. The Chairman.—There might be some difficulty as to fixing the value of the subject; because, supposing it were part of an estate only that was in issue, and that the result of the loss of that portion might be material as regards the rest of the estate not in issue, would you preclude the party from removing it to the Court of Session?—That is one of the drawbacks in limiting the amount, certainly; but I think that might be got over. We have the valuation roll and other means at hand to ascertain the value of the subject at issue.

9554. Mr. Harrison.—If means could be found to cheapen and shorten procedure in the Supreme Court, would that modify your opinion as to making the decision of the Sheriff Court final?—No, it would not. I don't think it is possible to cheapen it, and to accelerate the procedure to such an extent as ever to make the Court of Session a desirable court for questions of such an amount.

9555. You think that the majority of mercantile men, whether as pursuers or defenders, would rather submit to the risk of an occasional wrong decision, for the sake of a speedy final judgment?—Most assuredly.

9556. Lord Barcaple.—Do you confine that to mercantile men?—No.

9557. Is there any difference in that respect between mercantile men and other men?—Sometimes a landed proprietor may have nothing else to do but a good-going law plea, and having nothing else to do he can afford it; but a mercantile man has other things to look after, and he has a dislike to get into litigation. In an immense number of cases in Glasgow, the parties, instead of getting involved in a law-suit, the end of which they don't foresee, enter into a submission, or compromise the case. In my professional experience, I always invariably recommended the parties to make a considerable sacrifice rather than go into the Court of Session.

9558. Are there many submissions in Glasgow?—A great many questions of a commercial character are submitted to commercial men.

9559. Mr. Campbell.—Are there many submissions to lawyers?—There are a good many.

9560. Lord Barcaple.—To lawyers in Glasgow?—To lawyers practising in Glasgow.

9561. Submissions of commercial questions?—Yes.

9562. Questions between merchant and merchant?—Yes.

9563. Or between merchant and customer?—No; they are more between merchant and merchant, and merchant and tradesmen.

9564. Merchants and tradesmen whom they are supplying?—Yes; or contracting with.

9565. Has that kind of reference to lawyers been increasing or diminishing?—Submissions generally, I would say, have been increasing. I cannot say whether the number to lawyers has been increasing or diminishing. I would say there are more submissions, but probably there are more questions arising.

9566. Are there many submissions from mercantile men in Glasgow and the west of Scotland to members of the bar?—I don't think it.

9567. Have there been more in your recollection than there are now?—I don't think it. I think matters are very much as they were.

9568. And you think they are few in number?—I would say they are few.

9569. Very few?—Very few in my experience. There are a number of cases where mercantile men agree upon a statement of the case, without pleadings or anything of that kind, similar almost to taking the opinion of counsel, and they send the case to counsel in Edinburgh as a joint case for opinion; and they are guided by that. One of the great advantages which I think a commercial community feel they derive from that mode of settling their cases is that the decision of the referees, or of the oversman, as the case may be, is final, and the case cannot go beyond that.

9570. The Chairman.—You have spoken of extending the jurisdiction of the Sheriff in heritable matters. Are there any other cases to which you would extend his jurisdiction?—Yes; I would likewise extend it to cases of divorce and legitimacy.

9571. And declarator of marriage?—Yes.

9572. To questions of status?—Yes.

9573. Mr. Webster.—Would you extend it to protection of a wife's earnings?—Yes; and to separations.

9574. The Chairman.—Is there any class of cases to which you would not extend it?—I am not aware that there is any class of cases that I would exclude from the Sheriff's consideration.

9575. Mr. Paterson.—In your recollection of your professional experience, would you say that cases were as carefully and exhaustively prepared for judgment in the local courts as they are in the Court of Session?—I would not say that they were so in my day; but great improvements have been made since that time both in the procedure in the Sheriff Court, and also in the status of the procurators practising before the Sheriff Court.

9576. But is the present system in the Sheriff Court, with one individual agent on each side, equal to that in the Supreme Court, where you have counsel, one or more, and an agent on each side?—I would not say that it is quite equal to it. With a Glasgow agent, and an Edinburgh agent, and an Edinburgh counsel, you should have more wisdom than you would have in the head of one Glasgow procurator alone.

9577. Might not an important case, involving large interests, suffer in its preparation, and the ends of justice suffer by its being final in the Sheriff Court?—I don't think it would.

9579. Would you suggest any change on the system of pleading,—writs or appeals?—I cannot say that my knowledge of Sheriff Court practice now is such as would warrant me in making any suggestions as to the internal management of the procedure in the court, excepting this, that I would do everything possible to prevent delay and save expense to the parties, because that is the great source of complaint in all judicial proceedings on the part of the commercial community.

9580. They want cheap and speedy decisions?—Yes; and it seems to me, from my knowledge of some cases that have occurred, that that can be got, and has been got elsewhere, and I don't see that it should be impossible for Scotchmen to obtain the same rapidity and the same economy in their judicial procedure.

9581. Mr. Campbell.—Are you acquainted with the provisions of the recent statute for the recovery of certain debts?—I have had no personal experience of it; but as far as my knowledge goes, the community don't seem to be satisfied with it.

9582. Mr. Smythe.—To what do you refer when you speak of speedy and cheap justice elsewhere?—Well, there is a case that gave me a very strong impression of the advantage of the English system over the Scotch, —a case that we ourselves had some years ago, when we raised an action in the Court of Queen's Bench for a sum of £1500. The action was raised on the 14th of March 1857; the whole proceedings were completed, and the case put down for trial on the 30th of June of the same year; but the trial was adjourned on that day, and the case was tried on 8th July, before Lord Campbell. It was one of six cases tried by jury before him on the same day. Three or four of them were disposed of after full investigation, and ours came on at a quarter past two o'clock; and I think we got our verdict by a quarter to four, or thereabouts.

9583. Mr. Baxter.—Were you present?—Yes.

9584. Did it satisfy you?—Perfectly.

9585. Lord Barcaple.—What was the nature of the case?—It was an action of damages for breach of contract.

9586. What was the nature of the contract?—It was a written contract to deliver a certain quantity of goods within a certain time.

9587. What was the real dispute between the parties?—In the first place, the defender disputed that we had sustained any loss by non-implement of the contract; and the question came to be, whether he was bound to deliver within a specified time, and to deliver a specific article.

9588. The Chairman.—That would appear in the writing?—That appeared in the writing. It was not a formal contract; it was in correspondence.

9589. Lord Barcaple.—And the jury, under the direction of the judge, determined that point?—Yes.

3590. Mr. Shand.—How many witnesses were examined?—Four witnesses were examined. The examination of the witnesses, the opening speech of the defender's counsel, the charge of the judge, and the verdict of the jury, all took place within something like a couple of hours.

9591. The Chairman.—Had the defender no witnesses?—There were two witnesses for the pursuer, and two for the defender.

9592. Was that as to the amount of damage?—It was.

9593. Lord Barcaple.—Were you for the pursuer, or for the defender?—We were ourselves the pursuers.

9594. Did you gain or lose the case?—We gained the case.

9595. Do you remember when you got your costs taxed?—The verdict was given on 8th July, and we got our costs taxed, and the sum due us was paid on the 24th July.

9596. Before the long vacation?—Yes.

9597. Mr. Webster.—Can you give us any description of the other trials which preceded this?—They were very much questions of a similar kind,—commercial questions as to the validity or non-implement of contracts, some of them for smaller sums, £60 to £100. I don't think any of them were for such large sums as ours.

9598. Were any of them for goods sold and delivered?—I cannot charge my memory with the particulars.

9599. Mr. Shand.—Were there witnesses examined in them all?—In some there were no witnesses.

9600. And in those in which witnesses were examined, there were very few witnesses?—Yes.

9601. Lord Barcaple.—Where was the trial?—In London.

9602. At Westminister?—No, it was in the city.

9603. Was it in term time?—It was in July.

9604. Mr. Paterson.—What were the total costs on both sides?—I cannot tell you that; but the costs we recovered amounted to £26, 9s.

9605. The pursuer's costs, as got from the defender, were £26, 9s.?—Yes.

9606. Mr. Baxter.—Had you to pay any extra costs?—Yes, we had; but I don't recollect the amount. There was an account that we paid; but it involved a number of other questions in which our London solicitor was employed.

9607. The Chairman.—Was the £26, 9s. the expense of the whole case, or the expense of the day?—It was the expense of the whole cause that we recovered from the defender. The expenses otherwise that we paid came to £83, 3s. 9d.; but that included fees of professional witnesses who had not been examined, and of other witnesses who came up to attend; but our solicitor in London said it was quite unnecessary to examine them.

9608. Lord Barcaple.—Do you mean that, in consequence of their not being examined, you could not put them in your bill of costs?—Yes.

9609. Do you understand that to be a fixed rule in England?—I don't know; but it was so in our case.

9610. Did you put them in, and were they struck out?—I don't think it.

9611. Mr. Adam.—What was the amount at issue in that case?—The sum claimed was £1500, and we recovered £869, 14s.

9612. Mr. Shand.—Does the £83 represent the whole costs you had to pay?—Everything.

9613. Mr. Gordon.—You said it was put down for the 30th of June?—Yes, it was put down first for the 30th of June.

9614. Were you kept in attendance from that time forward?—No, I came home that night. I went up by the evening train two days before, and when I heard that from some cause or other the case was not to come on, I returned home the next night.

9615. When was it next put down?—A week afterwards.

9616. Mr. Murray.—How did you do with your witnesses?—The witnesses were not called up to London on the first occasion. We were to telegraph for them.

9617. Mr. Gordon.—What was the commodity?—Chromate of iron,—an article which we dealt in.

9618. Mr. Adam.—Have you any experience in any case which you lost in England?—That is the only case I have had in England.

9619. Mr. Baxter.—Had you ever a jury trial in Scotland?—I never had a jury trial in Scotland myself; but I know sufficient about them to deter me from entering on any jury trial in Scotland.

9620. Mr. Paterson.—Is the case you mention a reported one?—Yes.

9621. What was the defender's name?—Guistiniani, a Greek.

9622. The Chairman.—Was there any concession in the course of trial?—No. The reason why the sum we got was less than the sum claimed was this, that independent of the breach of contract, we had supplied ourselves with the article from another source, and paid an increased price for it, which entitled us to compensation for that from the defender. In addition, we maintained that the value of the article we got was greatly inferior to the article which we should have got, and that the defender was bound to indemnify us for that difference. But unfortunately—I don't know from what cause—the two samples of chromate of iron sent up to the chemists had got displaced, and we found it our interest, as we had not evidence at hand, and could not repeat the analysis in time for the trial, to forego asking that, and rest satisfied with the reduced sum.

9623. Mr. Murray.—Does your experience entitle you to say that that is a fair sample of jury trial in England, in regard to expense?—No. I am not prepared to say that. I only give it as an illustration of the difference in point of rapidity and economy as contrasted with Scotland.

9624. The Chairman.—From the nature of your business, you probably took some interest in the question of Mr. Young's patent?—Yes.

9625. Are you aware that there was a trial as to that patent in the Court of Chancery?—Yes.

9626. Are you aware how long that question lasted?—I don't recollect at this moment.

9627. Are you aware that it lasted upwards of thirty days?—I know it was a very protracted trial.

9628. Are you aware that there was a trial as to that patent in Scotland?—Yes.

9629. Are you aware how long it lasted?—It was not so long.

9630. It was six or seven days?—Yes; but all that I mean is, that if in one court expedition and economy can be practised, it is surely possible to practise them in another.

9631. Is it your opinion that if there could be expedition and economy in one case, it necessarily follows that there can be the same in other cases?—It is not of universal application, certainly; but in my experience of jury trials in Scotland, the cases are terribly overloaded.

9632. Lord Barcaple.—In what way?—In the first place, as a rule, there are three witnesses cited for one that is examined, and the whole matter made of far more importance than a commercial man would be disposed to attribute to the disposal of a case of that amount.

James White.

9633. Who do you think does that?—It is a great deal attributable, I daresay, to the agents.

9634. Which agents?—The agents in Edinburgh.

9635. Do you think the agents in the country are not so apt to wish that a large number of witnesses should be sent up?—They have not the same control or say in the management of the case as the Edinburgh agent. They are very much subordinated to him in the conducting of a jury trial.

9636. They have the original patronage of it, have they not?—They may have the patronage, but they have not the carrying of it out.

9637. You think it is the Edinburgh agents that urge the bringing up unnecessary witnesses?—The conduct of the case is very much in their hands, and I daresay, from an over-zeal to gain the case, they perhaps advise the country agent rather to have too many witnesses than too few.

9638. Are you aware that there is a rule in Scotland about the costs and expenses of witnesses not being allowed unless they have been examined?—I understand that to be the case.

9639. Do you know whether that ever induces the parties to examine witnesses when it is plain that there is no use of examining them?—I have no doubt of that.

9640. I suppose you have no doubt that very greatly lengthens many jury trials?—Quite so.

9641. And increases the expenses in that way?—Clearly.

9642. Mr. Paterson.—Does it come within your knowledge that the client of the provincial agent often presses a superabundance of witnesses upon him in his zeal for his case?—I don't think it. In my experience I don't think the client has very much to say.

9643. Mr. Gordon.—In the case you mention, did you not say that there were several witnesses who were brought, but were not examined?—That was in consequence of our inability to examine them as to the quality of the ore, from the samples having got confused.

9644. And not for any other reason?—No.

9645. How many witnesses had you in attendance in that case?—I think we had three scientific witnesses, who were not examined, and other two.

9646. Were these not examined?—They were examined. There were none but the scientific witnesses on our side who were not examined. The other two were the mercantile witnesses, who spoke to the value of the commodity.

9647. Mr. Baxter.—And these professional witnesses would have been examined but for the miscarriage of which you have spoken?—Yes; and we expected that they would have got us £500 additional.

9648. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Had you a special or a common jury in that case?—A common jury.

9649. Do you think the constitution of the juries in England and Scotland may affect the question of the length of trials to a considerable extent?—It should not do so.

9650. Do you think that juries in England make up their minds more rapidly under the direction of the judge than juries in Scotland do?—If you have a common jury, I should expect that, whether in England or Scotland.

9651. Lord Barcaple.—Do you think it is impossible in the Court of Session to have a simple case, such as you have been telling us about, brought to an end in the same time as that case was in England?—All I can say is, that I never knew of one.

9652. But do you think it is impossible, if the parties wish speed?—I think it is impossible under the present system.

9653. Why?—There are so many parties engaged.

9654. How are there more parties engaged in Scotland than in England?—In Scotland you have a country agent and the Edinburgh agent and counsel.

9655. Have you not in England practically exactly the same number?—Yes, you have. Therefore there must be something in the mode of procedure. I know that the papers in our case were few and little in bulk, whereas here they would probably have been voluminous and very bulky.

9656. Are you sure that, in a simple case like that, the papers would have been more than six or seven pages?—Yes; I would say so.

9657. And you are sure that it would occupy a longer time to obtain a judgment in such a case in Scotland?—Yes.

9658. Would you be surprised if you were told of cases of that class, in which judgments are got in the same time in Scotland?—I would be surprised to find that in any litigated case.

9659. You are judging from one case in England that you were personally acquainted with?—And several others that I have heard of from commercial men, who had had similar experience.

9660. Have you a large acquaintance as to the progress of causes in Scotland?—I have.

9661. And you are satisfied that parties desirous of an early judgment could not get a judgment in a simple case like that in the same time?—I hardly think so.

9662. Mr. Murray.—Would you be surprised if you were told that the Court of Session decided yesterday an important case relating to the means of a gentleman who died on 18th October last?—I certainly would, unless the decision was given in a case where the parties were at one as to the facts.

9663. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—I suppose your attention has been called to the power given under a recent Act to state a special case for the decision of the Court of Session?—I think that is a vast improvement, but I would not call that a litigated case.

9664. Why not?—Because the parties don't go through the formal steps which are gone through in the ordinary procedure before the Court of Session. The getting up of the record and adjustment of an issue for a jury trial, I have known to take a year and a half.

9665. But if parties are disposed to have a case decided by the Court of Session, and agree in presenting a case, a judgment may be obtained in a short time?—Yes; but I don't regard that as coming under the ordinary Court of Session procedure.

9666. Supposing that power exists in the Court of Session, would you say that the Court of Session procedure was necessarily dilatory and expensive?—I look upon that as an exceptional case, and I regard it more as a reference by parties to the court to decide upon an admitted statement of facts. Now, I would say that the great majority of cases that come before the court involve questions where the facts are disputed, and the difficulty is to get the parties to be at one on the facts, so as to enable the court to form a judgment on the merits and apply the law.

9667. Lord Barcaple.—You are speaking of the general class of cases in the Court of Session when you say that the great majority of them are cases where the facts are disputed?—Yes.

9668. Has that been the case in your experience in the Court of Session?—It has.

9669. Do you think that has been the general impression on that subject?—I really cannot speak to that.

9670. Are you aware that there is a very large number of cases in the Court of Session in which there is no dispute about the facts, involving the merits of the case?—There may be no dispute as to the facts; but it may take a very long time before the parties come to be at one as to the facts under the procedure you have just now, with condescendence and answers; and the difficulty of arriving at what the facts are, necessarily causes delay.

9671. What difficulty do you allude to?—In the outset of a case, it would often seem to turn on a very different point from what it is ultimately decided upon.

9672. Seem to whom? To the parties, do you mean?—To the parties.

9673. Then they must not understand their own pleadings?—I would not exactly say that either.

9674. Then how do they not see the point?—I have seen very often, in my experience, a condescendence in the Court of Session completely altered from what it was at first.

9675. You mean upon revisal?—Yes.

9676. Are you aware that that revisal very seldom takes place?—I believe so. I think there has been a great improvement in the Court of Session since I had experience of it.

9677. Mr. Shand.—You are satisfied that the recent Act contains a great many improvements?—Yes.

9678. Are you favourable to jury trial for the settlement of questions of fact?—I cannot say that I have any partiality to jury trials at all.

9679. Can you tell us what is the feeling of the commercial community whom you represent as to jury trial as a mode of investigating questions of fact?—The opinion is that it is very unsatisfactory as a rule.

9680. You mean they don't like it?—No, they don't.

9681. Have you any suggestion to make on that subject? Would you desire to see jury trial abolished, or do you look forward to see it improved and made useful?—I would be rather disposed to abolish it altogether, except in a few cases involving character, the press, insanity, or crime, and to take another mode of establishing the facts.

9682. Why?—From its very great uncertainty and its unsatisfactory character. In fact, as a rule, people have a feeling that in jury trials it is a toss-up whether they gain or lose.

9683. Mr. Baxter.—And there is a feeling that it is very expensive?—Yes; and very tedious.

9684. Mr. Shand.—But apart from the question about expense?—I think it is unsatisfactory in itself.

9685. Have you considered what you would propose to substitute for it?—No, I have not. I cannot speak as to that.

9686. Mr. Murray.—Did you ever hear mercantile men in England express their opinion of their own courts?—No, I have had very little experience of them.

9687. Mr. Campbell.—As an abstract question, is it your view that professional lawyers are better judges of evidence than juries selected at random, and put in the box?—I would say so.

9688. Mr. Paterson.—Would you be more content with the opinion of one judge—a professional man—than with the opinions of twelve jurymen upon matter of fact?—Do you mean a Sheriff-depute or a judge in the Court of Session?

9689. Either?—I would be much more satisfied with the verdict of the one than the verdict of the majority of the twelve.

9690. Mr. Shand.—Do you think it would be satisfactory, that where a judge tries a question of fact arising in a case, his decision on the evidence should be final on the matter of fact?—I think so. Do you speak of the Sheriff Court?

9691. Either of the Sheriff Court or of the Court of Session?—I don't understand that the judgment of the Court of Session is final either upon fact or law just now.

9692. Suppose you substitute for a jury a judge sitting alone, either in the Sheriff Court or in the Court of Session, do you think it would be satisfactory to the litigants that his judgment should be final on the question of fact, without review upon the question of fact, leaving a review on questions of law?—I would rather be disposed to allow an appeal on the whole case, not limiting it either to the one or the other, in the same way as you have an appeal from the Sheriff Court to the court here on the evidence adduced; the court judge of the value of the evidence, and decide the principle of law as applicable to the evidence which, in their opinion, establishes a particular fact.

9693. Are you aware that a very large part of the expense of litigation at present arises from the necessity for recording evidence at length, and printing it, and making it matter of discussion at different stages of the review of the case?—It does, no doubt.

9694. Is that not a very great evil?—Yes; but I don't see how you can very well avoid it.

9695. Would you prefer that that evil and that great expense should exist, rather than be shut up to the decision of a single judge as conclusive upon the evidence as to matter of fact?—My predilection is rather to prevent appeals, and I would forego something to attain that end. James White.

9696. But you cannot say that you think it would be satisfactory to hold the decision of a single judge as final?—I don't see why there should be any greater objection to holding a decision final on matter of fact than on questions of law. The one hinges on the other so completely, that unless the fact is ascertained, the law applicable to it cannot be properly decided.

9697. Would you be favourable to holding it final upon the fact?—I would be very much disposed to do so.

9698. And to let the facts raise the law for consideration?—Yes.

9699. Do you think that would be satisfactory to the mercantile community?—I think so.

9700. Mr. Webster.—Supposing a tribunal, consisting of three judges, to sit in very complicated cases and hear all the evidence, would you be satisfied with a finding of a majority of these three, finally fixing the facts, without power of review?—I don't think there is any very great advantage to be got by the three, because ultimately it comes to the decision possibly of one of them. There may be a difference between two, and the third gives the ruling decision.

9701. Mr. Shand.—Would there not be so great benefit arising from a discussion among three trained minds in regard to the effect of the evidence, as to render it perfectly satisfactory that the decision of such a tribunal in fact should be final?—That might be a mode of making it more satisfactory than leaving it solely to one; but in my opinion that would not be necessary.

9702. Mr. Paterson.—Did it ever occur to you in your experience of jury trial in Scotland, that the verdict was, in some cases, in some degree due more to management at the bar than to what you considered the real merits of the case?—I would say that almost in every case. I think the decision of every case is attributable very much to the management of it by the counsel at the bar.

9703. Do you think that it is equally so in the Jury Court and in the Court of Session?—I would say so; and, in my experience, our first object, if we foresaw a jury trial in a case, was to secure the counsel most eminent in conducting jury cases.

9704. But do you think the court as likely to be influenced by what they hear from the bar as a jury would be?—No, I don't think so; and for that reason I would look to the judge as being safer.

9705. Mr. Webster.—At present, where the court is dissatisfied with the verdict of a jury, what happens when a verdict is upset is merely to land the parties in another costly trial?—Quite so; and the result of that is probably as unsatisfactory as of the first trial.

9706. The Chairman.—If the evidence is taken before a judge in the first instance, being a Sheriff-substitute, and he pronounces findings upon fact, you would have him do so, I suppose, separately from the law, and then to apply the law to the facts; but supposing that he has made a mistake as to the true bearing of the evidence, would you shut out all power of having that inquired into or reviewed?—I understand that the decision of the Sheriff-substitute is subject to the review of the Sheriff-depute.

9707. I rather understood, from an answer which you made to Mr. Shand, that you would hold the evidence of the first judge who heard the evidence as conclusive, without any review. Now, do you think that would be satisfactory?—I understood the case put was, if jury trial was abolished, and a case was remitted to be tried by one of the judges of the Court of Session, sitting and taking the evidence, his decision should be final upon the questions both of fact and of law, subject to review by the Inner House, both on the fact and upon law.

9708. Do you apply that to the Sheriff Court also? Do you think that the Sheriff-substitute's judgment upon matter of fact should be final?—No; I would make it subject to the review of the Sheriff-depute as well on fact as law.

9709. You think there should be some mode of correcting anything that goes wrong?—I think it is advisable that there should. I have known a Sheriff-substitute make a mistake in point of fact, which has been corrected by the Sheriff-depute.

9710. Then the evidence in these cases must be taken down in some form or other?—Certainly; the evidence must be preserved.

9711. Are you satisfied with the manner in which the evidence is now taken down in the Sheriff Court?—I think it devolves on the Sheriff an immense amount of manual labour; and I think it might, with great advantage, be taken down by a shorthand writer, where one can be got.

9712. Lord Barcaple.—Have you had any experience of the use of a shorthand writer for that purpose?—None, beyond having a shorthand writer in taking down other evidence.

9713. You have no experience of it in judicial proceedings?—The only experience I have had of it was in taking down the evidence before the committee of investigation of the North British Railway, of which I was chairman, where the evidence was taken by the same shorthand writer as is now present; and it was exceedingly accurate and satisfactory.

9714. But that was not a proper judicial proceeding?—No.

9715. There was no judge conducting the case?—No.

9716. And no counsel disputing about points of competency?—No.

9717. Mr. Shand.—The same objection in regard to the expense of review does not apply to the Sheriff Court as it does to the Court of Session?—No; the evidence having been once recorded is laid before one judge only, and in the Court of Session it is necessary that it should be printed and laid before a number of judges?—Yes.

9718. Does that in your opinion make a difference?—It does.

9719. The Chairman.—Suppose the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute on fact be reviewed by the Sheriff-depute both on fact and law, and the case be appealed, would you approve of the Court of Session having the same power of reviewing on fact and on law?—Do you mean in cases where the evidence is printed and laid before them?

9720. In cases dependent on fact and law, in which a judgment has been pronounced on fact and on law by the Sheriff-substitute, and that has been reviewed by the Sheriff, and the case is appealed to the Court of Session, would you leave it open to the Court of Session to deal both with the judgment on fact and the judgment in law?—I think so.

9721. And to apply the law to the facts as they regarded them?—I think so. If you are to have a court of review at all, I don't see that you can prevent that.

9722. Mr. Webster.—There is such a court of review in the House of Lords, where decisions upon the law are reviewed, but not upon the facts?—Yes.

9723. Mr. Shand.—Do you think it would be satisfactory, that where cases have originated in the Sheriff Court, the Sheriff's judgment should be final upon the fact, and that his findings in law only should be reviewed by the Court of Session?—I don't see any advantage to be derived from that. If you are to appeal the case at all, you may as well have the appeal on the facts and on the law.

9724. If it would save the printing of the evidence and the discussion on the evidence, would that not be a great advantage?—As a general rule, I think it might be.

9725. Mr. Gordon.—What is your opinion as to the Debts Recovery Act?—I have no experience of it myself, but I have heard parties express dissatisfaction about it.

9726. What parties do you refer to?—Commercial men.

9727. What was the objection to it?—I can hardly go into the merits of the question.

9728. Were they practitioners who objected to it?—No, they were not practitioners.

9729. Lord Barcaple.—Are commercial men much in the Debts Recovery Court?—I don't think it.

9730. The cases there are about very small matters?—As a rule, I would say so.

9731. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestions to offer to the Commissioners?—I think it would be a great improvement to have a stipendiary magistrate in some of the other courts.

9732. What other courts do you refer to?—The Justice of Peace Court, for instance, the Dean of Guild Court, the Burgh Court, and I think also the Police Court.

9733. Would you have a stipendiary magistrate for each of them?—That depends very much on the amount of the duty.

9734. It might be differently arranged in different towns?—For instance in Glasgow, I don't think one stipendiary magistrate could undertake the duties of the Justice of Peace Court, the Dean of Guild Court, the Burgh Court, and the Police Court. No one man could undertake the whole of these.

9735. Is there any disadvantage in having them quite separate, as they are now?—I don't think there is any disadvantage in having them separate. I understand the question to be whether they could not be combined.

9736. I understood you to say that in some places they could not be combined?—That is owing to the number of cases. No single judge could undertake the number of cases which come before these courts in Glasgow.

9737. In some places do you think the Dean of Guild Court could be dispensed with altogether?—I think so.

9738. But not in Glasgow?—I think that instead of the Dean of Guild in Glasgow, there might be a stipendiary magistrate, because practically just now in the Justice of Peace Court, and the Burgh Court, and the Dean of Guild Court, you have an assessor sitting who is in the great bulk of cases practically the judge, but without the responsibility attaching to his decisions. I think the constitution of the Justice of Peace Courts at present, at least in Glasgow, and the large towns, so far as I am cognisant of it, is of a very unsatisfactory character.

9739. In what respect?—For instance, in regard to the licensing question in Glasgow, I know that it has become a question of trial of strength between the two parties of the Justices,—one for licensing everybody and the other for licensing nobody; and at the sitting of each court there is a competition who will have the largest number of persons present of their own particular views, to dispose of the cases that come before them according to the principles they hold.

9740. Are the Justices the parties who deal with the licences in the first instance in Glasgow?—The magistrates dispose of the licences first, and there is a court of review in the Justices.

9741. Does your observation apply to the magistrates also?—No.

9742. You think they exercise their jurisdiction properly?—I think so.

9743. Mr. Smythe.—When you speak of Justice of Peace Courts, do you mean the Justice of Peace Courts for the city of Glasgow, or the Justice of Peace Courts for the whole county?—I am speaking of the Justice of Peace Courts for the city.

9744. You confine your remarks exclusively to them?—Yes; I speak of large towns generally.

9745. The Chairman.—If you think it is well done by the magistrates, and ill done by the Justices, would not the simple course be to have no appeal from the magistrates?—That is my feeling,—that in large towns the decisions of the magistrates on questions of licensing would be much better to be final than subject to the review of the Quarter Sessions.

9746. Do you think the magistrates are not open, or supposed to be open, to influences in regard to licences to parties who are the electors to civic honours?—

In my experience they are not; but if the constituencies were dissatisfied with the magistrates' conduct, they have it in their power not to return them another year to sit in council, and by that means they would have an opportunity of correcting an abuse if it did exist. In the Justice of Peace Court there is no such power.

9747. If it is by the influence of certain parties that the magistrates have been returned to office, the same influence would return them again?—In my experience I never found the magistrates subject to the same influence, or that there has been so much exertion made on the part of magistrates to get others of the same views with themselves to dispose of questions that come before them.

9748. Mr. Harrison.—You think the magistrates feel a greater sense of responsibility?—I think so. That is one of the great drawbacks in the constitution of these courts, that there is no responsibility in the person who pronounces the judgment, because the assessor is not responsible.

9749. The Chairman.—Do you mean in the Justice of Peace Courts?—And also the Burgh Court and the Dean of Guild Court in civil cases.

9750. Mr. Baxter.—There was formerly a great deal of civil business in the Burgh Court?—In Mr. Reddie's time there was more business in the Burgh Court of Glasgow than in the Sheriff Court.

9751. The Chairman.—There is little or no business now in the court of the Bailies in Glasgow?—Almost none.

9752. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—To what do you attribute that circumstance?—I think it is attributable to two reasons: Firstly, in the Burgh Court, at the time the business was so large, Mr. Reddie—who was an advocate at the bar—was sitting as assessor, and he stood so high in the opinion of the mercantile men in Glasgow, and the public generally, and his judgments were so much respected, that a great many parties took their cases to the Burgh Court in preference to the Sheriff Court. Now the case is altered; the assessors are not so highly qualified, the Sheriffs are regarded as more efficient than they were in those days, and their judgments carry more weight.

9753. The Chairman.—Is there not an advantage in going to the Sheriff Court, by reason of the facility of giving effect to the judgments?—No doubt there is.

9754. That facility does not exist in the Magistrates' Court?—It does not; but that is no reason why there should be a difference from what there was in Mr. Reddie's days as to the amount of the business conducted in the Burgh Court.

9755. Might it not make a difference in this way, that people prefer to go to the court in which they get the most speedy and effective remedy?—That may be.

9756. Mr. Campbell.—Is there not something in the fact, that the form of process in the Burgh Court has not been altered for many years, and that a new and improved form of process has been introduced into the Sheriff Court?—That may apply in Scotland generally; but in regard to Glasgow, I think the simple reason was, that on Mr. Reddie's death, or retirement from the judicial position he held, litigants preferred going to the Sheriff Court instead of to the Burgh Court.

9757. The Chairman.—Perhaps there were about the same time improvements upon the Sheriff Court?—I am not aware that there was at that time.

9758. Was there not an increased number of Sheriff-substitutes?—I think that was long after. I don't recollect the particular year that Mr. Reddie died, or that these improvements were introduced, but I think it was some time afterwards.

9759. Mr. Baxter.—Are you aware that the same change has taken place all over Scotland with regard to the Burgh Courts?—I believe so.

9760. Mr. Clark.—Is there any civil business in the River Bailie Court?—I don't think it.

9761. They don't deal with the arrestment of ships, or anything of that kind?—I don't think it.

9762. It is merely offences against the Clyde Act that they deal with?—Yes.

9763. Mr. Paterson.—Mr. Reddie was a member of the Edinburgh bar?—Yes.

9764. The present assessors are not so?—No.

9765. Mr. Shand.—You don't think there is any good reason now for endeavouring to resuscitate the Burgh Court in any way?—I don't see any benefit to be got by that.

9766. Do you think the Sheriff Court is quite efficient, and capable of doing the work satisfactorily?—Yes; and if it is not efficient it could easily be made efficient.

9767. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Does your observation extend generally over Scotland, or is it limited to the case of Glasgow?—I think that over Scotland the Sheriff Court is infinitely preferable to the Burgh Court.

9768. The Chairman.—There is a good deal of business in the Dean of Guild Court in Glasgow?—A very considerable amount of business. It is of a kind that requires professional skill sometimes, in order that the cases may be properly disposed of.

9769. That is obtained by the constitution of the court, without the expense of remits to professional men, who would have to be paid?—Yes; but the only benefit you have by the constitution of the court is, that there are men of experience in those matters who advise with the Dean of Guild.

9770. His council?—Yes.

9771. Would you think it would be beneficial to extinguish that court, and appoint a stipendiary magistrate to do the work?—I think it would, if you could combine with that two men of skill and experience in these matters, sitting with him and consulting with him.

9772. Would you give them salaries also?—I suspect you must pay a man if you expect work from him.

9773. At present they have no salary?—No, nothing.

9774. The assessor is paid?—Yes. But in speaking of these alterations, I do not pay so much regard to economy as to the satisfactory way in which, as regards the public, the business would be disposed of, and particularly the more speedy and expeditious conducting of the cases before the court.

9775. Is the business of the Dean of Guild Court not conducted satisfactorily now?—I think it is; only there is a want of that responsibility which I think a judge should have in deciding cases which come under the cognisance of the court, because the assessor is practically the person who, as a rule, disposes not only of the questions of law, but of fact.

9776. Mr. Shand.—As at present constituted, is it not often a great advantage that the parties have meetings in the Dean of Guild Court with professional builders and persons occupying the position of liners?—They sit in the court with the Dean of Guild, and he has the advantage of their experience and knowledge to guide him in deciding the cases that come before him.

9777. And they also attend inspections?—Yes.

9778. Is not that a very useful thing in Glasgow, and does it not lead to the arrangement of a great many cases?—It is very beneficial.

9779. If that administration were in the hands of the Sheriff, would you not lose that advantage?—But I would be disposed to combine with that some men of experience to sit and advise with him on these questions, as there are in the Dean of Guild Court as at present constituted.

9780. But if it is working well, would it not be rash to make that change?—I don't see any pressing necessity for the change; but my feeling was to have stipendiary magistrates rather than assessors in all the different courts.

9781. But speaking of this particular institution, you have no objection to the Dean of Guild Court as at present existing, so far as its working is concerned?—None whatever. I think it is very efficient, and its judgments are much respected.

9782. Mr. Murray.—Would your objection not be obviated if, in the event of any question of law arising, the judgment of the Sheriff were got upon that question?—You mean, allowing the assessor to the Dean of Guild to decide the case in the first instance, and appeal to the Sheriff on the question of law.

9783. Either that, or letting any question of law go at once to the Sheriff, leaving the Dean of Guild and his council to deal with practical matters not involving questions of law?—I have not considered the propriety of having the Sheriff Court as a court of appeal from the Dean of Guild Court.

9784. Mr. Paterson.—Allowing that the Dean of Guild Court in Glasgow performs its functions satisfactorily, does it occur to you that there is anything anomalous in the constitution of that court? In the first place, the Dean of Guild is elected by the Merchants' House?—Yes.

9785. And he holds office for three years?—Yes.

9786. And the liners are taken partly from the Merchants' House and partly from the Trades' House?—Yes; it is an anomalous constitution altogether.

9787. May it not happen that one or more of these liners may be contractors for the work which is sought to be authorized, in cases brought before the court?—It is quite possible.

9788. Do you understand that the jurisdiction is incompetent where a member of the court happens to be a party?—Do you mean that he should not sit, or that he does not sit?

9789. Do you understand that the constitution of the court excludes him?—Yes.

9790. Is that so in practice?—I don't think it.

9791. He may sit there though he may be contractor for the work?—Yes. And in the same way you might have a man elected by the Merchants' House perfectly incompetent to sit on questions of importance coming before the Dean of Guild Court. He is not elected chairman of the Merchants' House because of his peculiar aptitude for disposing of these questions.

9792. The Merchants' House is a large charitable institution?—Yes.

9793. Are not the Merchants' House and the Trades' House, who send liners into the Dean of Guild Court, large proprietors of property in Glasgow?—I believe they are.

9794. Supposing they require a lining, is there anything that prevents them going to the Dean of Guild Court?—I think not.

9795. You are aware that in recent years the Dean of Guild Court has acquired large jurisdiction by statute?—Yes. It is extended much beyond its original limits.

9796. Under the Glasgow Police Act?—Yes.

9797. It is mixed up with kindred municipal bodies in Glasgow?—Yes.

9798. Assuming that 1200 out of 1600 cases a year pass the bar of the Dean of Guild Court without opposition, and at an expense amounting to £3 in each case, do you think that could be obviated in any way? It has been suggested that the proprietor might deposit his plans with the city architect, and give notice to the conterminous proprietors; and if they found, on looking at the plans, that their rights were not infringed on, he should be entitled to go on; while, if they found that they had any objections to state, they should be made the parties to complain, and go to the Sheriff Court or other ordinary court for their remedy. What is your view of that?—I hardly think it would work satisfactorily.

9799. What is your objection to it?—I cannot say that I have considered the question as to the practical rectification of the constitution or work of the court.

9800. Does it not occur to you that the proprietor is sometimes placed in a wrong position in this respect,—that though he does not intend to infringe on his neighbour's rights, he must go and show that?—Quite so.

9801. Do you think he should be put to that expense?—You could hardly get rid of it. If a proprietor is going to make an alteration on his tenement, or erect a new tenement, there must be some mode of giving intimation to his neighbour of the nature and character of the alterations he is going to make, so that he may judge whether his rights are to be interfered with by the projected alterations or not.

9802. It has been proposed that the conterminous proprietors should have notice, and that they should be allowed to examine the plans in the hands of a public officer; and that, in the event of their finding their rights prejudiced, they should seek their remedy?—That, practically, is the result in the Dean of Guild Court at present.

9803. But at the expense of £3 for an undefended proceeding?—Yes. It is a form that entails a certain amount of expense; but if the defender is satisfied that his property is not to be interfered with, he does not require to incur any expense.

9804. But what I am referring to is that the pursuer has to incur the expense?—I don't see how you can obviate a certain amount of expense being incurred by the pursuer; but perhaps it might be lessened by a simpler mode of procedure.

9805. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestions to make?—No.

JAMES LAWSON HILL, Esq., examined.

9806. The Chairman.—You are clerk to the Commissary Court of Edinburgh?—I am. I was appointed in January 1860 by the Crown.

9807. You were a practitioner before the Court of Session previous to that?—Yes.

9808. For a number of years?—Yes; for upwards of 25 years.

9809. Do you practise now in the Court of Session?—I do, having partners.

9810. Do the duties of Commissary-clerk occupy much of your time?—Yes; and I may mention that they are daily increasing. In 1860, the year of my appointment, the estates to which I gave a title to administer amounted to £1,237,772; and last year, 1868, the amount was £1,878,698. The amount of probate or stamp duty on inventories passed by the several commissary offices for the whole of Scotland, as exhibited by the Inland Revenue returns, was, in 1860, £118,030, 2s. 6d., of which the Edinburgh office contributed £24,207, being about one-fifth of the whole; and in 1868 the amount for the whole of Scotland was £154,208, 10s., whereof the Edinburgh office contributed £34,224, 10s.

9811. You are remunerated by salary?—Yes.

9812. What is the amount of the salary?—£600 a year.

9813. I believe the Commissary-clerks in the district commissariats are paid by fees?—They are. The fees drawn in their several offices are retained by them as the measure of their remuneration for the work done.

9814. Is it a uniform table of fees for all the districts?—Yes; and on 1st April of each year they make annual returns to the Exchequer, under the Act of Sederunt 19th March 1859, of the amount of fees received the preceding year. That Act of Sederunt was passed in relation to the Scotch Confirmation and Probate Act of the previous year, 1858, under which we now act, and settled the fees of the Commissary-clerks.

9815. Can you give us the amount of those fees returned by the other Commissary-clerks?—I can. The amounts they returned last April were as follows:—Aberdeen, £1020, 11s. 6d.; Argyle, £115, 10s.; Ayr, £700, 13s. 6d.; Banff, £185, 4s. 6d.; Berwick, £191, 9s.; Bute, £85, 18s.; Caithness, £79, 0s. 6d.; Clackmannan, £84, 16s. 2d.; Dumbarton, £161, 5s.; Dumfries, £346, 7s. 8d.; Elgin and Nairn, £193, 3s. 11d.; Fife, £491, 3s. 6d.; Forfar, £343, 14s. 6d. and £411, 8s. 6d.—£755, 3s.; Haddington, £129, 9s. 7d.; Inverness, £137, 17s. 5d.; Kincardine, £141, 17s. 3d.; Kinross, £21, 15s. 6d.; Kirkcudbright, £156, 16s. 9d.; Lanark, £1512, 13s. 3d.; Linlithgow, £84, 4s. 5d.; Orkney, £44, 8s. 9d.; Peebles, £104, 13s. 8d.; Perth, £557, 1s. 8d.; Renfrew, £576, 3s.; Ross and Cromarty, £138, 8s. 9d.; Roxburgh, £168, 12s. 2d.; Selkirk, £31, 12s.; Stirling, £385, 1s. 7d.; Sutherland, £36, 7s. 6d.; Wigtown, £167, 2s.; Zetland, £37, 10s. 6d.

9816. Can you also give us the table of fees?—Yes.

9817. How does it happen that so large a proportion of the whole business of Scotland is done in Edinburgh?—The wealth of the town and district is a great deal more than one could anticipate. The English Probate Act of 1857 also made it competent for persons dying domiciled in England to have their estates given up in Scotland in certain cases.

9818. Mr. Webster.—Was it not that if a party dies domiciled in Scotland, and has funds here, they can be given up here; while a party dying domiciled in England has the same privilege?—Yes, that is so.

9819. Mr. Murray.—But Edinburgh is the commune forum for parties dying domiciled furth of Scotland?—Yes, or without any fixed or known domicile.

9820. And that accounts for a large amount?—Yes.

9821. Have you any idea to what extent that affects the amount?—It is not so much as might be supposed.

9822. Then the greater part of the sum you mentioned applies to parties dying within the jurisdiction?—Yes.

9823. Mr. Webster.—Could you easily separate the sum, so as to show how much is for the Commissariat of Edinburgh proper, and how much arises from its being the commune forum?—Yes. The inventories lodged with me in 1868 of parties dying furth of Scotland, or without any fixed or known domicile, amounted to £133,817, 15s. 10d., which being deducted from the total of £1,878,098, 9s. 3d., left £1,744,280, 13s. 5d. for the Commissariat of Edinburgh proper. I also find that the probates and letters of administration from English and Irish courts, which were entered and sealed in the Commissary Court of Edinburgh in 1868, represented estate amounting to £1,646,150, over and above the sums mentioned; but as these writs contain no inventory or specification of property, and only state their gross amounts, I cannot state what portion of that sum was Scotch estate.

9824. The Chairman.—What assistance have you in the performance of your duty?—I have a depute-clerk, and four other clerks.

9825. Is there full occupation for them?—Yes, I think so; and it requires very regular attendance, and very close attention. If an inventory and settlement is lodged in my office, I undertake that within forty-eight hours the parties shall have the confirmation or testament-testamentar ready to be given out to them, if everything is right; and if probates or letters of administration are lodged to be collated, entered, and sealed, I have them ready in twenty-four hours, they lodging a copy.

9826. Mr. Baxter.—Do you record all the deeds of settlement?—Yes.

9827. Whether they be recorded in other registers or not?—Invariably. The rule for that is contained in the 48 Geo. III. c. 149, § 38, which renders it imperative upon every Commissary-clerk to record all testamentary writings lodged with an inventory, as adjuncts to that inventory. This may have originated in the necessity of the Inland Revenue Office obtaining information as to how to exact legacy and now also succession duty. It is from these records that the Inland Revenue Office afterwards get their information, which we supply regularly.

9828. Mr. Murray.—Do you find that many principal writs are produced to you, or is it not rather the extracts of writs which have been already recorded?—The settlements as to large estates are generally in the shape of extracts, but I can't say the smaller are. I was struck one day in the office by hearing some country people come in, who had apparently brought an extract will with them, because the Inland Revenue schedule bore, in the form they give out, that an extract will might be produced; and when I had occasion lately to communicate with the Inland Revenue as to adjusting a new schedule, having in view the Act which brought heritable bonds under moveable property, on 1st January last, I suggested to the Solicitor that, although it might look a little odd, we might state in these schedules that wills did not require to be previously recorded, and extracts produced, if the principals were lodged with the inventory; and I have not the least doubt that, by and by, in a great many cases, people will bring original wills to the Commissary office, whereas formerly they recorded them before doing so.

9829. But where a will has been already recorded in the books of Council and Session, is there practically any use in re-recording it in the Commissary books? Would it not be sufficient to give a reference in these books to the record in which it could be found?—The Act was apparently framed for revenue purposes, and the Inland Revenue officers would have something to say on the subject if this were to be altered.

9830. Why cannot the Inland Revenue officers go to the books of Council and Session, as well as to the Commissary books?—They are not all recorded in the books of Council and Session.

9831. But if a deed has been previously recorded in a public register, a reference would be sufficient in the Commissary books?—People abroad, and people in England, seem to assume that they will find a copy of the will in the Commissary Office, which is equivalent to their Probate Office. From Hong-Kong I get returns of all wills recorded there sent to my office, also the wills of Scotch soldiers from the War Office, showing how much the general impression is that it is to the Commissary Office they must come to look for a will. Uniformity in the practice might, therefore, be a convenience; but to answer the abstract question, whether it is necessary to have a deed recorded twice, I would say that should not be necessary; and I don't know whether it might not be possible that records of the Commissary Office might be advanced so as to be equivalent to records in the books of Council and Session, and let the Commissary Offices transmit wills left with them, periodically, to the Register Office, or anywhere else.

9832. The Lord Justice-General.—Do you keep the principal writs, or return them?—I return them.

9833. Mr. Murray.—But practically there would be no difficulty in doing it by reference, and that would to some extent diminish the fees?—It would of course diminish the fees; but whether it would be the same practical convenience to the public I am not prepared to say, if there was no copy of a will to be found in the Commissary Office which grants the confirmation.

9834. Mr. Baxter.—Do you give out an extract?—No. If I am asked to give an extract, I tell people I am not prepared to say that I am entitled to do so; although, in the Probate Office in England, my extract, or what I give as an extract, with my office seal, is preferred to any extract from the Court of Session.

9835. The Lord Justice-General.—Are not the extracts which you send to the Probate Court in England given under the provisions of the Act of 1858?—No.

9836. For what purpose are they sent?—English practitioners wish to exhibit to the Probate Office in England that their clients have already been recognised in the character of executors in the Scotch courts, and that they have been so under a certain deed; and they come to get that deed certified and sealed by me.

9837. Mr. Murray.—If it is the fact that your extract is preferred in England, does that not arise from a mistake on the part of the English practitioners?—I don't know.

9838. It is an extract from a record which has not the principal deed, whereas the extract from the books of Council and Session is an extract from books which hold the principal deed?—Yes; but I am told that such is the case; and that where they send extracts, or certified copies, from the Register Office, they have to send certificates, or make affidavits, that these are the best copies they can get. That is not done with my extract.

9839. Does that not greatly arise from this, that you place a large seal on your extract?—Perhaps it may. When I entered the office, there was a large seal, but I reduced it very much, and I now only use a small impressed stamp, which is also more economical for the Government.

9840. The Chairman.—Is your office in the same building with the Sheriff Court?—No; it is in the Exchequer Buildings in Parliament Square, and it is in very close proximity to the Parliament House. It is a very convenient office; the great body of its practitioners being writers to the Signet and solicitors before the Supreme Courts.

9841. And your records are kept there?—Yes; and I have a safe.

9842. The Sheriff is the judge in your court?—The Sheriff and his substitutes are the Commissary judges and Commissary-deputes. I may say that, practically, the business is conducted by me, as the principal Commissary-clerk; and it is only when we require to have an interlocutor decerning executors to persons dying intestate without having nominated executors, or to prove the domicile, or to restrict caution, or where there are conflicting applications for confirmation, that the interposition of the Sheriffs-commissary are required at all.

9843. When questions do arise, how are the pleadings arranged?—When conflicting petitions for the office of executor are presented, and contention ensues, it is conducted in the ordinary form of a Sheriff Court process.

9844. Do you think there would be any advantage in combining the offices of Sheriff-clerk and Commissary-clerk, or would there be inconvenience?—Judging from the importance and the extent of business in the Commissary Office of Edinburgh, and knowing something of the engagements of the Sheriff-clerk of Edinburgh, I think these offices should be kept separate.

9845. The records must be kept in separate books?—Yes; we have three sets of records—confirmations, inventories, and testamentary writings. We have continual consultations with the most respectable agents, or their representatives, asking advice how to proceed; and I have often seen two or three people at one time standing at the bar of the office getting information. A great many persons come about the office.

9846. Mr. Murray.—But your opinion has reference to Edinburgh alone?—Yes.

9847. Mr. Smythe.—How is the expense of your office paid? Who pays the rent?—The office belongs to the Exchequer; but there are some incidental expenses. I should put them, including stationery and some other things, at about £45 a year. These are the expenses of the office, the property of which belongs to the Government.

9848. Mr. Murray.—Your salary is paid by Government, and also the salaries of your depute, and of the three clerks?—Yes.

9849. And you pay over all the fees to the Exchequer?—Yes.

9850. Can you give us a statement of the amount of salaries, and the amount of fees paid?—The present salaries are—my own, £600; the depute, £350; first clerk, £175; second, £120; third, £120; fourth, £85, rising by £5 yearly to £100,—total £1450. The fees which I drew amounted in 1860 to £1711, 12s. 10d., and in 1868 to £2099, 9s. 9d.

9851. Mr. Baxter.—The salaries being the same?—My commission conveyed to me all the fees or emoluments of the office, subject, however, to the orders of the Treasury. In June 1860, after I had entered upon the duties of the office, Mr. Henderson fixed my salary at £500 only; my depute at £300; the first clerk £150; the second and third clerks at £100; and the then fourth clerk at £90. These sums were paid direct from Exchequer,—all the fees I drew, and which greatly exceeded these salaries, being paid to Mr. Henderson in Exchequer. In 1867 I waited on him, and represented that it was unequal to continue to pay me, the metropolitan Commissary-clerk, with a small salary, while all the other Commissary-clerks received the increased fees for their additional and increasing work. He would only consent, however, to my salary being raised £100, and my establishment got also small additions, making the present salaries the sums I have stated. All the fees of the office I pay over periodically to the Exchequer. I lodge them in bank every week, and I pay them over generally in four quarterly payments. They have access to my books as often as they like, and they audit these books now and then.

9852. Mr. Webster.—Practically, in that way your office is made a source of free revenue to the Government?—Last year they must have benefited by my office to the extent of about £600.

9853. That is at the expense of the estates of parties dying within this county, or whose inventories are given up here?—Yes.

9854. The Lord Justice-General.—Is there any reason why these fees should not be reduced?—The fees for granting Scotch confirmations are very much less than those charged in England for granting probates and letters of administration. The only complaint that I have heard about the fees is, that we should try to reduce them on small estates.

9855. Are they ad valorem fees?—Yes. They are not large. In testate successions, assuming a short deed and inventory, where the estate is under £100, the fees of my office are £1, 9s.; under £200, £1, 11s. 6d; under £300, £1, 14s.; and under £500, £1, 18s. After that amount, the ad valorem fee mounts up considerably. I mean the item of ad valorem fee on confirmation alone. But taking an ordinary estate, with an ordinary amount of writing, the fees for a confirmation in a testate estate amounting to £40,000 would be £9, 4s. In intestate successions they are much less. The fees of an intestate estate of £40,000 would be £4, 8s. 6d.

9856. Is there any reason for that?—Apparently the reason for that is, that in the schedule of fees attached to the Act of Sederunt of 1859, before referred to, there is no ad valorem fee on the confirmations or testament-dative in intestate succession. There is a sum of 3s. allowed for that step; and whatever be the amount of the estate, whether it be £40 or £40,000, there is no more than 3s. for the step of confirmation on an intestate estate. I never could comprehend why there should be such a difference.

9857. Mr. Murray.—Do these fees include the recording of the deed?—Yes, the fees I have stated include that; assuming, as I said, a short deed of say 8 pages, and a short inventory.

9858. The Lord Justice-General.—Then it would seem, from the examples which you have given us, that the hardship, if there be one, is in regard to very small estates?—I think so; more especially as the tendency of legislation lately has been, if possible, to relieve small estates. For instance, estates under £100 now pay no inventory duty; and in 1863 there was a Savings Bank Act, by which the savings banks managers have the power to pay sums of £50 without confirmation; also post-office savings banks can pay sums of £50 without confirmation. Poor people often get into the hands of parties who charge them very high in helping them about their deceased friends' estates; and I have seen that for an estate amounting to £66, consisting of one sum in the savings bank and £2, 10s. of body clothes, a party had an account of £8, 1s. 6d. to pay for being decerned executor, and getting confirmation. I did not see that account necessarily as Commissary-clerk, but it was shown me.

9859. Mr. Murray.—Is there any reason why the ad valorem fee should stop at £40,000?—I think not; and it does not do so in England. The probate fee in England for an estate of £40,000 would be £10, 6s. 8d.; for £100,000, £20, 12s. 6d., and so on. For letters of administration of intestate estates in England the fees are also higher: £40,000 pays a fee of £13, 11s. 3d., instead of the Scotch Commissary-clerk's fees of 3s. for the confirmation and £3 for business connected with the inventory, making £3, 3s.; and for £100,000 the English fee is £29, 1s. 3d., and so on. I think it would be a great boon to the public if confirmation could be dispensed with on estates under £100, and, in any revision of fees, to reduce the fees on the small estates 40 or 50 per cent. up to £400 or £500, and in lieu of these reductions to carry out the ad valorem fee on estates above £40,000 as in England, and put an ad valorem fee on the confirmation of intestate estates.

9860. Mr. Webster.—Is it not often the case that you have large sums in inventories and corresponding fees, when in the end the estate is bankrupt, and where the inventory duty is got back, but none of the fees can be got back?—No; in my experience that does not often happen. I have many a time had inventories above £40,000, and I do not see many instances of that.

9861. Would that come within your knowledge?—Officially it would not necessarily come within my knowledge; but from living in Edinburgh, and knowing something of Edinburgh people, I am surprised at the wealth the business of the office exhibits.

9862. Do you see any reason why a tax should be levied out of an estate, by means of fees derived by this kind of procedure, for the benefit of the public, at the cost of the estate?—Certainly not; but while I speak of fees, there is one portion of the expense in Scotland which I think deserves consideration, and that is the fees and expenses attached to petitions for proving the domicile. By the Act of 1858, it is an interlocutor of the Sheriff which finds that a deceased party died domiciled in Scotland, and which is the warrant for the Commissary-clerk to include English estate, in the confirmation of an executor, whereby the executor may go with his confirmation to the Probate Court in London and have it sealed, and so take up the English estate. Now I find that, by the English Probate Act, and the practice under it, parties are not put to the same expense in regard to that matter as they are in Scotland. There an executor has only to make an affidavit that the deceased died domiciled in England, and the registrar is entitled to make what is called a notation to that effect on the probate when issuing it. All that I see on the probate to authorize me to seal it in my office, and enable Scotch property to be taken up, is the notation referred to, that the deceased died domiciled in England. The fee for that notation to the registrar in England appears to be only 5s. Now, while the Probate Act of 1858 has been a great improvement on Commissary practice in Scotland in this matter of domicile, it seems unnecessarily expensive. The procedure is a petition to the Sheriff, proof of two witnesses, and an interlocutor, all costing, I think, £4 or £5, including the fees payable to the Commissary Office of 10s., never more or less. I would suggest that, if any alteration were to be made on the practice in the Commissary Courts, Commissary-clerks should be authorized to be satisfied with an affidavit, made by the party presenting the inventory, that the deceased died domiciled in Scotland.

9864. The Lord Justice-General.—You spoke of the English Probate Act: what Act do you mean?—The 20th and 21st Vict. c. 77, of 25th August 1857.

9865. Is not the thing you were speaking about just now—the mode of sending up probate to Scotland to be sealed here—provided for by the same Act of 1858 as you spoke of before?—Yes.

9866. Then what is provided by that Act is merely the way of certifying the fact of domicile?—Yes.

9867. Mr. Webster.—Ascertaining and certifying it?—Yes. The cause of our more expensive mode is, I think, the word 'interlocutor' in our Scotch Act. The relative Act of Sederunt to the Act of 1858, naturally provided that there must be something going before a judge before he could write an interlocutor, and therefore a petition came to be used and presented to the Sheriff-commissary.

9868. Mr. Clark.—Do you think it would be quite safe to let a person claiming the estate of a party who died abroad, reach the estate on his simple affidavit that the deceased was domiciled in Scotland?—I never confirm estate abroad. The inventory refers to any estate abroad, but no confirmation of it is given.

9869. But you are proposing a remedy, are you not?—Only for England; one that would put us on the same footing as the English people.

9870. Is that satisfactory?—Apparently so.

9871. Mr. Campbell.—Have you not known cases where a judge refused petitions to find that the party died domiciled in Scotland?—Very rarely; but there have been cases.

9872. There was a case of a young man who died in India a year ago, where a petition was refused, that the Commissary thought that he was domiciled in India. Are you aware of that case?—Yes; but we may keep in view that the 17th section of the Confirmation and Probate Act of 1858 declares that this finding that the deceased died domiciled in Scotland 'shall be evidence and have effect for the purposes of this Act only.'

9873. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestion to make?—There is another expense which parties in Scotland are often subjected to in regard to eiks of confirmation. There is nothing more common than for Commissary-clerks to give eiks of confirmation of estate omitted; and if a party applies for an eik to a confirmation of English estate, I would give it to him on his proving the domicile in the ordinary way. But when that eik is taken to the English Probate Court they won't recognise it, because it does not come up to the definition of what is a confirmation in the Act of 1858; that is, because the estate which is eiked or added to the original confirmation is only English estate, and has no Scotch estate in terms of section 12. Now, I would suggest a provision that the English Probate Courts should recognise as a confirmation, entitled to all privileges, an eik, providing that the original confirmation with the eik be laid before them for seal. I think that something of that kind would get over the difficulty. The necessity for an eik is of very common occurrence; and the result of the present state of the matter, when additional English estate has been discovered, is, that parties in Scotland, in order to get a title to it, must go to the Probate Court and apply for letters of administration or probate, as the case may be, as if there had been no previous procedure, incurring very great expense.

9875. The Chairman.—What do you suggest?—It is very difficult indeed to suggest anything. It occurred to me that if there could be any provision that executors of parties holding trust funds might be entitled to include them in their own inventory, and realize them, to the effect of paying them over to the beneficiaries, it would go so far. The 42d section of the Act of 48 Geo. III. goes so far, but not far enough.

9876. Mr. Webster.—Is that not provided for by a clause in the recent Act, which enables a beneficiary to apply to the court to give a direct title, whether in heritable or moveable, where a property was vested in a trustee, or tutor, or curator?—No, it is not held to be so.

9877. Mr. Paterson.—Supposing it set out in the inventory that there was a certain amount of the funds on a deposit-receipt in name of the deceased, or in which he was not beneficially interested, the confirmation on that gives an executor a title to uplift the money and pay it over to the beneficiaries?—I, in my court, cannot confirm in that case.

9878. Mr. Murray.—The practice of the Commissary Court has always been to strike out trust funds?—Yes, from confirmation.

James Lawson Hill.

9879. Mr. Webster.—Is not that a very great inconvenience?—Yes. I have heard that in some Commissary Courts that is done. The Inland Revenue officers, to whom the inventories of all the Commissary-clerks of Scotland are sent at the end of every month, have told me that they sometimes see it, but it is not very regular.

9880. Mr. Murray.—The practice has been changed?—It was changed.

9881. Mr. Paterson.—Are you aware of the practice of any other court where that prevails?—I am not aware of the practice of any district Commissary Court.

9882. Mr. Smythe.—Could the Sheriff, as Commissary, not ordain you to alter your present practice, and to confirm in such a case?—If he gave such an order, I would attend to it; but the office of trustee seems to be regarded as personal. It was on a judgment in 1853 by Sheriff-substitute Jameson, reviewed by Sheriff Gordon, that the rule has been since acted on; and the ground of their decision was that it was a personal office, and that neither the office nor the estate connected with it transmitted to the representative.

9883. Mr. Paterson.—That would only hold where the character of the proceedings appeared on the face of the writing. Supposing a deposit-receipt to have been in name of A. B., without anything to indicate that he was a trustee?—The advantage of treating it as trust funds is that you should escape paying probate duty. If you include it in your inventory as ordinary funds of the deceased, you will have to pay the ordinary probate duty, while the executor will only realize and account for the funds. I saw a very hard case the other day, where a person died in Edinburgh, leaving trust funds to about £7000 in England, and probate had to be taken out in England, for the reason I have been stating. I believe the Probate Court allowed the party to imagine that the estate he was taking out probate for was £20, and that gave him a title to go to the holders of the English funds and get possession of them.

9884. The Chairman.—Have you any further suggestions to make?—In the printed notice which I got there is a memorandum as to privileges of agents. The practitioners in the judicial proceedings of the Commissary Court of Edinburgh are the solicitors-at-law. They are a small body, about 28 in number; and as the great bulk of the ordinary business is carried on by writers to the Signet and solicitors before the Supreme Courts, their interposition only comes in when petitions require to be presented to the Sheriff. In that way there are a great many cases of two agents. The writer to the Signet, or the solicitor before the Supreme Courts, conducts all the proper confirmation business; and when an application in the same matter has to be made to the Sheriff, the solicitor-at-law is called in. It would certainly save expense to parties if one agent was entitled to conduct the whole business.

9885. You mean, if the solicitor before the Supreme Courts or the writer to the Signet were entitled to do the whole?—Yes, if they chose. I think the solicitor-at-law would find that these bodies would interfere very little with any business except the executry business. The Society of Writers to the Signet passed resolutions on this subject in the year 1858.

9886. Mr. Baxter.—You mean if the exclusive privileges of the solicitors-at-law were done away with?—Yes.

9887. The Chairman.—Have you anything more to suggest?—I would suggest that, looking at the importance of the business of the Commissary Office of Edinburgh, the growing extent of it, and the responsibilities, the salary of Commissary-clerk should be considered by this Commission, when they have the fees, which represent the work done, under their notice. I think it is unreasonable that, with larger jurisdiction, more duties, and greater responsibility attached to my office, I should be paid less than other Commissary-clerks, as if I held a subordinate appointment, and all that my office might be made one of revenue.

9888. Mr. Baxter.—Is yours an exceptional case—payment by salary?—Quite. After I was appointed, Mr. Henderson, of the Exchequer, in whose hands these matters were, told me, when he was arranging my salary, his intention was to regulate all the other Commissary-clerks' offices, and allow no fees to be retained; and when I mentioned the smallness of my salary in comparison to the fees retained by some other clerks, he said he would cut down all the others when the regulation came; but the Lanarkshire, at Glasgow, and other appointments have been made since then, and they all retain the fees for their responsibility and work done. The Commissary-clerk of Lanarkshire has large fees; but he does the work, and is therefore entitled to them, and I only mention his case in contrast.

9889. Mr. Murray.—Have you had occasion to contrast the fees paid in the Probate Courts in England?—Yes. The salaries of the registrars in London begin with £1600. There are four of them; one has that sum, and two of them have £1500 a year each, and the fourth £1000. Even the district registrars in England begin with £1200 a year.

9890. Mr. Baxter.—You would be well satisfied if you got the fees?—Yes; but I might not expect them all. I only ask equitable consideration.

9891. The Chairman.—In Lanarkshire the emoluments are much larger?—Yes.

9892. The fees are very large there?—Yes; but they are not so large as in my office.

9893. Do you mean that the total amount is not so great?—Neither the business done, nor the fees, are as great. The fees returned by the Commissary-clerk of Lanarkshire, as drawn last year, were £1512, 13s. 3d.

9894. Mr. Smythe.—Are they the same scale of fees?—Yes.

9895. Mr. Webster.—Can you tell us whether those registrars whose salaries you have mentioned have to give their whole time to their office, or have they the privilege, like you, of carrying on other business?—I cannot say definitely. There is a clause in my commission that I shall discharge in person the duties of the office. The responsibility is very great, and the questions that arise are various, and they all compel my attention to the work.

9896. Mr. Murray.—In England is there not a printed abstract of probates published?—Yes; and in Ireland.

9897. It is published at the public expense?—Yes.

9898. Does not that greatly facilitate the searches in reference to the granting of administrations?—Yes, very much.

9899. Mr. Webster.—A copy of that book is kept in your office?—Yes. The volumes, as published, are regularly transmitted from the Probate Offices of London and Dublin, for reference in Scotland at my office.

9900. Mr. Murray.—But nothing equivalent has ever been done in Scotland?—Never. I think it would be an immense advantage to have it.

9901. Part of the surplus fees might be applied to that purpose?—Yes. I was prepared to suggest a calendar or abstract like this for Scotland to this Commission. I had brought one of these books to show how they are arranged, and how convenient they must be to the public. By sec. 67 of the English Probate Act of 1857, calendars of all probates and administrations granted in England are ordered to be prepared, containing the following particulars:—Date of grant, registry from which it is issued, defunct's name and designation, place and date of death, names and designations of executors and administrators, and value of estate. By sec. 51, monthly lists of all grants issued by the several district registrars are sent to the Principal Probate Office, London, where the calendars are prepared. By sec. 68, copies of the calendars are sent to each District Registry in England, also to the Probate Court of Dublin, and to the Commissary Court of Edinburgh. A similar system is in operation in Ireland. Were the system extended to Scotland, copies could be deposited in every local Commissary Court, and also in the Probate Courts of London and Dublin, and thus the greatest facilities given for discovering the estate and representatives of a defunct. At present it is often doubtful where the search should be made. In my office there are upwards of one hundred people coming to make searches in the course of a year.

9902. Mr. Smythe.—The County Commissary-clerks in England have to provide their own offices and pay their own expenses out of their fees?—I see that the highest salary of a district registrar in England is £1200 a year, and he has a special allowance of £200 a year besides.

9903. Is that for his office?—The blue-book does not say what it is for. There are other three with £1000 a year each and an allowance of £200, and another with £800 a year and an allowance of £150, and so on. There are forty of them altogether.

9904. You only conjecture that that allowance is to pay the expenses of the office?—I presume so. I don't know what else it is for.

9905. You don't know that the fact is that they do pay their office expenses, providing an office?—I don't know. I see that Government pays for a large staff of clerks for district registrars. There are 136 clerks so paid for, and their several salaries commence at £450, £400, and downwards.

9906. Mr. Murray.—Do you think it would conduce to the public advantage if Edinburgh was made the commune forum, in which the executors of any party deceasing throughout Scotland could obtain confirmation, leaving it to them to obtain it either in the county in which the party died, or in Edinburgh?—I think it would, and that would be carrying out the provisions of the English Probate Act of 1857, and giving the same accommodation to the Scotch as is given to the English people.

9907. In England they may either go to the Probate Court of London or the District Court?—Yes.

9908. An equivalent to that would be that Edinburgh should be a commune forum for Scotland?—Yes.

9909. Mr Paterson.—Would you make that optional or imperative?—Optional; and we might get over difficult questions of domicile frequently. Questions often arise whether a person has acquired a domicile abroad, or whether he has retained a domicile in Scotland; and if so, where. If there was a general provision of this kind, allowing parties to choose either Edinburgh or the provinces, there would be no questions of that kind, which are sometimes very troublesome. James Lawson Hill.

9910. The Chairman.—There would be a search in two places, would there not?—There would; but if it was combined with the calendar which has been suggested, this objection would, I think, be obviated.

9911. Have you any suggestion to offer as to the form of dealing with contested cases?—No.

9913. Have you had any experience of the ordinary Sheriff Court?—No.

9914. Mr. Murray.—Have you any suggestion to offer in reference to cautioners?—No.

9915. Have you found practically that they are very little called upon?—Yes. I have often inquired, and I never could ascertain that for the last forty years, in the Commissary Court of Edinburgh, there had been any case of a cautioner having been called to answer for his obligations under a bond.

9916. The Chairman—That circumstance would not lead you to dispense with caution?—Most certainly not.

9917. Have you any further suggestions to make about your office?—No.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD COLONSAY IN THE CHAIR.

THOMAS LINTON, Esq., examined.

9918. The Chairman.—You are connected with the police establishment in Edinburgh?—I am Superintendent of Police. Thomas Linton.

9919. Mr. Gordon.—That is equivalent to Chief Constable in England?—Yes.

9920. The Chairman.—Have you been so long?—About eighteen years.

9921. You act as prosecutor in cases that are brought before the police magistrates?—I was appointed Procurator-fiscal under the Provisional Order of 1867; but I have acted all along.

9922. The Police Court is presided over by one of the magistrates of Edinburgh one month, and by one of the Sheriff-substitutes the next month?—Yes; they take alternate months.

9923. Is it generally the same magistrate that attends for the month, or do they change?—There are six magistrates; and the usual practice is, that two magistrates take a month between them, and in that way each of the six is twice on duty during the year for half a month.

9924. Mr. Murray.—One magistrate only sits?—Only one at a time.

9925. The Lord Provost never sits?—I never saw him sit except on one occasion.

9926. Mr. Baxter.—Who are the magistrates who sit?—The six bailies.

9927. The Dean of Guild does not sit?—He does not.

9928. The Chairman.—It has been suggested that it would be an advantage if there was one magistrate who sat constantly in that court. What is your opinion as to that suggestion?—I think there is a good deal to be said on both sides. I think there are some reasons in favour of the present arrangement, and there are others not so.

9929. What are the circumstances which are in favour of the present arrangement?—One thing that weighs a good deal with me is the amount of control which the Town Council is allowed to exercise over the police force; and considering that, I think it is an advantage that some members of their body—and of course each bailie is a prominent member of the Town Council—should have the opportunity, which they have as judges of police, of knowing something of the duties and responsibilities of the police.

9930. And also perhaps of acquiring a knowledge of the characters in different localities of the town?—Undoubtedly.

9931. What are the considerations on the other side?—Of course legal training and experience would be an advantage in any person discharging the duties of judge of police, and several of the bailies have not that advantage. Usually some of them are lawyers: we have at present two lawyers, but the other four are not lawyers.

9932. Mr. Baxter.—Have they an assessor?—There is no assessor in the court.

9933. The Chairman.—Uniformity of procedure would be an advantage?—I think so.

9934. That would be better attained by one person of legal attainments sitting?—Undoubtedly. Comparing the bailies with the Sheriffs as judges, I think a prominent defect is, that in pronouncing judgment upon convicted persons the bailies are less careful in varying the sentence according to the greater or less degree of the offence.

9935. Mr. Smythe.—Does the clerk not act in some degree as an assessor, and keep them right in matters of form?—He does. I think the tendency is rather towards indiscriminate leniency on the part of the bailies, as compared with the Sheriffs who sit in the court.

9936. Mr. Shand.—When you speak of the desirability of uniformity, I understand you are not referring to the forms of procedure, but to the degrees of punishment?—Exactly.

9937. Mr. Murray.—Is it not the case that, with reference to some crimes, different bailies take very different views of the amount of punishment to be awarded?—That has not been so much the case of late years.

9938. Is it not the case as regards the crime of solicitation on the streets?—There has been considerable uniformity in that since the Provisional Order came into operation.

9939. Do some of them not impose imprisonment, while others do not?—The rule has rather been, that both Sheriffs and bailies impose imprisonment since that power was given. Of course every magistrate now-a-days is a gentleman of education and business experience, and I must say that they are conscientiously anxious to master the details of the Police Acts, and generally they don't take long in doing so.

9940. The Chairman.—Do they complain of the labour it imposes upon them?—I do not think so. I suspect they would be very unwilling to part with the position.

9941. Mr. Baxter.—Have you a court daily?—Yes.

9942. Mr. Murray.—How long does it last on an average?—About an hour on an average.

9943. Mr. Shand.—What is the utmost amount of punishment that a bailie can award?—Sixty days' imprisonment. There is power given under the Provisional Order to add to that caution with an alternative of imprisonment for thirty days.

9944. Mr. Baxter.—That is ninety days in all?—Yes. That is under the Police Act. But under the Public Houses Act, there is a power to imprison for six months for a third and every subsequent offence.

9945. Mr. Shand.—And what are the pecuniary penalties?—£30 is the alternative to the six months' imprisonment. The highest pecuniary penalty in the Police Act is £20.

9946. Mr. Baxter.—The bailies can in that way sentence to a longer period of imprisonment than the Sheriff can do in his ordinary Summary Court?—The Sheriff, as judge of police, has the same power as the bailies.

9947. But in his own court, when trying prisoners summarily, he can only give sixty days' imprisonment?—Yes.

9948. And the magistrate can give ninety days?—Yes. That power has been given under the Police Act.

9949. Mr. Adam.—How many cases are disposed of in the Police Court upon an average in a day?—The average is about 12,000 in a year. That is about 40 a day. That of course includes contraventions of every description.

9950. You are public prosecutor?—I am.

9951. Do you prepare the petition or complaints?—All of them. They are prepared by clerks, and I am responsible for their accuracy.

9952. Do you, in point of fact, have any precognition or knowledge of the cases before you take them to court?—If the case is of any special importance, I always have.

9953. Mr. Gordon.—Do you mean other than the police reports, or merely from the police reports?—I frequently examine private parties who are witnesses, if there is any doubt or difficulty.

9954. Mr. Adam.—In any case in which it is suggested to you that that is a desirable course?—Certainly; or where it occurs to myself that it is a right thing to do, before presenting my complaint.

9955. Mr. Shand.—In the ordinary case, you proceed on the police reports given by the constables?—Yes; in ordinary cases.

9956. And in unusual cases you take a precognition?—Yes, or what amounts to that.

9957. The Chairman.—Do you find that the duty of prosecutor interferes in any degree with your other duties as head of the police?—It must to some extent interfere; but my duties under the statutes, as Superintendent of Police, give me serious responsibility, whether I am prosecutor or not. For instance, we have some 9000 persons apprehended every year, and as Superintendent of Police I am responsible at the time of their apprehension for inquiry, and also for determining whether the person is or is not to be detained in custody. In fact, I am responsible up till the time that the person is produced before the judge of police. Looking at that fact, I think it is of some advantage that the case shall from first to last be taken charge of by the same person. It prevents difference of opinion which might arise if there were two officials.

9958. Mr. Smythe.—Do you exercise your discretion whether a case is to be prosecuted or not?—In all cases of apprehension I must do so, under the police statutes.

9959. Are there many cases where there are apprehensions which are not prosecuted?—A good many; and there, of course, the parties are not even detained. The inquiry is made on the instant; and if it is found that the case is not sufficient, the party is discharged. There is also another reason for the present arrangement. As head of the police I am vested with the power of appointing all the members of the force, and of removing them at pleasure, and the statute gives that power on the ground that I am responsible for having proper persons for all the duties of the police. Now, I think that even if I were not prosecutor, it would be my duty to be frequently in the Police Court, because there I can observe whether the officers are proper persons for their most important duties in regard to the public interests.

9960. Mr. Baxter.—Have you the power of removing the lieutenants of police?—Yes; I have the power of removing the lieutenants and all the members of the force. There is another reason that weighs with me: if I were not the prosecutor, it would be left to the Town Council to appoint during pleasure a person to be public prosecutor, and I think that is objectionable. I do not think that the public prosecutor should be appointed by such a body as the Town Council, and hold office at their pleasure.

9961. Who appoints you?—I am appointed by the Lord Provost and Sheriff, or, if they differ in opinion, by the Lord Advocate.

9962. Are you subject to removal?—The power of removal is the same.

9963. The Chairman.—Upon the whole, then, you consider it an expedient arrangement that the head of the police should prosecute in the Police Court?—I do; so long as he is charged with his present responsibilities.

9964. It does not interfere so materially with his other duties as to make it inconvenient, because he must be often there, even though he were not the prosecutor?—Yes.

9965. And it gives him the opportunity of seeing a case followed out from its commencement to its conclusion, and it enables him to learn what has been the conduct of various officers when they have been engaged in connection with these cases?—Just so.

9966. Mr. Shand.—If a stipendiary magistrate were appointed, there would not be duty for him in the Police Court alone?—I do not think so.

9967. If any change were made, it would be rather that the Sheriff should take the duty, than that a separate officer should be appointed to preside in that court?—I think the person so appointed could discharge other duties.

9968. Judicial duties?—Yes.

9969. The Chairman.—Have you any suggestions to make to the Commission in regard to the Police Court, or the duties connected with it?—There is one point as regards the bailies. Under the existing Act it is provided that the Lord Provost, the chief magistrate, shall always hold office for three years after his appointment. It is not so with the bailies, and I think it would render them more independent as judges of police if they were put in the same position as the chief magistrate. At present a bailie may be appointed what is called interim bailie, and within a few months he may have to go to his ward to seek re-election, and afterwards to the Town Council; and I have known instances, one instance in particular, of a bailie in that position, who was ousted from his ward mainly on account of what he had done as judge in the Police Court.

9970. Mr. Shand.—In what class of cases?—There were two or three cases. Party feeling ran rather high. One statement made against him was, that a person in a respectable station in life, who had been brought before him, had not been sent to prison, but fined.

9971. Mr. Murray.—What was the nature of the crime?—It was an assault; but I have no doubt that where a bailie has to seek re-election soon after having been appointed a bailie, he is liable to be influenced by the consideration of what is most likely to secure his re-election to office.

9972. Mr. Shand.—You think he sits under fear that he may be turned out at next election?—Yes; and on that ground I think that an appointment for three years would make a bailie more independent in the discharge of his duties as judge of police.

9973. Mr. Webster.—But even three years have an end?—Of course; but we don't usually find that bailies want to remain longer than three years. They are generally willing to go out of office; at all events they say that they are willing.

9974. The Chairman.—Do you find that in regard to contraventions of the Public-Houses Act, there is less uniformity of decision among the bailies than in other cases?—They must be uniform now, for the sentence is fixed by the statute, and the judge cannot vary it.

9975. But the establishment of the fact is not fixed by the statute?—No; of course not. Some, who have a very strong notion that the Public-Houses Act is doing a great amount of good, are perhaps more apt, than persons holding the contrary opinion, to take a view of the fact favourable for the prosecution.

9976. Are there any other observations which you wish to make to the Commission?—There is a slight matter, but it has been made ground of complaint very often. We have to bring into the Police Court numbers of respectable citizens, and persons in their service, for trifling contraventions, and at present these persons are summoned to the ordinary Police Court; and there being only one court-room, it is complained that they are placed in the same position, as regards attendance there, as criminals, or notorious offenders. I have frequently suggested that there should be a court held, once or twice a week, for the disposal of such cases, apart altogether from ordinary police cases.

9977. What is the class of cases to which you refer?—Parties summoned for their chimneys being on fire, or servants for laying down ashes.

9978. Mr. Shand.—Breaches of municipal regulations?—Yes.

9979. Can you not fine them 5s. without requiring their attendance at court?—They must all attend, or some one must attend for them.

9980. That is a matter that is within the arrangement of the police magistrate, without any specific power being required for it?—I think it should be so.

9981. It does not require any assistance from the Legislature?—I have suggested it often, but it has never been carried out.

9982. The Chairman.—Your suggestion is to hold a court a certain number of times in the week, at a different hour from the other court?—Just so. I think once a week would probably serve the purpose.

9983. Mr. Shand.—Are there many cases of forfeited bail in the Police Court of Edinburgh?—Not very many. There may be a couple of hundred in the year. But, besides forfeiting bail, we always apprehend the persons on the warrant granted, if they can be found.

9984. At what hour does the court meet?—Ten o'clock.

9985. The Chairman.—Have you any suggestion to make as to a change in the forms of procedure?—I think they are complicated, and might be simplified, even under our present Police Acts.

9986. What is the objection to them, and what is the improvement which you would recommend?—The judge is made to grant warrant to summon. Now, under our Police Act the constables are specially empowered to summon without a warrant, but that is a signature in every complaint of the kind for the judge. Then he grants power to apprehend, the Police Acts giving power to constables, without warrant to apprehend.

9987. Why is recourse had to the magistrate?—The form has always been so. Our assessor, Mr. Young, was consulted about it, and he said, 'Oh, just let it remain; it is there, it does no harm.'

9988. But you are satisfied you have the power without it?—Quite; and we exercise the power. The warrant is usually got long after the person is in custody.

9989. As to the forms of complaint, have you any suggestion to make?—I think we have simplified them as far as we thought we could properly do so.

9990. Have you no suggestion of any change in the forms to make?—No specific suggestion.

9991. Mr. Adam.—Who prosecutes in your necessary absence?—The lieutenant of police, who is the officer charged with the preliminary investigation. The lieutenant sits in the police office, and all parties who are apprehended are brought before him. If I am not present, he has to hear the case, and determine whether it is a proper case for detention or not.

9992. Does he attend along with you in the Police Court?—He does.

9993. The Chairman.—The police, of which you are the head, are the police of the city of Edinburgh?—Yes.

9994. Have you found any clashing between you and the jurisdiction of the police of the county?—I cannot say that I have. I have always maintained a very good understanding with Mr. List.

9995. The two forces are disposed to aid each other?—Undoubtedly; and beyond that the Sheriff has power over the city police force.

9996. Mr. Murray.—There are a number of provisions in the Provisional Order as to bringing water to houses, etc., which are obviously not enforced. Does it not lie on you to enforce these?—I have not explained that there are two other persons besides myself entitled to act as Procurator-fiscal in the Police Court. These are the Inspector of Lighting and Cleaning, and the Burgh Engineer. Each of these officers is entitled to and does prosecute in cases falling within his department.

9997. Do you not interfere with cases which come properly under their department?—I have not interfered with these cases.

9998. You would not prosecute in a case where water had not been brought to a tenement?—I would be entitled to do so; but the practice has been to leave it to the official having charge of that department.

9999. Mr. Gordon.—To what official?—The Burgh Engineer, in that case.

Thomas Linton.

10000. Mr. Baxter.—Has he ever prosecuted?—Yes; he does so from day to day, in cases falling within his department.

10001. Mr. Murray.—Have you received instructions from the magistrates not to prosecute in these cases?—No; I never apply to the magistrates for instructions.

10002. Mr. Smythe.—Do these parties hold their appointment from the Lord Provost in the same way as you do?—No; they are appointed by the Town Council. I think it is rather an anomaly that one person should not conduct all the prosecutions; but that has been the practice hitherto.

10003. Mr. Orr Ewing.—The magistrates have no power in regard to your appointment?—No.

10004. That arrangement is peculiar to Edinburgh?—Yes.

10005. The Chairman.—Do you take any share in regard to the granting of licences?—I always attend the courts, and my special duty is to report convictions, if any have been obtained against parties applying for licences.

10006. To be, as it were, a witness?—Yes; and the Public-Houses Act specially names the Chief Constable as a person to attend, and make reports, and give information.

10007. Mr. Shand.—You exercise a check on the granting of licences to improper parties?—Yes.

10008. Or to premises which are not suitable?—The magistrates take that into their own hands. They are required under the Act personally to inspect and certify whether the premises are suitable or not.

10009. The Chairman.—That is in regard to granting of licences for the first time?—Yes.

10010. Mr. Shand.—Have you any suggestion to make in reference to the Licensing Court? Do you think the original court and the court of appeal work well?—I don't think so. I think the court of appeal is by far too numerous, and gives rise to very awkward results.

10011. In what way?—I have frequently observed that, after one or two cases have been disposed of, with a strong muster of the Justices, a number of them leave the court, and the remaining cases are disposed of quite differently, depending very much upon which party has the majority in court.

10012. As a rule, do you find the appeal court more liberal or more restricted in granting licences than the magistrates?—Sometimes the one way and sometimes the other, depending very much on which of the two sides is in the majority.

10013. Are your reports to the magistrates always respected?—Yes.

10014. And given effect to?—Generally. I have nothing to complain of as regards that.

10015. Do you think it would be satisfactory that the power should be vested in the magistrates, without any power of appeal to the Justices?—I think that would be better than the present system. Perhaps it would be right that there should be an appeal; but I would like that it should be a very different sort of appeal. There are above 100 Justices.

10016. The Chairman.—What kind of appeal would you suggest?—I have some difficulty in giving a very decided opinion as to that. I think it ought to be to a responsible public official, whether to the Sheriff or to another official I am not prepared to suggest.

10017. Mr. Smythe.—Is there anything like a 'whip' to get up friends to attend?—I have no doubt of it.

10018. Mr. Webster.—On both sides?—I think so.

10019. Mr. Orr Ewing.—You speak with reference to the Justices?—Yes; specially with reference to the appeal court.

10020. It is not so with reference to the magistrates?—I am afraid they are annoyed with applications out of doors; but I don't think that operates to anything like the same extent as in the appeal court.

10021. Mr. Baxter.—You would like an appeal to some independent party?—I think so.

10022. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Would it not be better to leave the whole power of granting licences in cities and burghs to the magistrates, who are responsible for the peace and order of the community?—I think that would be better than the present system.

10023. Without any appeal whatever?—Even without any appeal.

10024. Mr. Smythe.—You think the magistrates less liable to be influenced by personal feeling towards the individuals who apply?—I think so.

10025. Would that be the case in small burghs as well as in large burghs?—There would be more difficulty, perhaps, in small burghs.

10026. The Chairman.—But, on the whole, you think an appeal to such a person as the Sheriff would be a beneficial thing?—I think so.

10027. It would be a check in regard to the course taken by those who are the judges in the first instance?—Yes.

10028. And it would give an opportunity of correcting anything that happened to be done wrong, by mistake or otherwise?—Certainly.

10029. It is an annual duty. How much time does it occupy?—It is an annual duty; and the court sits for four or five hours. Usually, at the principal court in April, the sitting occupies several hours.

10030. One day?—Sometimes two days. I have not known it extend over two days.

10031. Mr. Baxter.—How many public-houses are there in the city?—There are about 360 public-houses; but there are altogether nearly 900 licensed persons. There are more persons licensed as grocers and dealers in excisable liquors than publicans.

10032. The Chairman.—Are the licences as matter of course renewed, if there is no objection stated to the conduct of the parties?—The rule is to call over the roll; and if no objection is stated, they are renewed.

10033. Mr. Murray.—How many shebeens are there?—It is very difficult to say. I got a return about a year ago, and it showed that there might be from 80 to 100.

10034. Mr. Webster.—Have you any idea how many there were before the passing of the Forbes Mackenzie Act, or if there were any?—Brothels have always been in one sense of the term shebeens, before and since; but before that Act there were certainly many fewer shebeens not used as brothels.

10035. Mr. Orr Ewing.—The increase has taken place because of the restricting of the hours of sale?—We find the traffic is principally carried on from Saturday night to Monday morning, when, under the Acts, the licensed houses are shut up.

10036. But it is not because of the reduction of the number of houses licensed?—I don't think so.

10037. Mr. Shand.—How many magistrates take part in granting licences?—The whole of them.

10038. They sit as a body?—Yes; and the Lord Provost also.

10039. How many are usually on the bench on these occasions?—They generally all attend.

10040. How many?—Seven altogether.

10041. It is a public court?—Yes.

10042. And it is under the influence of public opinion?—Yes.

10043. Sufficiently to make it a final court?—Well, I would hesitate as to making it a final court.

10044. Why would you do that?—Because all the magistrates are popularly elected. That is one reason.

10045. Mr. Smythe.—Is there often a division of opinion as to whether a licence should be granted or not?—Oh yes.

10046. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Don't you think it is an advantage that they are popularly elected, and that if they were going against the feeling of the community they would be turned out at next election?—I don't think that is an advantage.

10047. Are the spirit-dealers a strong body?—Yes; and their support may have to be looked to in order to obtain election.

10048. Is that not a good reason for depriving the magistrates of the power of licensing altogether?—It might be so.

10049. Mr. Webster.—Are the gentlemen who are elected to the magistracy generally men who have taken a pretty extreme view on one side or other of such questions?—They are elected by the Town Council; and, of course, they are generally men who have taken a prominent part in the discussions, either on one side or other, and their friends try to get them appointed.

10050. Mr. Baxter.—Are they ever spirit-dealers themselves?—That has happened, but on very rare occasions. But a spirit-dealer is not allowed to sit either as a magistrate or a Justice of Peace in the Licensing Court.

10051. Mr. Smythe.—I suppose very few of them are interested in public-house property?—I don't think they are personally; but the people who are interested could exercise great influence in the wards which they represent.

10052. Some of them may be interested in temperance establishments?—Yes; I have known some magistrates who have a strong bias of that kind.

10053. The Chairman.—And some members of the Council may perhaps be themselves the holders of temperance establishments?—Yes; that is so at present.

THE HON. LORD ARDMILLAN, examined.

10054. The Chairman.—You are one of the judges of the Supreme Court,—both in the Civil Court and in the Criminal Court?—I am.

10055. In what year did you come to the bar?—In 1829.

10056. You acted for some time as one of the Lord Advocate's deputes?—I did, for several years.

10057. After that you were Sheriff of the county of Perth?—I became Sheriff of Perthshire in March 1849, and I remained so till September 1853.

10058. You then became Solicitor-General?—Yes, I became Solicitor-General.

10059. How long have you been on the bench?—Since the end of 1854.

10060. The Commission are desirous at present to have your views in regard to the Sheriff Courts. Have you considered the matter of the constitution of these courts as consisting of the Sheriffs and their substitutes?—I have. I had some experience as a Sheriff in that matter myself, and I have frequently considered that question. I have no doubt that the arrangement of what is called the double Sheriffship, that is, the arrangement which places as the responsible local judge of every county a gentleman chosen from the bar by the Crown, who keeps up his connection with the legal profession by attendance and practice in the courts, maturing his mind by laying up stores of legal knowledge, by work as well as by reading, with a substitute under him, appointed by him, and for whom he is responsible, is an arrangement which has, upon the whole, worked extremely well; and although capable, perhaps, of some slight modification, I am decidedly of opinion that that arrangement ought not to be subverted. I think it is an arrangement for the good of the country. I think experience has proved that; and so far as I am able to judge, I see no strong objection to it, although, as I said before, some modifications of it may perhaps be necessary.

10061. What are the kind of modifications that occur to you?—I think it possible that in some counties there is not quite work enough to occupy all the time that a Sheriff ought to give to the duties,—in short, that some of the districts are too small, both as regards the Sheriff and the Sheriff-substitute. There are places that might easily be mentioned where the Sheriff-substitute's duty approaches very nearly to a sinecure, and no blame to him at all; but, from the want of business in the place, he really can have very little to do. And there are counties where the duties of the Sheriff-depute are also very light. It is a question not unattended with difficulty, even in regard to these small Sheriffdoms, whether the joining one or two together might not have the effect of making the work so much more severe in proportion to the remuneration, as to make it difficult to get men of the class required to hold the office of Sheriff; and I am not forgetting that difficulty. I appreciate it fully, and I agree in thinking that is a difficulty in the matter. But still I think there may be some instances in which two, or perhaps three, certainly two of the existing counties, might be put under one Sheriff with no disadvantage to the public service.

The Hon. Lord Ardmillan.

10062. In any such arrangement, would you consider it material to have regard to the facilities of access to the court from distant parts of a county?—Certainly; I have no doubt that that is a material consideration. I would never suggest the combining counties under circumstances which would prevent the superintendence and supervision of the whole district comprising the jurisdiction of the Sheriff, by him. I consider that the personal supervision of the district over which he is Sheriff is of the greatest public importance, and has practically, I think, been found to be of great use and value, and I should be very sorry to suggest anything which would diminish that.

10063. Do you approve of the appeal from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff?—I certainly do. I think it is now made very cheap; it is promptly attended to, and it is conducted on a footing that gives opportunity to both parties to state their case fully to the Sheriff, and I think that, generally speaking, it is satisfactory. I am not possessed of accurate statistical information, but I should suppose the effect of it to be to stop at least three-fourths of the appeals which leave the Sheriff-substitute, and to prevent them coming to the Court of Session. Probably I am far within the mark. It is to be presumed that those which are stopped there are satisfactorily settled. The parties are satisfied, and don't go further.

10064. Some of them may be matters of small amount, and the expense of an appeal to the Court of Session may deter some of them?—There is no doubt of that.

10065. It has been suggested that a better arrangement would be, that instead of a Sheriff, to whom appeal may be taken as now, and who has the superintendence of the district, there should be judges of appeal—that Scotland should be divided into five districts, and that two of these appeal judges should, as it were, perambulate each district, and hold courts at different places as judges in appeal from the Sheriff-substitute; that these gentlemen should be in a high position at the bar; that they should be precluded from practice, and confined to the performance of their duties as appellate judges. Do you think that would be an improvement on the present system?—I think not at all. In the first place, I think that by such an arrangement you would lose the great advantage of personal attendance and supervision of the particular county by the Sheriff. In the next place, I think you would lose, what I regard as a great benefit, the Sheriff-depute going to the county as often as he can, and trying the criminal cases that are tried with a jury. When I was Sheriff of Perthshire, though I had a most efficient substitute, I tried almost every criminal cause in the county that was tried by a jury, and I think that is a duty which the Sheriff should perform as often as he can. It is an important part of his duty, and one which his remaining at the bar, and keeping pace with the progress and practice of the law, enables him to perform; and I think he ought to perform it whenever he can. But I don't think that it would be as well done, or as much done, if these itinerating courts of appeal were substituted for the present system. I also doubt whether two is a good number for such an appellate court. They may differ. They may be men of minds in some respects so differently constituted that they may differ very frequently; and the result of their difference must be, I suppose, nothing else than the judgment appealed from standing, because there is no third party that can adjudicate, unless the difference be held as at once bringing the case to the Court of Session, which would certainly not be desirable. Therefore one of the objects of such an appellate tribunal would, I think, be lost by that form of procedure.

10066. Do you think that a review by the Sheriff, as now, of the judgment of his substitute before it comes to the Court of Session, is calculated to clear the case and reduce it to its proper elements, more than if the appeal were direct from the Sheriff-substitute to the Court of Session?—I think that a question of some difficulty. I could understand that an appeal from the Sheriff-substitute to the court direct, as of course it would be cheaper to some extent than taking first the intermediate appeal, might be as satisfactory as an appeal through the medium of the Sheriff-depute, if it were not for the other advantages to which I have referred, which I think are attendant on the jurisdiction of the Sheriff. I think that the case is prepared for decision by passing under the review of the Sheriff. But I don't see that the mere preparation of the case by the Sheriff would be so great an advantage as, taken alone, to sustain the double jurisdiction; though I think that, taken along with the other subjects which I have mentioned, it tends in the same direction, and confirms my opinion that it would not be desirable to abolish the double Sheriffship.

10067. Then do I understand your view to be, that as regards the civil business, and also as regards what may be called the executive duties of a Sheriff, the present system is preferable to any that you have heard suggested?—I think so certainly; and I may add, that I think the mode of appointing both the one and the other is better than any I have heard suggested. I think the appointment of the Sheriff-depute by the Crown, out of the practising bar, and the appointment by the Sheriff of his substitute, he being responsible for his substitute, and it being quite necessary, both for the harmonious and the efficient conduct of procedure in the county, that they should agree well together, is the best mode of appointment. The Sheriff-substitutes are also generally members of the bar, though not necessarily so; and I may venture to say that in the few instances I know of exceptions, such as Glasgow, Perth, Cupar, and Stirling, the extremely creditable manner in which the duties are discharged, would seem to me to show that occasional exceptions in that direction are not bad. I think all these gentlemen, and I daresay there are more of them, discharge their duties extremely well, and to the great satisfaction of every one.

10068. Mr. Webster.—The principal Sheriff has not the appointment of his substitute, unless a vacancy occur in the office of substitute after the principal Sheriff is appointed?—That is so.

10069. Has that any effect upon your view as to the mode of selecting the substitute?—Of course you cannot suppose that the feeling is transmitted with the office, and therefore it must have some modification; but since the Sheriff-substitute now holds, and I think rightly holds, his office ad vitam aut culpam, nothing else can be arranged. I don't think it would do to impinge upon that.

10070. You would not transfer the selection of the substitute to the same tribunal that selects the Sheriff-principal?—I don't see any necessity for doing that. I cannot suppose that that can be the wish of the Sheriffs-substitute. They cannot think otherwise than that the Sheriffs-depute judged very wisely in their selection; and as some have suggested that occasionally not very wise selections are made by the Crown, I think it is safer to leave it where it is well done, than to transfer it to where it is said to have a chance of being ill done. Not that I think it is ill done by the Crown—very much the reverse. I think all the appointments made by the Crown, whatever Government is in office, have been made very carefully, and with a desire to do right. And when we see the gentlemen who have been appointed Sheriffs, I don't think it can be said to have been ill done.

10071. The Chairman.—The Sheriff has a material interest to select the best person he can get as his substitute to aid him in the performance of his duties?—He has; and he is responsible for him.

10072. And if he takes him from the bar, he has a knowledge of the gentlemen from whom he makes the selection?—Yes.

10073. And if he does not take him from the bar, he has to make the same inquiries that the Crown would have to make?—Yes.

10074. Mr. Orr Ewing.—If you found that the Sheriff-substitutes would prefer their appointment direct from the Crown, would that not lead you to modify your views upon that point?—It is not a matter about which one can have a very strong opinion any way. I believe very good appointments might be made from the one quarter or the other; but it appears to me not unreasonable that the holder of an office who is responsible for the substitute who discharges the duties in his absence, has perhaps as great an interest and as great a motive to select well as anybody else.

10075. But would it not be necessary, in order to carry out that to the full extent, to give the Sheriff-depute the power to remove the Sheriff-substitute whom he found in office, and to appoint one whom he himself had confidence in?—Well, permanency of official position secures independence of judicial character.

10076. The Sheriff-depute who appoints the Sheriff-substitute may not be Sheriff-depute over that substitute for more than two months after he is appointed?—That is perfectly true.

10077. And the new Sheriff-depute may not have the same confidence in the Sheriff-substitute appointed by his predecessor?—That is quite true. The same thing would apply in the case of the Lord Advocate. The Lord Advocate who appoints him may cease to be Lord Advocate before the gentleman appointed begins his work, but he has made the selection when he had the interest and the duty to select. The interest and the duty may cease, but it is not a bad mode of selecting for all that.

10078. Would it not raise the status of the Sheriff-substitute if he was appointed by the Crown?—I scarcely think so. I entertain a very strong feeling in favour of the manner in which the Sheriff-substitutes discharge their duties, and also in favour of the claims of the Sheriff-substitutes to consideration for further remuneration in several respects. I believe the whole course of recent legislation has been to increase and multiply the duties of the Sheriff in a great many ways, and the weight of that increase of business falling upon the Sheriff is, from the Sheriff-substitute residing in the county, to a large extent or chiefly put upon him; and I think that that may very fairly be held as giving the Sheriff-substitute a claim to increased favourable consideration in the matter of remuneration. When I see the way in which local judges are remunerated in England, I must say that I think it would be very desirable, and very just, that the Sheriffs-substitute should have their claims in that respect favourably considered. But that does not alter the opinion that, upon the whole, the appointment by the Sheriff of his substitute is the best plan. But it is not a thing about which one has a very decided opinion, and I daresay it might be very justly done either way.

10079. Mr. Baxter.—Your Lordship is aware that the Sheriffs-substitute were not formerly the regularly trained lawyers that they are now?—Yes.

10080. And that they had not the same encouragement to accept of the office that men of ability now have?—Yes.

is weak, and that it would be strengthened by having two minds to deliberate and consult together, has received very general favour with us. There is another consideration which has led to the same result, viz. that we think our Sheriff-substitute has more advantages for forming his judgment than the Sheriff-depute. He is in the case from the beginning; he prepares the record, and in cases of disputed fact he takes the proof; he sees and hears the witnesses, and he is able from their demeanour, and their readiness of answering, and many other particulars, to judge of their credibility; and therefore we have considerably lost confidence in the present appeal from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff, and are very anxious to have the appeal court strengthened. We therefore think that if the court consisted of two judges instead of one, that would materially strengthen it?—I am quite aware of these considerations, and they are not without weight; but I confess they do not move me from the opinion which I have already expressed in the matter. Giving all credit to the Sheriff-substitute for legal education and knowledge of his business, I am not prepared to say that an appeal from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff depute or principal is not an appeal from an inferior to a higher jurisdiction; and I would add, without the least disrespect, that I think it is to be held as an appeal from the inferior judicial qualities to the higher judicial qualities. I don't say that that is always the case, but we must deal with a question of that kind on the general aspect and presumptions of it. I think that a gentleman who is living entirely in the district, in the midst of local prepossessions and opinions,—it may be prejudices,—is not so good a judge as a gentleman who is continuing his practice at the bar; and there are many men among the present Sheriffs who would be selected for arbiters or for judges by all those whose cases come before the Sheriff-substitute at present. As long as you have the position of Sheriff-depute filled, or open to be filled, by such gentlemen, I think it is desirable to retain the appeal as it stands; and I doubt very much if a perambulating body of two would permanently give the same satisfaction as the appellate jurisdiction which we have now. The proposal to have itinerating courts has only recently been brought before the public mind, and I don't see the advantage of it over the present system.

10082. Mr. Shand.—The other circumstance mentioned by Mr. Baxter, that the Sheriff-substitute sees the witnesses, and has the preparation of the case, has existed as long as the office has existed?—That is an important circumstance, but I think it is quite capable of being a little over-estimated. All the cases upon proof that come up from the Sheriffs to the Court of Session must necessarily be judged of by judges who have not seen the witnesses; and although there is a certain amount of advantage in seeing the witnesses, yet people accustomed to deal with evidence can, generally speaking, if the examination is well conducted, get pretty well at the truth of it, although they have not seen the witnesses; and whether we can do it well or not, it is the only way in which, in such causes, we can get at the truth of the case.

10083. What are the administrative duties of the Sheriff to which you attach importance?—I may mention, in the first place, that I consider that the whole system of public prosecution in Scotland, which is a very important part of our procedure, assumes as part of the system, that in the detection of crime and the prosecution of the criminal—I speak prior to the period when it comes to trial—every step shall be taken with the sanction and under the eye of the Sheriff. I think the law looks to the Sheriff as occupying the position of guarding the whole procedure of the public prosecutor both against attempts to frustrate or evade justice on the one hand, and against attempts to oppress or injure an accused person on the other hand. The Sheriff occupies a most important position in all that kind of proceeding. When cases occur out of the usual line—take the case of a man of great position and influence, who is either the person injured, or who, as in some cases, has been the person who did the wrong—I think it is extremely desirable, and eminently satisfactory to the Procurator-fiscal acting for the Lord Advocate in the matter, that the Sheriff, who takes charge of the whole proceeding, should be some one totally separated from the local interests and feelings of the place; and I could easily suggest cases which have occurred where the Sheriff-principal resident in Edinburgh has immediately proceeded to the county to take steps in a case of that kind.

10084. Mr. Baxter.—I suppose you are aware that in practice, the Sheriff very seldom knows or takes any action in criminal matters, and that they are reported directly from the Fiscal to the Crown lawyers, without the intervention of the Sheriff?—That is quite true. The Sheriff resident in Edinburgh is very rarely applied to by the Crown. It is not generally from the Crown that the application comes. When these cases occur, there is generally a notice of some kind or another sent to the Sheriff from the county, and the Sheriff at once proceeds to his county. But occasionally he is applied to by the Crown lawyers.

10085. Don't you think the resident Sheriff would be capable of doing the duty?—I am very far from saying that he would not be capable; but I don't think he could do it with the same authority, or with the same satisfaction to the public, if he were living at the gate of the proprietor who had either been attacked, or who had been the attacker. I feel quite satisfied that his procedure would not carry the same weight with it as the procedure of the Sheriff leaving Edinburgh, and taking the matter up. And I think there have been cases where that has been done.

10086. The Chairman.—I daresay you may have known of cases in which, when there was great local excitement or disturbance, the Sheriff, perhaps upon the suggestion of the Lord Advocate, immediately repaired to his county to restore order?—Certainly, there are several cases where that has happened.

10087. As regards the jurisdiction of the Sheriff, there are some classes of cases in which it has been thought that his jurisdiction is unwisely excluded. Questions of heritable estate of small amount have been stated, and it has been suggested that in such cases he ought to have jurisdiction. It has also been suggested that his jurisdiction should be extended to any case of heritable right, the party having the power of course eventually to appeal to the Court of Session. Do you think there would be convenience in giving him jurisdiction either where the amount of heritage is small, or where it is large, with perhaps a power to the party to remove it to the Court of Session, in the manner provided by the 40th section of the Judicature Act?—Where the question of heritable right is purely raised, as for instance in an action of declarator, or an action of reduction of the title of an heritable estate, I would be of opinion that that should not be within the jurisdiction of the Sheriff. But where the question of heritable right is raised incidentally in the course of another proceeding, I do not think that any harm would arise from extending the jurisdiction of the Sheriff, both parties consenting thereto. But I do not think that one party—the other objecting—should be permitted to keep a question of heritable right in the Sheriff Court.

10088. It has been suggested that some questions are of such small value that they could not bear the cost of discussion in the Court of Session, and that in such cases it would be desirable that the Sheriff should have jurisdiction; and as a modification of that, it has been suggested by some, that if such an action was raised, it should be in the power of either party to remove it. Do you see any objection to giving the Sheriff jurisdiction in small cases in that way?—I cannot say that I do, particularly if the questions arise incidentally; but I still think that proper actions of declarator and actions of reduction of heritable titles should be with the Supreme Court.

10089. Mr. Baxter.—Is that from the difficulty of the questions?—No. Sometimes another kind of question may be quite as difficult; but it is because it has always been held, and I think wisely enough held, that land rights should be disposed of by the Supreme Court. Where the question is incidental, I think it might very well be retained in the Sheriff Court, especially when of small value; but I am not in favour of extending the jurisdiction to proper actions of declarator.

10090. Mr. Smythe.—Take questions of boundary as between two parties, where the heritable right can hardly be said to be affected, but it is merely a question of evidence?—I think that is a very natural and proper question to leave to the Sheriff, because then it arises incidentally.

10091. Mr. Shand.—But supposing a question of property as to one of those small feus, on which a weaver has built his cottage and invested all his means, and a dispute arises as to the property of that between two poor people, is it not hard that they should have to go to the Court of Session with that?—I have already said, that if both parties choose to agree, I would have no objection to its remaining in the Sheriff Court; but I think that one party should have no right to keep a question of heritable right out of the Court of Session.

10092. Mr. Baxter.—Would your Lordship allow it to be competent in the Sheriff Court, with power to the defender to remove it to the Court of Session?—In these small cases I think I would allow the Sheriff to say to the parties when it was raised before him, "This is a case in which I cannot judge unless you both agree;" and if both agree, he should proceed with it.

10093. Mr. Shand.—Would that not leave in the hands of a possessor who was holding property, it might be, wrongly, the power of compelling his adversary to adopt means that would cost a great deal of money?—But there is always a certain amount of presumption in favour of possession, and I am not sure that we should allow a person to bring a very summary procedure before the Sheriff Court to invert possession.

10094. Even supposing the remedy was limited to cases of the value of so much a year, or to the value as appearing in the valuation roll, would you still be against allowing it except of consent?—I must say, when it becomes a question of title, I feel a little reluctance to extend it. An action of removing is competent before the Sheriff, but that is a possessory action.

10095. Mr. Baxter.—Would you allow all actions of removing, including extraordinary removings, to be brought before the Sheriff?—I don't think any actions of removing should be excluded from the Sheriff's jurisdiction.

10096. Mr. Campbell.—There was a period when the great interests of persons possessed of property in this country were all heritable, and the pecuniary interests were comparatively insignificant. In the present state of society the pecuniary interests irrespective of land, greatly outweigh in actual amount the interests in the land?—Yes.

10097. Don't you think that that change in civilisation has a tendency to lead one to doubt the propriety of excluding an ordinary court which has unlimited jurisdiction in moveables from entertaining any question of heritable right?—I think it may very well suggest a doubt about it; but I feel a little reluctant to give up the exclusive jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in matters of proper declarator of heritable right. There may be an apparent benefit in conceding that jurisdiction, but it might lead to great difficulties. It might not be sufficiently expiscated; you might have erroneous judgments and appeals upon them; and I think, in short, that the man who has his title fixed upon land is entitled to hold it, and ought to hold it, until he has the opposing claim disposed of by the Supreme Court of the country.

10098. You don't think the right of appeal to the Supreme Court would be a sufficient check on errors or mistakes of that kind?—In small cases I think it might. I have already said I would not object to that in cases where the value is small, and both parties concur; but I don't think that an action to test the right of property in an estate of £1000 a year of rental should be brought before the Sheriff-substitute.

10099. But do you think that where there was an estate of such value, there would be the slightest chance of either litigant beginning in the Sheriff Court a suit which would certainly terminate in the Supreme Court? Don't you think they would go to the Supreme Court at once?—I am not at all sure of that. We have had some very singular cases of claims that had nothing whatever in them. There was a claim in regard to the estates held by the family of my own name—the Craufurd estates—that was made many years ago, and went through a great course of litigation. But suppose that case had begun in a Sheriff Court, and a proof had been at once allowed, and all sorts of conflicting evidence had been taken, there would have been great additional difficulty, cost, and delay in dealing with it. The other day a claim was raised in regard to the Breadalbane estates. Now it would not do to have these cases sent in the first instance to the Sheriff Court for trial.

10100. Might that difficulty not be met by allowing the party who thought that the tribunal was unsuited for disposing of interests of such magnitude, to apply to have it transferred?—Well, perhaps that might be sufficient. They would be pretty sure to apply, I think. In the small cases that have been adverted to, I think the requiring the concurrence of both parties might be sufficient to support the extension of the Sheriff's jurisdiction. But I see great difficulty in leaving very important cases of heritable right to no other security than that. I think there is no occasion for extending the Sheriff's jurisdiction to these.

10101. The Chairman.—What is your opinion in regard to giving the Sheriff jurisdiction in questions of status—such as declarators of marriage, declarators of legitimacy, or actions of divorce?—I would say the same thing with reference to them. I think it better not to extend the Sheriff's jurisdiction to these cases.

10102. It has been said that poor people sustain great hardship, especially in the matter of divorce, from inability to prosecute their rights in the Supreme Court, by reason of its expense; and that the consequence has been, or may be, that they have either to sit under the injury they have sustained, or that they are driven to immoral courses. Do you think that that is a reason why a power of divorce should be given to the Sheriff?—I am not satisfied that it would be prudent to do so. The jurisdiction in divorce is a very peculiar thing. One of the matters to be most carefully guarded against is the possibility of collusion; and a very ready and cheap mode of obtaining divorce might lead to people wilfully separating themselves, and breaking a bond which they were bound to hold faithfully till death. In our courts there is the greatest possible care taken that there never shall be a decree of divorce pronounced which could be collusive.

10103. Mr. Campbell.—You doubt whether the Sheriffs generally could be entrusted safely with such a power?—I think there is not quite the same security. And it probably must come up to the Court of Session eventually. But it would never come up to the Court of Session if there was any collusion.

10104. Mr. Adam—Would not requiring information to be given to the Procurator-fiscal in such cases be a sufficient protection against collusion?—It would be some protection. It would be a great thing if the procedure were made as cheap as possible, and as prompt as possible, in the superior courts. I think that would be very proper, but I look on the hazard of collusion in matters of divorce as a very serious thing; and I am afraid that if a person could obtain divorce very quickly and cheaply in the Sheriff Court, and the person against whom the decree is obtained immediately and very readily acquiesces, a great deal of moral evil of a serious nature would be produced. It would enable people to get quit of the most serious and abiding of all human contracts.

10105. Mr. Webster.—Would there be the same objection if the oath of calumny was taken before the Sheriff as it always has been before the Commissaries and the Judges of the Court of Session?—We never have held the oath of calumny to be very effectual as a protection against collusion. We have always gone on the principle, that no person shall ever be divorced without the same amount of proof as would be required if the case were resolutely opposed; and that is the real protection.

10106. But the proof which is required relates only to two matters—first to marriage, and second to breach of duty?—Yes.

10107. And the proof has never any reference in the Court of Session to the matter of collusion?—Unless the question of collusion is raised in some way, you are quite right; but the whole circumstances come out, and ought to come out. And there have been cases in which people have thrown facilities in the way, to enable them to get quit of a wife, which have come out on the trial for divorce, and the divorce has been refused on that ground; and I think that is quite right.

10108. Mr. Shand.—If the evil of collusion could be guarded against, do you see any other objection to the Sheriff's jurisdiction being extended to cases of divorce?—No; I have perfect confidence that the Sheriffs would try the cases fairly and intelligently. I have no doubt they are perfectly capable of trying the cases well; but I think the hazard of collusion presents a serious difficulty.

10109. Does it occur to you to make any other suggestion except that which has been mentioned, of an intimation in all cases to the Procurator-fiscal, so that he might inquire into the facts? Is there any other safeguard that you would suggest?—I think it is one of those cases in which the very general record, which is the practice in the Sheriff Court, under the recent Act, should be departed from. I think that in an action for divorce, the most precise and careful record should be put in by the party making the statements; and that a general record in an accusation of adultery as a ground for divorce should not be sustained. I would suggest that if the Sheriff is to try a case of divorce, the record by the pursuer of the action should be much more specific than the record in a case for the payment of a £20 debt.

10110. Mr. Baxter.—I think you recognise it as a great hardship on a poor man, who is not able to pay the expense of getting a divorce in the Court of Session, that he should not have a remedy?—I quite feel that it is so; and if the interests of society in what I think an important moral question in regard to collusion could be effectually protected, I don't see any objection; but I think that is an important object.

10112. The Chairman.—Do you think that in the Court of Session it would be an expedient thing, and operate as a check upon collusion, that notice should be given of the action to the public prosecutor, and that he should have a power to intervene if he apprehended collusion?—I think it would. I think that either in the Court of Session or the Sheriff Court that would be a very proper thing to do.

10113. Do you think it would be expedient that alleged paramours should be cited as co-respondents in the action?—I think so.

10114. That would tend also to expiscate the question of collusion?—I think it is the practice now to cite them, and I think it is quite right that they should be cited. It would tend to expiscate the truth.

10115. Mr. Campbell.—In former times in Scotland the Commissaries were the original judges in cases of divorce?—Yes.

10116. Were their qualifications, in your opinion, higher than those of the Sheriff-substitutes now administering justice in Scotland?—I don't think that they were higher. I don't think that was a very good mode of dealing with these cases, and I would just as soon send them to the Sheriffs.

10117. In the experience of the old Commissary Court, was there reason to believe that collusion was frequent in cases of divorce, or was that any reason for the alteration of the jurisdiction in regard to these cases?—I cannot say that it was a reason for the alteration of the jurisdiction; but unless I am mistaken, there were cases in the Commissary records of a hundred years back, where there were very curious and singular instances of collusion on the one hand, and of fraudulent procedure on the other.

10118. These are cases going very far back?—Very far back.

10119. Mr. Murray.—Latterly the public were not quite satisfied with the Commissaries?—Not quite.

10120. The Chairman.—Does it appear to you that cases of declarator of marriage ought also to be confined to the Supreme Court?—I think so, for the same reason, and as involving status.

10121. Do you think there would be any inexpediency in giving the Sheriffs a power to name factors loco tutoris, judicial factors, trustees on lapsed trusts, and officers of that kind?—That is a question that could hardly be answered at once, and with reference to the whole class of cases. I could understand that there may be some cases of that kind, where it was necessary for the immediate extrication of a lapsed trust, that such an appointment might be properly left to the Sheriff. But I don't think it would be right to extend, per aversionem, the whole powers of the court in such a matter at once to the Sheriff Court.

10123. Mr. Smythe.—In cases where lunatics have very small properties, there is sometimes at present the greatest difficulty of getting at the property, and it is desirable to have a prompt and cheap means of doing so. Would you give the Sheriff jurisdiction in these cases?—I don't think it would be a very difficult matter for a good man of business, accustomed to deal with these things, to select the kind of appointments which the Sheriff might make, and to leave untouched those more delicate applications, or those graver matters which should still be left to the Court of Session. Their jurisdiction is somewhat of what would be called in England a Chancery character, and I would not be disposed to hand the whole of it over to the Sheriff Court. But any person experienced in our court business here, could easily prepare a list of those factorships and offices to which the Sheriff might appoint.

10124. The Chairman.—Do you think it would be expedient to extend to the Sheriff Court the power of trying civil actions by jury?—I would much rather limit the trying of civil actions by jury in our own court. I don't think it would do any good at all to extend that to the Sheriff Court. I would far rather have the judgment of the Sheriff. But on that subject I have a suggestion to make. If I mistake not, there was a plan, I think in the Rutherfurd Act, by which, if the parties agreed, they might have their cause tried by a judge instead of by a jury; and it is wonderful how few cases did come to be so tried. There have been a few, perhaps a good many, but not near the number that was expected when his Lordship proposed that. Now, excepting certain cases of damages and defamation, and others which might easily be selected, I think it would be a great improvement if even in our own courts the process were exactly reversed,—that where the parties choose, they shall have their case tried by a jury,—that where one party proposes it, and the other does not agree, the judge before whom the cause depends shall decide whether it shall be sent to a jury or not, and that it shall be tried by the judge, excepting when the parties agree to go before a jury, or where the judge so directs on hearing the motion.

10125. But in regard to the Sheriff Court, you are not in favour of introducing jury trial?—Not at all. Criminal causes, of course, would be tried by jury.

10126. In regard to criminal causes, do you think it would be a convenient and expedient thing that the Sheriff should have power to sentence to penal servitude? It has been suggested that there are a number of cases which, in consequence of repeated convictions, the public prosecutor is compelled to bring before the Circuit Court or the High Court, because the Sheriff cannot pronounce the sentence that is considered suitable, viz. penal servitude, say for five years. Do you think it would be expedient that he should have that power?—Looking to the present provision, that there should be no term of penal servitude under five years in the Justiciary Court, and that it shall be seven years whenever it is an offence after previous conviction, I think it might be safely permitted to the Sheriff—and by safely I mean expediently—that he should impose a sentence of penal servitude for some period fixed, less than five years,—say three years; and I think that would be found quite sufficient to remedy the evil to which your Lordship points. It would then be for the public prosecutor to select the cases to be tried before the Sheriff, and the Sheriff would see whether they were cases to which a sentence of three years' penal servitude was appropriate.

10127. Do you think that such an enactment would lead to the trial coming more rapidly after the offence?—Yes.

10128. And it might save expense, and prevent the loss of evidence?—Yes.

10129. Mr. Smythe.—Do you think the number of jurors in criminal cases could with safety be reduced?—I think 15 is an awkward number. I think the jury should be in all cases, whether in the Court of Justiciary or in the Sheriff Court, and whether civil or criminal, 12 in number. That would be a great relief to the jurors, and it would permit of the introduction of what I have long thought would be an advantageous rule. To demand unanimity, as is done in England, seems to me quite irrational; I cannot see any good ground for that. But it is quite true that convictions by 8 to 7—a majority of one out of 15—are not very satisfactory; and I would suggest that 12 should be the number of the jury, and that two-thirds should be necessary to conviction, in which case you would have convictions by 8 to 4; and I believe in that way you would get convictions in every case in which the evidence really warrants it. It would also be a great saving to jurors, because it would liberate 3 out of every 15.

10130. Would you approve of a jury of 7?—That would possess very much the same disadvantage as 15, viz. that there would be a majority of 1.

10131. Mr. Webster.—But you might require a majority of 5 out of the 7?—You might do that. I certainly think that 12 would be an improvement on the present number; but I am not prepared to make it lower at present. It is an advantage to have men of intelligence on the jury; and if the number was 7, and challenging was freely exercised, it might be contrived that there would not be a single person of intelligence left on the jury. I believe that great good will be accomplished by the removing of the exemptions that existed, which have at almost every circuit in Scotland prevented the court from having the benefit of seeing on the jury the gentlemen round about of most education, position, and intelligence, not one of whom is generally to be found upon a jury.

10132. The Chairman.—Are not most of these exemptions removed by the Act of last session?—Yes; and I think that will do a great deal of good.

10133. Mr. Baxter.—I suppose you have often observed the very thin line between theft and robbery?—Yes.

10134. Would you be inclined to extend the jurisdiction of the Sheriff to try cases of robbery, leaving it to the Crown lawyers to determine what cases they should send to him?—I think so. I think it is a defeat of justice, that a person accused of theft shall escape at the trial, because he has just added enough of violence to his procedure to make it robbery.

10135. Mr. Shand.—Have you seen counsel for the defence endeavour to bring the case up to robbery?—Yes.

10136. Mr. Baxter.—Are you of opinion that previous convictions should be given in evidence to the jury before their verdict?—That is a matter of some nicety, and it depends a little upon the class of cases. In principle, I agree with the suggestion, that as the jury are always told, and rightly told, that they must try the particular case upon the evidence, and not consider the previous convictions till they are satisfied upon the evidence, it is not in accordance with strict justice, that the previous convictions should be laid before the jury; and therefore, in cases of theft, robbery, etc., I think it would probably be a better plan if the evidence of previous conviction were laid only before the judge. But there are one or two kinds of cases in which, upon the soundest principles of justice, a different course should be adopted. Take the case of reset. I think nothing can be clearer than that a man that has been practising reset, where the case comes to turn upon his guilty knowledge, should not be permitted to hide from the jury the fact that he, who is pleading innocent possession, has been in the habit of resetting before; and so, in a case of uttering base coin, I must say that, if a man has been convicted over and over again of uttering base coin, it is scarcely just that he shall hide that fact from the jury, and have his counsel declaring, 'This is a man that has done no more than any of you, gentlemen of the jury, might have done; he got a bad shilling, and he gave it away, just as you might have done.' In these cases, I think it is quite right that the jury should know the fact.

10137. Mr. Adam.—Is it not the law at present that you may produce in evidence the previous conviction of uttering base coin?—That is the reason why I would leave that to the jury; but it is not the case at present, that you can enforce a charge of theft by saying that he has done that before.

10138. Mr. Baxter.—Or where a prisoner pleads a good character and puts his character in issue?—Yes.

10139. Mr. Adam.—Would you think it right that the judge should have the power of amending an indictment during trial? Supposing it turns out that there is a discrepancy between the statement in the indictment and the facts proved, do you think that in such a case the judge might be entrusted with the power of amending the indictment?—I think, if the difference was serious, it would be a little hazardous to allow the prosecutor the power. If the difference was not serious, and raised no more than a purely technical objection, I think that as the court have in recent years been permitted to authorize amendments of record in the court, the same principle might sanction the alteration of a word or two at the trial; but it should be done before the trial begins, and on the motion of whatever party chooses to make it.

10140. I was putting the case where a discrepancy in fact came to light during the trial?—I would doubt as to allowing an amendment there.

10141. The Chairman.—For instance, the mislibelling of the locus or of the name—would you allow that to be amended?—I doubt that. I think it is the duty of the public prosecutor, and it is a duty very rarely failed in, to state the locus correctly and the names correctly; and at all events, if he should have failed in stating these correctly, to ascertain when it comes to trial, whether he has or has not; and if at the commencement of the proceeding the public prosecutor or the prisoner's counsel were to point out that the man was called Robert in the indictment while his name was John, I would allow that amendment at once, before the procedure commenced; but I doubt exceedingly as to allowing the prosecutor to adjust his procedure to emerging circumstances. That is an encroachment on the rights of the accused which I would not like to see.

10142. Mr. Shand.—Suppose that when the case has progressed nearly to its close, it is found that the property libelled belongs to A. B. & Co., in place of A. B., do you not think it would be better that the libel should be at once amended, than that the prisoner should escape, he being guilty?—I think it would. That is a very peculiar kind of case, and a very critical objection. If it belongs to A. B. & Co., and A. and B. are partners of the company, I would not be very ready to sustain an objection in that case. It is generally put, 'the property or in the lawful possession of.' It is not often that the difficulty arises; but I would be tenacious of the rights of the accused, and would hesitate as to allowing the adjustment of the procedure by the public prosecutor on a trial, to suit emerging circumstances.

10143. Would you allow amendments of consent of the panel at any time?—If it was of consent, I cannot see any strong objection to allowing it. I would certainly allow it of consent before the trial commenced.

10144. Mr. Baxter.—It is not likely to be consented to after the trial has commenced?—No; but it might be the interest of the prisoner to consent, rather than have the diet deserted pro loco et tempore, and be sent back to prison.

10145. Mr. Adam.—Suppose it appeared that there was to be some miscarriage, would you allow the case to be adjourned and tried by another jury? I mean such a miscarriage as has been referred to, the property being libelled as the property of A. B., and it coming out that it was the property of A. B. & Co. In such a case would you allow a new trial, where the prisoner had not tholed an assize?—I am a bit of a purist in these matters. I would not like to encroach on the rights of the accused; on the other hand, I would not allow such a thing to happen as happened long ago, where a man was accused of the murder of a person living in the house of a man of a certain name—

10146. The Chairman.—Hannay?—Yes. I would, as a judge, have held that as he was acquitted there because the proof showed that he killed a person of a different name than the name libelled, it might very fairly have been held that he had not been tried on the charge; and that opinion has been held by more than one eminent judge. I would have no objection to a new trial being made lawful in such a case where it could be held that the prisoner had not really tholed an assize.

10147. Mr. Adam.—Before taking a verdict, might the judge not send the case to be tried before another jury?—If it amounted to a case such as I have mentioned, I would quite acknowledge the wisdom of it; but it is a sort of judicial discretion that I certainly should not like to exercise. If a man were tried for his life, and at the close of the trial a difficulty occurred owing to the absence of a witness, or anything of that kind, I don't think I would allow that man to be sent back to prison and tried again.

10148. The Chairman.—The principle you hold in regard to such special cases as have been put appears to be this, that that is not the offence with which the man has been charged?—Yes.

10149. And if it is not the offence with which he has been charged, he has been acquitted of the offence with which he was charged?—Yes.

10150. But he has never been charged with the offence founded on a correct libel?—Yes; that is the answer to the case of Hannay.

10151. And therefore you think that the cases should not be held to be cases in which the party has tholed an assize?—No, I think not. While upon the subject of criminal prosecutions, I have a suggestion or two to make in regard to them, which I think important. I think that the benefit of the Act 1701, c. 6, should be extended to all parties accused of crime as soon as they are committed for trial, and by force of the warrant of commitment, and should not be a privilege to be obtained only by those who are wise enough and rich enough to pay for it. It is a protection against undue delay or protracted imprisonment; and I don't think that the protection against protracted imprisonment should be confined to those who have either the knowledge or the money to take the benefit of it. The poorest should be entitled to the very same remedy; and as the prosecutor can be forced to try the case, however difficult, in 100 days, with letters at the end of it, if he thinks fit, under the Act 1701, I don't think that, considering the facilities of procedure nowadays, there would be the least difficulty in his trying all cases subject to the same rule. I would qualify that by permitting the prosecutor always to obtain delay from the court upon cause shown; but unless cause is shown, I think that every person accused and committed for trial should be immediately, by force of law, brought within the remedy of the Act 1701.

10152. Mr. Adam.—Even though he were out on bail?—I am speaking only to those who are committed for trial, and in prison. In regard to persons on bail, I think that they ought to have the benefit of the statute also, because it is a great wrong to a man that he shall remain all his life under a charge, without being either tried for it or liberated from it; and therefore I think that that statute may be made available for persons on bail. But I would not extend it at once to all persons on bail. I would have persons on bail to make the application for it by a short and simple notice, with power to the prosecutor to resist it, or to obtain delay on cause shown. I could quite understand that a person is accused of an offence, and that after being accused his innocence appeared so plainly that he never was meant to be prosecuted; but he has been accused, apprehended, committed to prison, liberated on bail, and he may be a man of the highest character. I think it is a right that he has, to obtain either a trial or a liberation by warrant of the public prosecutor, and that the Act of 1701, if he were entitled to take the benefit of it, would lead to that result; but I would not at once extend it to persons on bail, without notice by them.

10153. The Chairman.—Would you have the power to apprehend him of new, on new criminal letters, in the event of its turning out, after an interval of years perhaps, that there was clear evidence of his guilt?—I think I would. That is a separate power which arises at the expiry of the term under the Act 1701. In the event of new evidence being discovered, I think it would be a just protection to the public interest.

10154. Mr. Adam.—Would that necessitate more circuits in Scotland?—I don't think so. I remember asking some parties who had good means of knowing, and it appeared that the number of cases where the trial takes place at a longer period after the commission of the offence than would be competent under the Act 1701 is very small. By far the greater proportion of cases are tried within the necessary time.

10155. Mr. Baxter.—And if the Sheriff had the extended jurisdiction which your Lordship proposes, any extra case might be brought to the High Court?—Yes.

10156. Mr. Murray.—You would not maintain the present distinction as to criminal letters; you would make the whole one?—I would make the whole one.

10157. Mr. Smythe.—And you would make it imperative without any act done by the prisoner?—Unless he was on bail. I would not leave it for him to take procedure in the matter, except he was on bail.

10158. Mr. Baxter.—But the commitment, if he were in prison, would operate as an intimation under the present Act?—Yes. There is another point connected also with the trial of criminal cases, and here the suggestion I have to make is one which probably will not be concurred in by a number of people; but I have thought a great deal of it. There is a proposal that was made by no less an authority than Lord Brougham, and by others, to allow an accused person, if he thought fit, to tender himself as a witness in his own cause; and I have come to the conclusion that that is a proposal that ought not to be acceded to. It must rest on one of two alternative footings: either he is to be only competent for himself, and not competent against himself, or he is to be competent either way. If he is to be competent only for himself, then every man who does not call himself will be believed by the jury to be guilty, because as he has himself always at his hand ready to say whether he is guilty or innocent, and does not choose to call himself, he will be at once believed to be guilty; and it would be no favour to prisoners to put them in that position. Then as to his giving explanations, according to the improved system of taking declarations—for I think the system has been very much improved—the declaration affords him an opportunity of making every fair explanation. The declarations should not be, and are not, in the hands of superior and judicious Fiscals, used for entrapping prisoners now; and therefore, as the declaration affords him the opportunity for explanation, I see no use—indeed, I see very much the reverse—of permitting him to call himself as a witness, when he cannot be called against himself. But then his Lordship and others used to say, Why not make him competent either way? Now, I have a still stronger opinion as to that. I think the conviction of the guilty, although one, and perhaps the chief end of criminal prosecution and justice, is not the only end; it is the conviction of the guilty by means which commend themselves to the confidence of the public. I daresay torture did at one period sometimes lead to the conviction of the guilty. I have no doubt that there have been other things that led to the conviction of the guilty—as, for instance, listeners. I think your Lordship in the chair will recollect very well evidence given by people who went to the door of a cell and listened, and heard the secret conversations of two wretched persons immured within it, and told them in the court; and one case in which a person listening heard, and repeated in court, the murmurings of an accused man in his sleep within the cell. Now it may be very possible that the conviction of the guilty might be obtained in all these ways, but they are all bad, and it is not according to the principle or spirit of British justice to obtain convictions by wringing confessions from the accused; and I don't think the calling a man as a witness, and putting him on oath against himself, is a thing that ought to be tolerated in a criminal trial in this country. Therefore I think, on both these alternatives, the proposal cannot stand. I would not have said anything about it, had it not been a good deal mooted and talked about lately; and having formed a decided opinion upon it, I have not hesitated to express it.

10159. The Chairman.—According to the present mode of taking declarations, which is an exceedingly fair mode to the prisoner, he has every opportunity of making such statements as he chooses. Do you think he ought to be entitled to insist on his declaration being read to the jury?—In some cases, I answer, Certainly. Even as a judge, I have repeatedly allowed the prisoner's declaration to be read, when the prosecutor did not put it in, and the prisoner wished it to be read. I have said it is not evidence for the prisoner, but the fact that he made a candid statement is shown by the declaration; and if he wishes the jury to know that fact, it should be read. The prosecutor always allows it to be read, on any suggestion from the bench.

10160. Sometimes it is proper to strike out of the declaration, before it is read, accusations against other prisoners or parties?—That is quite right, and is done.

10161. If the accused is entitled to make any statement he pleases in his declaration, and to insist on its being read to the jury, he has then the opportunity of making a statement upon which there has been no opportunity of putting questions to him, because it is not the practice to interrogate the prisoner. If he tenders himself as a witness at the trial, he can be interrogated; but if he tells his story in his declaration, and is entitled to have it read to the jury without any interrogatories having been put to him to test it, do you think that is expedient? You desire it to be read, not as evidence, but as the candid statement of the party at the time. Now it might or might not be a candid statement, but the opportunity of testing its candour did not exist when it was made, and is now passed?—That is quite true. There are some declarations which I would think it my duty not to allow to be read to the jury; for example, where an accusation is made in them against another prisoner; but where the object is to show that the story which the prisoner means to prove by his witnesses is the same story which he made in his declaration, it is reasonable that the jury should see that he is not for the first time presenting that case to them.

10162. I think you have stated that you have never known the prosecutor refuse to allow it to be read?—I never knew the prosecutor refuse to allow it to be read, where the judge thought it might fairly be read. I have known cases where the prosecutor refused to allow it to be read, where he was quite right on the grounds already mentioned.

10163. Mr. Shand.—When you have acted as counsel for a prisoner, have you never felt that it was an injustice to you to have the declaration refused?—I cannot at present recollect an instance in which, for the purpose I have mentioned, a declaration was refused. The general rule, I think, is that, if the counsel for the prisoner indicates to the court his wish to have the declaration read, on the grounds I have now stated, it was the habit of the court to allow it to be read.

10164. Do you hold that the prosecutor is not entitled to refuse to give the declaration?—I think the prosecutor is bound to show a reason for refusing it, if the court is appealed to.

10165. And that it is in the hands of the court to say whether it shall be read?—Yes; I think so. I may say that the only instance I know almost of a declaration being used which I thought ought not to have been used, is a case which is reported in the books. I was not counsel in the case, but I was present at the time. Mr. Baxter knows the case well. It was a case of two persons in Dundee who were accused of a very serious robbery, I think. The one pleaded guilty, and the public prosecutor declined to take the plea; they both went to trial, and the prosecutor read the declaration of the man who had pleaded guilty. I think that was wrong, and I have always thought so. The prosecutor was well entitled not to take the plea, because he was entitled to bring out the whole case; but he could have no motive for reading the declaration of the man who before the jury had offered a plea of guilty, except for the benefit he might get from it against the other party accused in that declaration. Therefore I think that declaration ought not to have been read. I was of that opinion at the time, and I have been so ever since; and if I were on the bench in a case of that kind, I would not allow the declaration to be read, because it would prejudice the other party accused. But that is the only instance that I recollect of, where the declaration was unfairly read or unfairly withheld.

10166. The Chairman.—That is not a legitimate use of a declaration, because the judge always tells the jury that it can be no evidence against the other prisoner. But a declaration in order to be used by a prosecutor must be libelled upon as a production?—Yes.

10167. Being there as well as the other productions, the prisoner is entitled to have it, unless there be a reason against it?—Yes.

10168. The reason generally assigned for not giving it is, that it can be no evidence for the prisoner?—Yes.

10169. But though it may not be evidence of the facts contained in it, it may tend to support the veracity of the party and the honesty of his case, when taken in connection with the evidence he has adduced, not as exactly making it evidence for him, but as producing an impression in his favour?—Yes.

10170. Mr. Shand.—Are you aware that some gentlemen, who have held the position of public prosecutors, hold that it is entirely within their control whether the declaration is to be used or not?—I am aware that some of them hold it to be within their control. I do not myself hold that. I hold it is under their control, in so far that they can show cause why it should not be used.

10171. It is a production by the Crown entirely?—Entirely.

10172. Is there not a doubt whether a prisoner is entitled to use that which is not given in his list of productions?—He cannot use it as his evidence; but he is entitled, I think, to let the jury know that he has all along made the same statement. In the case of an alibi, a man brings forward witnesses to prove that on the day on which a murder was committed he was at the other end of Edinburgh from where it took place. If he made exactly the same statement when he was apprehended, it is a circumstance in his favour that he did so. The statement is not to be held as true, unless he proves his alibi; but the fact that he then made it may be a fact in his favour, and it is only to that effect that I think it should be read.

10173. Your Lordship is satisfied that the prosecutor has not the absolute power of refusing the declaration?—I never had to rule it. I always put it exactly as I put it to-day,—that if the public prosecutor can show that there is anything in it which attacks another person or another prisoner, or any ground for refusing it, it shall not be read; but if the only object of reading it is to show that the man is not inventing a story now for the first time, but told the same story when apprehended, then it ought to be read. I never ruled it, but I have frequently so stated it; and I never yet found that the public prosecutor stated any objection. If the prosecutor, among other things, produces a pistol, and discovers that the pistol which he has produced as evidence against the accused is not what he intended, I should have very great doubt indeed whether the prisoner is not entitled to insist on the production of that pistol, and on its being shown to the jury. If the prosecutor has libelled it as a production which he means to use against him, I have very great doubt whether the prisoner is not entitled to say, 'You should not have brought it here if you did not mean to use it.'

10175. Do you think it right that the prisoner should not be entitled to consult a legal adviser before his declaration is taken?—I am not quite sure about that. At first sight it has an aspect of justice that he should consult his legal adviser; but I am not very sure about it. I think a declaration is a thing in which, if the party chooses, he is entitled to say nothing at all, and therefore he had better be simply asked his name, whether he was present, and questions of that sort, and then asked if he has any explanation to offer; and I don't think it is necessary to consult a man of business before doing that. I look upon the declarations as they are now taken, to be very fairly conducted; but they were not so in old days, a long time back.

10176. Do you approve of the double form of verdict—not proven and not guilty?—Yes; I think that right.

10177. Mr. Murray.—Have you ever considered whether a party who is accused and is acquitted ought not to get some compensation in the way of expenses from the Crown?—I have never considered that question. Of course it must only be on an absolute acquittal. I think it should not be done, as matter of right; it may well be left to the discretion of the Crown.

10178. Mr. Baxter.—I suppose your Lordship has very seldom seen a person tried without some ground for trying him?—Very seldom. It is quite another thing in a country where there are private prosecutors; but I think there is no occasion for it in a country where there is a public prosecutor, who always acts on public grounds, and can have no motive to accuse wrongfully.

10179. The Chairman.—Have you any further suggestions to offer to the Commission?—There is a point mentioned in the memorandum in regard to the possibility of review in criminal matters. Of course I can see no possibility of review on the merits at the close of the entire case; I don't see how you could review the evidence; and I think it is not practicable to have that review. But there is one species of review which I think might be obtained. I think a ruling in point of law, where it comes out clearly, might be excepted from, and I think that that exception might be taken to the Justiciary Court.

10181. Mr. Adam.—Would you allow that at the instance of the prosecutor as well as the panel?—I don't know that you could refuse it. It might lead to difficulties, but I don't know that you could refuse it. They do so in England. There is also another matter which I may mention. You have now a double diet; and at the first diet, where the relevancy is disposed of, supposing that a decision upon relevancy is given, and that an indictment were either sustained or rejected, I think there might very well be a very brief summary appeal on that point. There would be time for it between the diets. I could understand that the prosecutor may have an objection sustained against him on a very important question, and it may be for his interest to get that question disposed of rapidly, by an appeal upon the relevancy to the court. I could still more easily conceive that an accused might state a most important objection to relevancy, and have his objection repelled, in which case he comes up for his trial at next diet, and he cannot at present repeat his objection to the relevancy. Now I think it might be well that he should have power, by some rapid appeal, to get the objections to relevancy disposed of during the period between the first and second diet.

10182. The Chairman.—If he was detained longer in prison by reason of that, it would be his own doing?—Yes.

10183. If he was on bail, the bail would continue?—Yes.

10184. Have you any other suggestion?—No.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD COLONSAY IN THE CHAIR.

The Hon. Lord Deas.

THE HONOURABLE LORD DEAS, examined.

10185. The Chairman.—You are one of the Senators of the College of Justice?—I am.

10186. And one of the Commissioners of Justiciary?—I am.

10187. In what year did you come to the bar?—In 1828.

10188. You acted for some time as an Advocate-depute?—I acted for some years as counsel for the Crown in the Sheriff Courts, in all the more important criminal trials by jury, and sometimes even in such trials without a jury, under Lord Advocate Murray; about 1840 or beginning of 1841 I became one of the regular Advocates-depute, and I continued to be so, with a comparatively short interval while a different Government was in power, down to 1850.

10189. After that you were Sheriff of the county of Ross?—In 1850 I became Sheriff of the united counties of Ross and Cromarty, and I continued to be so till 1851, when I became Solicitor-General. I remained in that office till the Government went out. In 1853 I was appointed one of the judges of the Court of Session, and in 1854 one of the judges of the High Court of Justiciary, and I have held both these offices since.

10190. In these various capacities have you had an opportunity of observing the working of the system of Sheriff Courts in Scotland?—I think I have had as much opportunity for such observation as any one could well have,—ever since I came to the bar I may say, now upwards of 40 years.

10191. Have you considered the constitution of the Sheriff Courts as consisting of a Sheriff and his substitute or substitutes, and the expediency of that arrangement?—I have.

10192. What opinion have you formed in regard to it?—In forming an opinion upon that matter I assume two things: in the first place, that it is most important, looking to the extensive civil and criminal jurisdiction of these courts, to be able to secure the judicial services of men of great legal knowledge, and who are not only impartial, but as free as may be from personal and local prejudice; and, in the second place, that it is important, although not equally important, that as little ground as possible should be afforded, to even the most suspicious of litigants or of the public, for want of confidence in the qualifications of the judges of these courts, or for suspecting either partiality or prejudice. Assuming these two things, the opinion which I have formed with regard to the Scotch system of a resident Sheriff-substitute and of a non-resident Sheriff practising at the bar of the Supreme Court, is that there has been no system, ancient or modern, in this country or in any other with the history of which I am acquainted, better calculated to secure the two things I have just mentioned,—I mean the qualifications, and the confidence in these qualifications; and if the Commission desire it, I shall state some of the grounds of that opinion.

10193. If you please?—There are very obvious advantages in having a resident judge with the qualifications which are usually found in a Sheriff-substitute. There are a great many things, both civil and criminal, which require all the despatch that can be given to them, which of course is facilitated by the Sheriff-substitute being always easily accessible. Sequestrations for rent, removings and ejections from heritable property, interdicts, and various other things of a civil nature, are of that description; and in regard to criminal matters, warrants of apprehension and detention, taking of declarations of prisoners, warrants of liberation or of commitment in due course of law, are of a similar nature as respects the necessity for despatch. And as regards the public peace, it is of course important to have a judge upon the spot, who may interfere in cases of emergency of that kind. A resident judge has also the advantage of becoming acquainted with the habits and industries of the people around him. Whether these consist of agricultural pursuits, mining operations, shipping (if it be a shipping port), manufactures or commerce,—in regard to all these things a resident judge has the opportunity, and to some extent is under the necessity, of acquiring a practical knowledge of how these industries are carried on, which every man who has long exercised judicial functions knows may be very important in enabling him the better to apply, or preventing him from misapplying, the strict principles of law. It is not necessary that a Sheriff-substitute should be an advocate. There have been no better appointments of Sheriff-substitutes than some who were not advocates. Men bred to the law in some department or another, and of great practical experience, have performed these duties as well as they could be performed; and when an advocate is appointed, and goes to reside permanently in the locality, he has the opportunity, and, in course of time, he will almost necessarily acquire a great deal of the same kind of practical experience which that other class of men may happen to possess at the outset. Even the personal knowledge of individual character,—for instance, the knowledge of how far, as a judge, he can trust a man of skill; sometimes even (though that is a more delicate matter, and to be exercised much more cautiously) how far he can trust the credibility of parties—may become important. But, on the other hand, some of these advantages may very easily pass into disadvantages. A man may, unconsciously to himself, imbibe personal or local prejudices; and it might be possible (though I don't think it likely), even partialities, which it is desirable should not even be suspected. A resident Sheriff-substitute is likewise placed at a disadvantage with respect to books. He may have a very good library, but he cannot by possibility have such access to law books ancient and modern as if he were in the Parliament House, and to authorities and decisions in other countries, such as England and America, which it is becoming more and more necessary to be acquainted with as trade and commerce extend. He has likewise no opportunity of conversing or consulting with other persons equally qualified with himself to form an opinion upon cases which are depending before him. He may have a very good argument from his procurators or solicitors; but he has no entirely unconnected qualified persons round about him to discuss or consult with. He does not hear the discussions that take place and the opinions pronounced in the Supreme Court upon his own judgments, nor the remarks of the profession upon the result. He may read the reports, but these often don't carry so adequate an idea to the mind as when a man is present listening to what takes place; and there are various other disadvantages in the position in which he is necessarily placed. Some of these disadvantages seem to me to be converted into actual advantages, and others of them to be entirely supplied, by the system of having a non-resident Sheriff in active practice at the bar of the Supreme Court, with the qualifications which these gentlemen generally have. They are unconnected with the county; they have generally no personal knowledge of the litigants; there is no room whatever even for the most suspicious individuals,—and it would be incredible, if one did not know it, how suspicious some litigants are,—there is scarcely a possibility of suspecting him of partiality or personal prejudice; and the consequence of that is, that even if such were likely to influence the mind of the Sheriff-substitute, he would be prevented from giving way to it, because it would be of no use. The ready and immediate appeal to the Sheriff not only fortifies the Sheriff-substitute in his habitual purity, but prevents the suspicion of anything else. As respects the practical knowledge which the Sheriff will soon come to be able to estimate in the Sheriff-substitute, he will, of course, make a due allowance for that in considering the judgments of the substitute before he alters them; and he will bring to that task all the knowledge of legal principle, which he has still better means of being possessed of than the Sheriff-substitute. The Sheriffs have always considered it a privilege they were entitled to exercise, to consult with any or all of the other Sheriffs upon any matters of difficulty which come up to them for decision. They have access, of course, to all the books in the Faculty Library; they hear the discussions and opinions on the judgments which they themselves have pronounced, and which their substitutes have pronounced; and they hear the criticisms of the profession, which are often freely expressed in the Outer House, upon these judgments. Moreover, being themselves, or most of them, in active practice, they necessarily have their wits more sharpened than can well be expected from a man sitting in his own closet in a distant part of the country. A great advantage of the system, I think, is, that for a comparatively moderate salary, you can command the services of men in the highest and most extensive practice at the bar. You can command their services with reference to the cases that belong to their own county, and their advice and observations are at the command of every one of the other Sheriffs who may not happen to be in the same extensive practice. No man, in my experience, ever either refused or resigned the office of Sheriff because of its interference with his practice in the Supreme Court. The office is considered highly honourable; and however small the salary, such men as generally reach the higher departments of the profession have usually a pleasure in exercising the abilities and knowledge of which they are possessed, for the better dispensation of justice; and they have never been in the practice of resigning the office because it was less lucrative than the profession in which they were engaged. I remember, indeed, one instance of a Sheriff resigning, and some of his friends represented that it was on account of the pressure of professional business; but there were two things that threw a doubt upon that. In the first place, the Government of the day wanted an opportunity to make a Sheriff; and in the second place, within a remarkably short time, he was appointed Solicitor-General; and putting these two things together, nobody thought he was an exception to the rule I have mentioned, of men retaining their Sheriffships, even with the highest practice. The late Lord Moncreiff, than whom there never was a more able lawyer at the bar, or a man in more high employment, retained his Sheriffship when he was Dean of the Faculty of Advocates, and up to the time when he came to the bench. I don't suppose the emoluments of his Sheriffship at that time were above £300 or £350 a year; and I don't think that the opportunity of commanding the services of such men depends at all upon the amount of the salaries, if you leave them their professional employment over and above. No doubt, if you wish to continue to have the services of such men, you must not increase the duties too much; more particularly, you must not make it necessary to go too frequently to the county. The result of combining several counties, and making it necessary for the Sheriff to go very often to the county, would, I think, probably be, that you would lose the services of such men as I have mentioned. They could not be expected any longer to accept or to hold the office. But as things are at present, you can command the services of men as Sheriffs, to whom it would be the reverse of an object to be raised to the bench. One instance of that is a Sheriff, most deservedly in the highest practice (a member of this Commission), who declined to allow himself to be recommended to Her Majesty for promotion to the bench, but who never thought, so far as I know, of resigning his Sheriffship. Another instance, I may say, is a gentleman, likewise deservedly in the highest practice, who was a Sheriff until he was appointed to a higher office, incompatible with the exercise of the duties of Sheriff, and who likewise declined, on account of the pecuniary sacrifice, to allow himself to be recommended to Her Majesty for the high appointment I have just mentioned. There is almost a third; for there is another gentleman in still higher office who is not a Sheriff, because it would not be compatible with that high office to be a Sheriff, but who has made the same declinature, on the same ground of pecuniary sacrifice, and who, I have no doubt, if he were a Sheriff, and did not hold an office incompatible with it, would continue to be a Sheriff, although he has been long at the head of the profession. Now, I cannot help thinking that a system which enables you to command the services of such men at very moderate salaries—because the salaries are not, and don't require to be, upon the footing of remunerating them for their whole time, which would be a very serious matter—such a system, I say, appears to me very valuable, both as respects the duties which they perform, and as respects the aid which they may give to others who are not in equally extensive practice. And a consequence of that, necessarily, is great confidence, throughout the country, among litigants, in the judgments which are pronounced in these courts; and one benefit of that, amongst others, is, that a large number of their judgments are acquiesced in, which tends to prevent the Court of Session from being inundated with a flood of trashy cases—cases in a general point of view not important—and enables that court, or at least gives it opportunity to perform the function which is, and always ought to be, the distinguishing feature of a Supreme Court,—viz. to preserve, ripen, and mature a system of jurisprudence which shall command the respect of the civilised world.

10194. It has been suggested that the appeal from the resident Sheriff to the principal Sheriff might be put on a different footing, by dividing Scotland into say five districts, and appointing two gentlemen of high position at the bar as appellate judges for each district, to go round and decide the cases, leaving open an appeal to the Court of Session, either in all cases, or in cases exceeding a certain value. Does it appear to you that that system would be beneficial or not?—It does not appear to me that that system would be nearly so satisfactory as the present system of appeal to Sheriffs having the opportunities to which I have referred.

10195. Mr. Smythe.—Particularly with reference to the disadvantages under which you have stated that the Sheriff-substitutes labour at present, and which you think are compensated and remedied by the present plan, do you think that such a tribunal would have the same effect of remedying those disadvantages?—I think not.

10196. Mr. Baxter.—Would your Lordship allow me to explain what has been a general feeling among my professional brethren in the country regarding the present constitution and working of the Sheriff Courts? Probably your Lordship may remember, as I do, a time when the Sheriff-substitutes were not the regularly educated and bred lawyers that they are now. Their salaries were extremely small, and the same encouragement to accept the office was not held out to men of ability as at present?—Yes, I remember that.

10197. In those times we held an appeal from the Sheriff-substitutes to the Sheriffs, who were always members of the bar, to be a very necessary measure, and it was then esteemed a very valuable privilege. But now, though your Lordship may not be aware of it so much as we are, that state of matters has very greatly changed. The Sheriff-substitutes are now men who are also highly educated and bred to the profession of the law, in most instances members of the bar, and with some exceptions, to which your Lordship has particularly referred, may be held, and are held, in the country as equal in legal ability to their Sheriffs-principal. It has therefore been held with us, that an appeal from such a Sheriff-substitute to a Sheriff does not, generally speaking, carry the same weight as it formerly did; that, in fact, it would be something very like an appeal from one judge of the Court of Session to another judge of the Court of Session. Besides that, we think that the Sheriff-substitutes, in forming their judgments, have some advantages, to which your Lordship has alluded, which the Sheriffs-principal have not. They preside over the making up of the record, and in cases of disputed fact they take the proofs, and hear and see the witnesses, and are therefore more able, we think, to judge of their credibility; whereas in these cases of disputed facts the Sheriffs review their substitutes' judgments from notes of the evidence; and in these circumstances we have for some time back looked upon the appeal from the Sheriff-substitutes to the Sheriffs to be really an appeal from a judge very nearly, if not of the same order, and better informed upon some points, to a judge not so well informed; and although it is all very well when the Sheriff adheres, still, if he reverses the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, the unsuccessful party is apt to think, and does think, that he has at least the judgment of an equally competent judge. While, therefore, we highly appreciate a cheap appeal within the Sheriff Courts, we desire to have a stronger appeal than we now possess. For these reasons we have come to be of opinion that the appeal court would be strengthened by having two judges instead of one—two minds instead of one—to consult and deliberate together, and who would thereby, as we believe, arrive at conclusions which would be more satisfactory to the profession and to litigants; and we think that that system would possess both the advantages and the disadvantages possibly which your Lordship has described as attending the present system of resident and non-resident judges. That is the opinion which we entertain, and our reasons for it. Has your Lordship considered these?—I think it is one of the advantages of the resident Sheriff-substitute that you have him on the spot to prepare the record at the sight of the procurators; and it is also one of the advantages of having him on the spot, that he can take the proofs and hear and see the witnesses; in short, that he can prepare the case for judgment. But with the single exception of seeing the witnesses, I don't think those things are advantages when he comes to pronounce judgment. On the contrary, I think a judgment, generally speaking, can be given better by a judge whose time and attention have not been bestowed upon the preparation of the record. Judgment can generally be better given by a man who comes to it with a fresh eye, after the whole case is prepared to his hand; and still more so if he has, at the same time, the benefit of a careful judgment already formed and pronounced upon it by the Sheriff-substitute. It is quite true that nowadays only notes of the evidence are sent up, and these are not always so satisfactory as the full proof which we had before. If it were practicable to get, in the Sheriff Courts, such a shorthand writer as is now on my left hand, I would very much prefer to have the proof taken in that way; but there is so much urgency in the present day for economy, along with speed, as to prevent the possibility of combining everything. And as respects the credibility of the witnesses, which is the most important thing referred to, every Sheriff, and every judge in the Court of Session takes into account that the Sheriff-substitute heard and saw the witnesses; and the Sheriff-substitute, moreover, has always the opportunity of making a note of anything, noticed by him in the course of the proof, for the information of the Sheriff or court of review. That the judgments of the Sheriff-substitute shall sometimes be reversed, is of the very essence of a right of appeal; there would be no use of an appeal if the Sheriff were never to reverse; but I take it that the Sheriff always reverses very cautiously, and takes into consideration everything that the Sheriff-substitute has said and done, before he reverses. And the advantage that he has is not by any means dependent altogether upon his being a superior lawyer. It is the same advantage as there is this in every case of review—and it is there very much that the value of all review lies—that even if each successive judge, or each successive set of judges, who sit in review upon the judgments, were no better qualified than those who went before them, the case is ripened and sifted, and brought to its elements; and consequently we find that in the court of highest resort in the three kingdoms, even with judges not usually bred to a knowledge of the Scotch law, we have (very much in consequence of the ripening of the case, and reducing it to its elements by sifting out of it of all that is unimportant) judgments, than which, if you take them all together, nothing could well be more satisfactory. As regards the question whether that review, which I think essential, would be better to be committed to two judges who are to go round the country and review the judgments of the resident Sheriffs in the different places where Sheriff Courts are held, I cannot myself see the advantage of that over the present system. They would not get any more light, I think, by travelling about; there must be a great deal more expense to the country; you would not have got Lord Moncreiff when he was Dean of Faculty to travel over the country; you would not get such Sheriffs as I have referred to in the course of my observations to travel over the country; you would not get men of the same class, unless you are prepared to give them salaries of a very different description from what they get now; and when that was done, I don't very well see the advantage of two men who are not bound to agree, going about to pronounce these judgments. On the contrary, in my humble opinion, until you come to the Supreme Court, where experience has indicated that several judges—I should say four judges—are better for the final judgments, I think one man who feels the whole responsibility upon his own shoulders is more likely to come to a sound judgment than two men; and I think that the one man to whom the appeal is to be made is more likely to come to a sound judgment, sitting in his own chamber, or in the library of the Parliament House, 'rich with the spoils of time,' as well as with all modern books at his command, and with his brother Sheriffs, as I have already said, to consult with if he thinks proper,—I think that man, apart from the question of expense altogether and time and trouble wasted, is much more likely to come to a sound conclusion, than he would be when taken out of his ordinary occupation, travelling about the country, sleeping in a good hotel or a bad hotel as the case might be, and altogether what we familiarly call out of his element.

10198. Would not the appeal court, though consisting of two Sheriffs, have the same access to books and to conference with their associates, as one Sheriff now has?—I think if they could carry the Parliament House with them, and the lawyers of the Parliament House, they would; otherwise not.

10199. We presume that they would reside in Edinburgh, except when they are in the country?—I understood it was proposed that they were to go about the country to hear cases in different places, and to decide them then and there. If they were to reserve consideration of the cases, there would be no benefit in their having gone to the place at all.

10200. We don't think it would take up their whole time travelling in the country; and as for the expense, there would be a smaller number of Sheriffs than there is now?—If it is part of the proposed system to supersede the Sheriffs generally, my objections to that must be sufficiently apparent from what I have stated as to the advantages of the present system.

10201. Would your Lordship give me an instance of an appeal from one judge to one other judge?—All the appeals from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff have been instances of that, for greatly more than a century.

10202. But I meant in any other court?—We have had practically an appeal to one judge in the highest tribunal of the kingdom—I mean the House of Lords. We have had all the appeals going before one judge for years; and no more satisfactory judgments, I believe, ever were pronounced.

10203. Your Lordship means the Lord Chancellor?—The Lord Chancellor,—in Lord Eldon's time in particular.

10204. I suppose that must be taken as an exceptional case?—I was asked for an instance of an appeal to one judge, and I give that as an instance.

10205. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Does not the Lord Chancellor sit on appeals from the judgments of the Vice-Chancellors?—I believe there are plenty of such instances in England, but I did not wish to go into those that I am not perfectly familiar with. Some people have doubted—and I don't say that there might not be room for question—whether, if you could have a permanent Lord Chancellor with undoubted qualifications, you might not be as well in the hands of one man who felt all the responsibility on his shoulders, as in the hands of several men who may unconsciously lean to some extent upon one another.

10206. Mr. Campbell.—You mentioned the case of two very distinguished persons, one of them a member of this Commission, and the other a predecessor of his in the office of Sheriff of the same county. Are you aware that both of these gentlemen, the Solicitor-General and the present Sheriff of Haddington, were previously Sheriffs of Inverness-shire?—Yes, I am aware of that.

10207. Inverness is a county in which there is a great deal of business, and many appeals to be disposed of?—Yes.

10208. The united counties of Haddington and Berwick are a Sheriffdom in which there is very little business?—I believe there is less than in many others.

10209. But there is very much less than in Inverness-shire?—I have no doubt there is less than in Inverness-shire.

10210. Are you aware what amount of the time of these gentlemen was occupied in discharging the duties of Sheriff?—It is quite impossible for me to be aware of that. I believe they are unaware of it themselves, and could not know it unless they had kept a note of all the time they were engaged in their counties, and all the time they were considering the interlocutors they were to pronounce, and the judgments they were to give: they could not tell it otherwise.

10211. But do you think that the number of cases disposed of annually, by the Sheriff of that particular county, can very materially affect the public service from their number or importance?—I have no doubt they are very important to the public and to the litigants.

10212. Would you, in speaking of the office of Sheriff, say that the qualifications of these two gentlemen afforded any fair sample of the qualifications of the Sheriffs in Scotland generally?—Well, that is a delicate matter for me to give an opinion about; but if they are not a fair sample of the qualifications of the Sheriffs generally, that is not the fault of the system. It may be the fault of the appointments. But I may say that I am not aware that, if you take the Sheriffs of Scotland as a body, you will find a body of better qualified men for the purpose in any country; and I may be allowed to say, with reference to what you were pointing at as to the duties to be performed in some of these Sheriffdoms being less than in others, that that just illustrates the observation I made, that it is inexpedient to make the duties of Sheriffships too large, because, unless salaries were to be given which the country will not give, you would not then get the same class of men to perform these duties.

10213. Then the practical result is, I should fancy, that the duties of Sheriff of the large counties will usually be discharged by persons who are in less practice, and less distinguished at the bar, than those of the smaller counties?—I don't think so. That inference is not to be drawn from anything I have said. I have no doubt, that if a Sheriff holds a very large county, with a great deal to do, he will, when an opportunity offers, be very well pleased to be transferred to a smaller county which will interfere less with his professional practice; but, as I think I said some time ago, I know of no Sheriff, however high his practice, who resigned a Sheriffship, whether his county was large or small, until he was appointed to some office incompatible with the performance of the duties of Sheriff.

10214. But you have known Sheriffs resigning a large county, and a large salary, for a smaller one, in the two instances you mentioned?—I have known Sheriffs transferred from larger counties to smaller ones, I suppose somewhat upon the principle that clergymen are, in the opposite way, transferred from small livings to larger ones.

10215. Have you any idea of the relative numbers of those Sheriffs who are presently in the active practice of their profession, and of the number of those Sheriffs who are not at present in active practice, but merely in attendance at the Parliament House?—I have not collected any statistics upon that matter; but we all know that it is a necessary qualification for a Sheriff that he shall be in actual practice, except in the cases of Edinburgh and Glasgow, where the Sheriffs are resident.

10216. That is to say, it is a necessary qualification that they shall be in attendance in the Parliament House?—I am not going to construe the enactment. The rule is, that the Sheriff must be in actual practice. I am not here to decide what actual practice is.

10217. Do you not know instances of Sheriffs who for the last ten years have not had practice upon which any pecuniary estimate could be placed at all?—I cannot call to my recollection any such Sheriffs. There may be. People, if they don't die, get old; and I have in my recollection at this moment one or two whose age sufficiently accounts for their dropping, to some extent, out of the practice which they once had.

10218. Are there not instances of gentlemen holding the office of the Sheriff who never were recognised by the profession generally as persons in civil practice at the bar at all?—I cannot call to mind any such instances. But, as I said before, that depends upon the way in which the patronage is exercised, and not upon the system, which is the matter about which I have given my opinion. I may say that, when I was Sheriff of Ross and Cromarty, I was not without professional business; and nevertheless I decided all the cases that came to me, without, I think, any delay. Every man who is in large practice and who is a Sheriff, or holds any other office of an important kind, must, of course, make available every minute of his time; and if he does that, I don't know that there is any man in such practice, or who can well be in such practice at the bar, as to prevent him from being able to perform the duties of a Sheriff, with the aid, if I may so express it, of that very practice, which keeps him informed of all the authorities and the decisions, and of everything which is going on, and enables him to come to a satisfactory judgment much more readily, and in much less time, than a man who is not in that practice would do.

10219. As a matter of practical experience, is it the usual course for Sheriffs to sit in court and hear the advocations or appeals from their judgments as Sheriffs discussed and disposed of by the judges in the Court of Session?—So far as I have observed, I don't think that has been so much the practice for a few years back as it used to be. I can remember when it was a constant practice, and I think it is a practice which ought to be followed, and which can very easily be followed.

The Hon. Lord Deas.

10220. According to the present feeling in the profession, is it not usually the case that the Sheriff would absent himself, in order not to hamper the latitude of discussion and of remark on his judgment?—I cannot understand how that should be. I cannot understand how he could affect either the discussion at the bar, or the opinions from the bench in any way, either by his presence or by his absence.

10221. Perhaps you are aware that it would be thought a breach of etiquette in the Sheriff Court for the Sheriff-substitute to hear the argument before the Sheriff, or the decision of the Sheriff?—I am not aware of that. If it is so, I am surprised at it, and regret to hear it.

10222. Are you aware that it is now generally the practice for Sheriffs to dispose of appeals from the Sheriff-substitutes upon oral hearings?—I believe it is more frequent than it was at one time for the Sheriff to have an argument by counsel before him before he decides the appeal, and I think that is an improvement. That could not so well be done, or at least was not so likely to be done, until an Act of Parliament was passed which enables the Sheriff to give and sign his judgment in Edinburgh.

10223. Is it not the fact that the Sheriff disposes of most of his cases at the sittings in the county town of his Sheriffdom?—I am not aware that that is so. It was not so in my time, when I was a Sheriff.

10224. Did you generally dispose of cases upon reclaiming petitions and answers?—I generally disposed of cases sent up on appeal after the cause was so far prepared, and an interlocutor or judgment pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute, which was brought under review.

10225. Mr. Baxter.—Upon written pleadings?—They were all written pleadings at that time.

10226. Mr. Campbell.—If you were informed that the Sheriffs generally dispose of their appeals upon oral hearings held in their county town, would you not think that they would be in the same position with reference to the despatch of that part of their business as the ambulatory court would be? They are not at home in their own chambers, but are in their county towns?—I am not aware that the Sheriffs dispose of most of their appeals in the county towns, and I can hardly think that they can do so, because they only go to the county towns at stated periods, and the appeals go on and come up nearly all the days of the year. Besides, if they hear appeals in the county town when they happen to be there, they can make avizandum with them, and consider them afterwards; and I know that it is the practice of Sheriffs to have hearings before them in Edinburgh, by counsel on each side, whenever they think the case of such importance or difficulty as to deserve that mode of hearing it.

10227. Could not the ambulatory judges make avizandum also after hearing the parties in the county towns?—Certainly.

10228. Mr. Baxter.—I suppose you know that the cases in which counsel are heard before the Sheriffs in Edinburgh very seldom happen?—I presume they happen only when the importance of the cases, either in law or in some other respect, requires it; because the Sheriffs will be naturally anxious not to put the parties to that expense unless they think it necessary for the ends of justice.

10229. Mr. Adam.—Do you think that, without prejudice to the present system in other respects, the Sheriffs-principal might be required to go more frequently to their counties than they do at present?—I think not, for the reason that I formerly stated. I think, if you make it imperative upon the Sheriffs to go much more frequently to their counties than they do now, you are not likely to get the same class of men that you get now to hold these offices.

10230. Mr. Baxter.—Is your Lordship aware that they only go four times a year?—These are the statutory times; but I am likewise aware that they go much more frequently. I am aware that, when there is an important criminal trial, or anything of that kind, the Sheriff very often goes, altogether apart from his statutory periods.

10231. Mr. Smythe.—And the Sheriffs are always liable to be sent at other times, upon a requisition from the Lord Advocate, if he thinks it desirable that they should go,—I mean in cases of riot or disturbance?—I don't know that they are bound to obey a requisition from the Lord Advocate; but I know there is no Sheriff in Scotland who would not act upon that at once.

10232. The Chairman.—The system of two ambulatory judges to hear appeals implies, I understand, that these gentlemen are not to practise in the Court of Session, and that they are to have nothing to do except in their appellate jurisdiction. Therefore the superintendence of the Sheriff, according to the present constitution, in reference to matters magisterial or executive, or in reference to trying criminal cases, would be altogether withdrawn. Do you think that would be a great disadvantage?—I think it would, and that such a change would go far to destroy all the advantages of the present system of Sheriffs, which I have endeavoured to point out.

10233. It has been suggested that the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Court should be extended to all classes of cases that are competent in the Court of Session,—cases of heritage, cases of status, the appointment of factors loco tutoris, judicial factors, and such cases. Are there any of these in reference to which you think it would be expedient, or any of them in reference to which you think it would be inexpedient, to extend the jurisdiction of the Sheriff?—I think it might not be inexpedient to give Sheriffs the power, in certain cases, of appointing judicial factors, or officers of that kind; and I think it might not be inexpedient to give the Sheriffs somewhat more jurisdiction than they have in regard to some cases of heritable property. I am not disposed to think that that should be unlimited. Looking to the permanent nature of the property, and to the immense value of it in many cases, and to the fact that the mere expense of coming to the Court of Session is not a great consideration to such parties, I don't see any good reason for extending it without limit as respects heritable property; but within a certain value, or with some limitations, I think there might be an extension of that jurisdiction with advantage. I don't remember at this moment almost anything else, in the way of civil jurisdiction, where there is room for much extension of the jurisdiction of the Sheriff, which is very large, and all but universal. As respects criminal matters, I am not of opinion that any more extensive powers of punishment should be conferred upon Sheriffs than they have at present. They may inflict any punishment at present, with the exception of penal servitude and death. I don't know that it is proposed to restore to them the power of capital punishment. The necessity for doing so is not very much recommending itself to public opinion; and I think that, when it comes to a matter so serious as penal servitude, it must be much more satisfactory to the country that the trial takes place in a court which always sits before the eyes of the whole country, and where the ablest assistance of counsel is always to be had for the parties accused; and where the judges, without arrogating to them any natural or adventitious qualifications above those of the Sheriffs, must necessarily come to have more experience in such matters; and I think experience is of great importance, because there is constantly a necessity, in administering criminal jurisdiction, to modify or extend general rules according to circumstances, which it is impossible to define, and the weight due to which circumstances, I think, no man can learn except by experience. And as respects the possibility of suspecting either undue leniency, or undue severity, or anything else than the most perfect impartiality, I think all that is better secured in the Supreme Court than it could be in a local court; and as I believe the system operates to the satisfaction of the country at present, I should not be in favour of making that change upon it.

10234. The Chairman.—Your Lordship has not expressed any opinion as to extending the Sheriff's jurisdiction to questions of status, such as divorce, declarator of marriage, or declarator of legitimacy? — I omitted to say, in answer to that part of your Lordship's question, that, for something of the same kind of reasons as I have just indicated in regard to very high punishments, I should not be for extending the jurisdiction of Sheriffs to questions of status, or questions of declarator of marriage or legitimacy, or of divorce.

10235. Do you think there would be any inexpediency in giving them jurisdiction to deal with the protecting of the funds of married women?—I think there would be no objection to giving them that jurisdiction.

10236. What would your Lordship say in regard to giving them jurisdiction in matters of reduction of deeds, either of heritable title, or will?—Well, one would require some explanations of how that was proposed to be carried out, whether by the verdict of a jury, or in what way. A good deal, I think, would depend upon whether thorough review was secured in these matters, which would go very much to take away any objection that otherwise might be made to it. I would rather be disposed to think that, even if review were secured, any extension of jurisdiction of that kind would require to be under considerable limitations and restrictions.

10237. Has your Lordship ever considered whether trial by jury in civil causes ought to be extended to the Sheriff Court?—I think it should not. I think the opinion is gradually gaining ground that we have quite enough of that already; and I can only say, for my own part, that if I had a cause of importance to be tried, I would rather have it tried and decided by judges who had made law and justice the study of their lives, than by a certain number of men who never had studied law, and never, perhaps, had been called upon to decide a case of any kind before in their lives. At the same time, I am not to be understood as being otherwise than of opinion that there are classes of civil cases in which jury trial is a very valuable thing.

10238. Mr. Baxter.—Would you extend the Sheriff's criminal jurisdiction to try robberies of certain kinds, which are sometimes very much akin to theft?—I don't think there would be any absolute objection to give the Sheriff the power of trying robberies; but it would involve the necessity for a great exercise of discretion on the part of Crown counsel who remit cases of that kind to be tried, in selecting the kind of cases; and I should be rather apprehensive that too many cases of robbery might be sent to be so tried, so long as it is not thought expedient—and thinking myself that it is not expedient—to give the power of awarding a sentence of penal servitude to the Sheriffs, because, according to our law and practice, it is only in exceptional cases that any other punishment is thought appropriate for cases of robbery than penal servitude; and I am not aware that there has been any complaint indicated as to the punishments in cases of robbery being too severe.

10239. But the line between robbery and theft is sometimes very fine—almost infinitesimal?—Yes. But when the line becomes almost infinitesimal, I am not aware that there has been found much practical difficulty in trying the offence under the name of theft.

10240. Your Lordship is aware that it has been the practice of the chairmen of Quarter Sessions in England to pronounce sentences of penal servitude?—I believe so. I don't wish to give any opinion about the English system in that respect, with which I am imperfectly acquainted; but I don't think there would be any expediency or any desire for such a power to be given to chairmen of Quarter Sessions, or to Quarter Sessions themselves in Scotland.

10241. Is your Lordship aware that, in the cases of poor persons who wish to get a divorce, the expense of the Court of Session is really a denial of the remedy?—I am quite aware that the expense of obtaining a divorce is not infrequently an obstacle in the way of applying for it. It is not, however, a great obstacle in Scotland, if we may judge from the number of poor persons who do obtain divorces, which is very considerable. The expense is often not what can be called great, and is frequently not more than they are able to provide, if the case requires it. And while, upon the one hand, it might be doing nothing more than justice in many cases to make the remedy of divorce more easy, there are, upon the other hand, strong reasons of expediency against making it too easy. I suppose there are some countries, or portions of countries, in which it is easier to obtain a divorce than in Scotland; but I don't think it is so in other civilised countries generally; and when we consider how very recently it is that, in the richer country of England, even rich men could not get a divorce in courts of law, and how very far they are at this moment behind Scotland in respect of the ease and facility of obtaining a divorce, I would be very chary of altering the law and practice in Scotland for the sake of making it still more easy to obtain divorces. I think jurisdiction in these cases is perhaps about as delicate as any sort of jurisdiction that can be exercised; and with all my respect for Sheriff-substitutes, I think it is better and more satisfactory to the country that these cases are dealt with in the higher tribunals in the way they are now.

10242. Would your Lordship allow me to read a passage from the report of the committee of the United Presbyterian Synod, which Sir Roundell Palmer copied into his report on the Scotch Law of Marriage: 'That, in cases of disputed marriages, the present law, which renders actions of declarator of marriage competent only before the Supreme Court, involves a process so expensive as in many cases to render its benefits beyond the reach of the humbler classes, to the deepest injury of the wife and children; and that to remedy this great evil, jurisdiction should be extended to the Sheriffs to dispose of such cases, subject to appeal to the Supreme Court.' Does your Lordship agree with that?—I cannot say that I agree with it. It is a very serious thing the getting quit of a wife, and it is a very serious thing being fixed with a wife. I cannot say that I think the jurisdiction would be exercised so satisfactorily in the country, by a local tribunal, as it is now. I know that declarators of marriage and declarators of legitimacy have given me more trouble, thought, and consideration, for months together (what is called vacation time included), before I could make up my mind, than almost any other cases I have had to do with.

10243. But is it not a very serious thing, if a woman is really married, and has children, that she shall not be able to establish her condition, and that all the children should be held as illegitimate?—No doubt that is a serious thing; but I must say, with all my 40 years' experience at the bar, and otherwise, I have not become aware of material hardships resulting from the present system of jurisdiction, either in cases of divorce, or in cases of declarator of marriage or of legitimacy.

10244. Mr. Smythe.—And the recent changes of the law in England on that subject have confined it to one Supreme Court?—Yes; and I believe the result, so far as the court is concerned, is very satisfactory.

SIR WILLIAM BROUN, Bart., examined.

10245. The Chairman. — You are a practitioner before the Sheriff Court at Dumfries?—I am.

10246. How long have you been so?—Since the year 1830.

10247. Do you hold any official situation connected with the body of procurators, or connected with the business of the court?—I hold no official situation connected with the court. I am Dean of the Faculty of the Procurators.

10248. Are the procurators of Dumfries a numerous body?—They are.

10249. How many may there be?—65 in all; but I think 32 only are licensed. There are a good many gentlemen who are procurators who have the management of estates and factorages, but don't practise before the court.

10250. There is, I think, only one seat of a Sheriff Court in the county?—Only one seat.

10251. At Dumfries?—Yes, at Dumfries.

10252. Have you any suggestion to make to the Commission in regard to the constitution of the Sheriff Court, as consisting of the Sheriff and his substitute?—I think that the office of Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute should be abolished, and that we should have one good resident and well-paid Sheriff.

10253. When you say a well-paid Sheriff, have you any sum in your mind?—I think that the Sheriff of Dumfries should have £1500 a year, considering the population of the county, and the importance of his jurisdiction. The population in 1861 was 75,878.

10254. Would you abolish all appeal within the court itself?—No; I think we should have an appeal within the Sheriff Court most decidedly, and that there should be two appeal judges.

10255. What would their functions be?—They should come round, and hear, and decide all the appeals from resident Sheriffs.

10256. What number of such judges would you have? Would you have two judges to do the whole business of Scotland, or would you have Scotland divided into districts?—I think Scotland should be divided into districts, and that from the present Sheriffs appeal judges might be selected. I think it is possible that these appeal judges might take up four, or five, or six counties, according to the extent and population of the districts.

10257. You would take these appeal judges from the bar; but you would take them primarily from the present Sheriffs at starting?—Yes; at first from the present Sheriffs, and afterwards from the bar of Scotland.

10258. Do you contemplate that they should relinquish their practice at the bar?—Yes, I think so.

10259. And confine themselves to the duty of hearing appeals within the district?—Entirely to hearing appeals within the district; and if they have spare time, they might perhaps assist in the Outer House business of the Court of Session.

10260. How would you arrange that?—I presume they would be resident in Edinburgh.

10261. How would you bring them into play in assisting in the Outer House business?—I would do it in this way, that if they were to come round once every month, or once in five or six weeks, as might be arranged, and if it was found that the appeal business allowed them to remain their spare time in Edinburgh, it occurs to me that that spare time might possibly be occupied with advantage in the Court of Session.

10262. Do you mean that they should practise in the Court of Session?—No.

10263. Do you mean that they should act as judges in the Court of Session?—Yes; in hearing motions and assisting the Lords Ordinary, in preparing records, and in the minor business of the court. I think, however, that their time would nearly be fully occupied in considering and discussing appeals from resident Sheriffs.

10264. Would they have anything else to do in relation to the county, excepting the hearing of the appeals?—Nothing else except hearing the appeals, unless cases from the Sheriff Court were remitted to a jury. There are a great many cases coming before the Sheriff Court, that involve questions of servitude and actions of damages, in which eight or ten witnesses are examined on either side; and it has occurred to me, that if the Jury Court were still retained, it might be extended to the Sheriff Court, to the effect that if both the agents agreed to remit the case to these appeal Sheriffs and a jury, that this might be done, and that they might sit as a Jury Court, with a small jury of five or seven.

10265. Do you think it would be desirable to institute trial by jury in civil cases in the Sheriff Court?—I am very much averse to jury trials myself, as at present existing, owing to the immense expense and uncertainty attending them; but I think, if we had two appeal judges coming round to Dumfries periodically, in those cases where there is a large number of witnesses, if the parties, instead of taking a long proof, which might occupy five or six hours for several days, agreed to refer it to a jury, with those appeal judges sitting as judges, the whole case might be disposed of in one day. They might go on and hear the evidence, and the gentlemen of the local bar would conduct and discuss the case, and it would be decided off-hand at once. I don't see anything to prevent that being done.

10266. But generally, do you think that the introduction of jury trial in civil cases in the Sheriff Court would be an expedient thing?—I think it might be expedient, as a trial, in the way I have suggested.

10267. As an experiment?—I think myself that it would succeed.

10268. Would you have these appeal judges to take evidence in any other form?—No; the evidence would be all taken by the resident Sheriff, and the cases would then come on appeal to these judges.

10269. Then they would not, in fact, be Sheriffs at all. Would you propose that as a new appellate court?—Yes; they would be appeal judges.

10270. That would scarcely be a review within the Sheriff Court; but it would be a review by a new tribunal to be established?—It would amount to that, but still, I hold, be a review within the Sheriff Court.

10271. Would you have an appeal from these judges to the Court of Session?—Yes, I would.

10272. Upon matters of fact and upon matters of law?—Yes.

10273. Would you impose any limit upon the appeal as to amount, or would you make their judgment final with reference to any particular amount?—I think it might be well to make their judgment final up to the sum of £50. I may state that, before leaving Dumfries, I ascertained that the number of appeal cases last year, from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff-principal, was 89.

10274. Do you think that is about the usual number?—I am not prepared to say positively. The depute-clerk was absent, and I could only get the information for one year; but I should think that is about the usual number.

10275. Is it the general rule in Dumfries to appeal cases to the Sheriff upon a final judgment of the Sheriff-substitute?—I think it is. There are a good many appeals where the parties are not fully satisfied in regard to the judgment, and by others for delay.

10276. Is it the more frequent course to appeal?—Yes; I think it is.

10277. Where a judgment is pronounced upon preliminary defences, is it ordinarily appealed or acquiesced in?—It is generally appealed.

10278. Is there a frequent appeal upon an interlocutor allowing a proof?—The proofs are very frequently allowed before answer, and of course that precludes appeal; but sometimes there are appeals against relevancy and proof; but these are not so frequent, I think, as with reference to judgments on the preliminary defences.

10279. When you say that a judgment allowing a proof before answer precludes an appeal, do you mean that it excludes the interest to appeal?—Yes.

10280. In the course of taking proof, are there frequent appeals?—Occasionally; but that is not very frequent in my experience.

10281. Is it usual to go on with the proof, allowing these to be disposed of afterwards?—It is.

10282. Mr Campbell.—Is that not compulsory by the Act of 1853?—Yes.

10283. Mr. Baxter.—Is it not the fact that latterly the Sheriff-substitutes have been well-educated lawyers, and chiefly taken from the bar?—Yes; that is the general rule.

10284. And that the appeal, therefore, from such men to the Sheriffs has been regarded as very much an appeal from one judge to another of very much the same rank and ability?—Yes.

10285. And therefore there is not so much confidence now in the appeal as there used to be, when the Sheriff-substitute was of an inferior grade?—Yes; that is quite true.

10286. Is that a reason why the practitioners in the country generally wish the appeal court to be strengthened?—It is.

10287. The Chairman.—When you say there is not so much confidence in the appeal, do you mean that there is more confidence in the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute than there used to be?—I think the Sheriff-substitutes are a better class of judges than they were formerly, and in consequence we have more reliance on their judgments.

10288. Mr. Adam.—Is that opinion confined to the procurators, or is it held by the clients?—I think the procurators regulate their clients in that matter.

10289. Mr. Baxter.—Are you satisfied with the way in which the evidence is taken by the Sheriff-substitute?—No; I am far from satisfied with that. I think that we should have a shorthand writer. The mode of taking down proofs at present is objectionable in various points. In the first place, the proof is understood to be gone on with continuously till finished. When the Sheriff orders a proof, the pursuer and defender cite a number of witnesses,—and I have had cases myself where there have been eight on one side and ten on the other, all cited for one diet,—on the assumption that if the pursuer's proof were to finish at one or two o'clock, the defender should then instantly proceed with his proof; whereas it turned out that only three witnesses were examined, and there were fifteen witnesses who had come from different parts of the country distances of ten or twenty miles, some of them professional persons, and these had to be paid. Then the proof does not proceed the next day, because the Sheriff has so many engagements that it cannot go on till a new diet is fixed.

10290. You think a shorthand writer would expedite the taking of the proof?—I think that would facilitate it very much, and we should take the whole proof in one day. I am almost sure of that.

10291. But my question had reference to the Sheriff-substitute taking down the notes of evidence, without the agents knowing what he was taking down?—That is one of the other objections to the present mode. The Sheriff-substitute is only bound to take notes of the evidence, and when the question is put he takes down a note of the answer,—then he looks to the agent, and the agent then puts another question; and it goes on in that way to the end of the day. We never know a word that the Sheriff has taken down, unless we ask him to read a particular answer.

10292. Then you would prefer that the Sheriff-substitute should dictate the evidence?—Unquestionably, the Sheriff-substitute should dictate the evidence, so that the parties should hear and know what is taken down.

10293. Mr. Adam.—Do you not approve of a proof going on continuously, so that the defender's proof shall follow immediately after the pursuer's?—I quite approve of that; but it is not very easy to accomplish it under our present system. For instance, Tuesday is a court day, and Wednesday is our market day; and any professional gentlemen having any business at all, cannot possibly attend on that day without great inconvenience and sacrifice of time. Thursday is often a criminal court day, and Friday is our Sheriff Court and Small Debt Court; so that the Sheriff has just Monday, Wednesday, and Saturday; and he objects to take Saturday, as it is a half-holiday.

10294. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think that if a shorthand writer were to be employed, the proofs might be taken in one day?—Yes; but I am favourable to the Sheriff exercising the power which he has of naming a commissioner, who could easily, in my opinion, take the proofs with a shorthand writer, and so keep up the business of the court.

10295. Mr. Adam.—What is the difficulty in the Sheriff arranging his business so as to take a proof continuously on two consecutive days?—Because he has not two days together to spare. We are not sure of the time that may be occupied, and the Sheriff can scarcely fix a court day to take a proof of any length. These court days, as I have said, are Tuesday and Friday, and the criminal business comes on on the Thursdays. Then we all object to proofs being fixed for the market day, if we can possibly get it put off that day; besides, the Sheriff has to attend frequent Small Debt Circuit Courts.

Sir William Brown, Bart.

10296. The Chairman.—Do you think that the having of a shorthand writer would add to or diminish the expense of the proof?—I think it would diminish the expense.

10297. Mr. Campbell.—By saving time and the attendance of the professional persons employed?—Both by saving the attendance of the professional persons employed, and of the witnesses who have to be paid.

10298. The Chairman.—Is there more difficulty in the Sheriff taking a note of the evidence and finishing the case in a day, than there is in taking a trial in the criminal court or the jury court?—The evidence before the criminal or jury court would, I think, proceed much more rapidly than it does before the Sheriff. The Sheriff takes the evidence pretty fully; and it frequently happens that there are discussions and objections to the examination of witnesses, and these frequently occupy a considerable portion of time.

10299. Is there much of that in your court?—A good deal of it. Questions are often objected to.

10300. The same objection would arise whether there was a jury or not?—But I consider that the evidence would be much more rapidly taken before the appeal judges and a jury, in the form of a jury court, than it could be taken down by the Sheriff.

10301. But without a shorthand writer is there more difficulty in the Sheriff now taking down the evidence in satisfactory notes, than there is in the judge at a jury trial taking down the evidence by satisfactory notes, which are always appealed to as the rule of what has been said?—I think judges take them down shorter in the criminal court, and more rapidly.

10302. But take the case of the civil jury court?—Well, I think the evidence is taken much more rapidly in the civil jury court than the Sheriff takes his notes of the evidence.

10303. But if the Sheriff or any appeal judge sits in the civil jury court, would he take it more rapidly than he does now?—Yes, I think he would.

10304. How?—I think that the notes taken in the jury court would not be taken so fully as they are taken by the Sheriff; and besides, when a jury case is begun, the judges would very likely sit till the case was finished, whereas the Sheriff adjourns the proofs generally at five or six o'clock.

10305. When does he begin the proof?—Sometimes at ten or half-past, and sometimes at eleven.

10306. And generally you get through only two or three witnesses in the course of the day?—That depends on the circumstances. You may get through eight or ten in that time, but at other times you may not get through more than two or three. It all depends on the nature of the cases.

10307. Have you considered what sort of remuneration these gentlemen whom you call appeal judges should get?—I think they should have from £1800 to £2000 a year.

10308. Would that also command their time as assistant judges in the Court of Session, as you have suggested?—Yes, if their time permitted.

10309. Supposing that two appeal judges were to differ in opinion, what would be the condition of matters then?—We would still have the opinion of the Sheriff and one of the appeal judges.

10310. Mr. Baxter.—The judgment would stand?—The judgment would stand in that case.

10311. The Chairman.—But the two appeal judges would stand as plus and minus, in equal quantities?—Yes.

10312. And therefore you would just have the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute which was thought to merit appeal?—Yes, but confirmed by another judge.

10313. Have you considered whether the jurisdiction of the Sheriff ought to be extended?—Yes; I am decidedly of opinion that the jurisdiction of the Sheriff should be extended; and I think if we had a court constituted as I have described it, it might safely be extended to all civil causes. I was lately of opinion that causes of legitimacy and marriage and divorce might have been reserved for the Court of Session; but upon further consideration I have come to be of opinion, that if the court was constituted as I have said, it might be extended so as to embrace these cases also.

10314. Then there is no class of cases that you would exclude from the Sheriff's jurisdiction?—No; but I think if the jurisdiction was extended in the way I have mentioned, all cases of importance or intricacy would still be brought in the Court of Session.

10315. Would you think it expedient that, in regard to cases of heritable right of a certain value, and cases of status, there should be a power given to either party to remove them at an early stage to the Court of Session, if they desire it?—I think that might be an expedient course.

10316. Mr. Adam.—Supposing the system of two appeal judges were not adopted, would you still think that the Sheriff's jurisdiction might be extended?—Yes, I think it might.

10317. To the same extent?—In that case, I think both our Sheriff-substitutes and our Sheriffs should have better salaries, to induce more able men to accept the office.

10318. The Chairman.—Have the appointments of Sheriff-substitute in your county been generally satisfactory?—Very satisfactory indeed. We are very much satisfied with the appointment of the present Sheriff-substitute in Dumfries, and Mr. Trotter's appointment was also satisfactory.

10319. The system is satisfactory; but you think it would be improved by what you state?—Yes, I think it would be decidedly improved.

10320. The constitution of it has worked well; but you think it would work better if there were two appeal judges?—I think we can scarcely expect a Sheriff-substitute to leave the bar of Scotland, where he may rise to make from £1000 to £5000, or even more, a year, and to come to a country district for the small sum of £750 or so. My view is, that the salaries of the resident Sheriffs should rise according to the importance of the place, commencing at £1000. For instance, I would give £1500 a year to the Sheriff at Dumfries, probably £1800 to the Sheriff at Dundee, and £2000 to the Sheriffs at Glasgow and Edinburgh; and they should all be entitled to look for promotion. The resident Sheriff of Dumfries might be removed to Dundee, and from there to Glasgow, and he might ultimately be appointed to the bench. If these inducements were held out, I think we would secure a superior set of judges. In that case the Sheriff Court might be made competent to entertain all civil actions; and my own view is, that the Court of Session would become more a court of appeal which would fix the law of Scotland,—though I believe that all cases of importance in point of amount, or difficulty in point of law, would come to the Court of Session, if there was an improved form of process, and more rapid decisions obtained.

10321. Either by appeal or by being originally brought there?—Yes.

10322. Mr. Campbell.—Or by being transferred?—Yes.

10323. The Chairman.—Have you any observations to make upon the system of pleading in the Sheriff Courts at present—the writs or procedure?—I think the forms might be very easily simplified, and the form of making up the record might be improved. I do not see the use of the address by the Sheriff to Sheriff-officers in the present summons. I would have it just, 'I, A. B., say that C. D. owes me a certain sum of money in terms of the claim indorsed on the back of the writ; and I crave warrant to cite him to the court.' A simple writ of that kind, calling the defender into court, is all that is necessary,—the Sheriff-clerk in name of the Sheriff to grant warrant for citing the defender. Then I think that three days after the citation the pursuer ought to lodge the writ with all his productions in the hands of the Sheriff-clerk; so that the defender could borrow them, and have three days to say whether he was to defend the action. If he does not defend, there should be a certificate of no defence by the Sheriff-clerk, when the case should go to the Sheriff's roll, and decree should be got without the necessity of any one appearing and asking decree.

10324. When you say three days, I suppose you don't mean to fix that absolutely. There may be localities where a longer time would be necessary?—I suggest that it should be a short time. Then I think if the case is defended, the defender should be bound to lodge with his defence all his productions within a certain period; and if he puts in any counter claim, the pursuer should have the opportunity of borrowing up the defence, and counter claim, and productions; and if he has any amendment to make, he should, within a certain limited time, serve that amendment upon the defender, when the case would come before the Sheriff; and at the very first hearing the Sheriff might make any further small adjustment that was necessary, hear parties, close the record at once, and order a debate on preliminary pleas if such pleas are stated, and upon the merits of the case. Following upon that, I think we should have an interlocutor by the Sheriff, finding all the points that were admitted, disposing of the preliminary pleas, if any, fixing the relevancy and the proof; and from that we should have an appeal to the appeal judges, so as to save expense. Proofs are now allowed before answer, and we examine long lists of witnesses, and incur perhaps £30 or £40 of expense; and at the end it is found to be irrelevant and of no use.

10325. Mr. Baxter.—You mean that the defence should be lodged without any enrolment in court?—Yes.

10326. And that the first enrolment should be after the defences were lodged, and any replication which the pursuer may require to make; that then the case should be enrolled before the Sheriff, and the parties heard and the record closed?—Yes; and there would be no necessity for agents to appear in court till that time.

10327. Are you in favour of condescendence and answers?—No, I am not. I am averse to them.

10328. Mr. Smythe.—Would you have no statement of the plaintiff's claim?—I would have the statement indorsed on the back of the writ or summons, which would be like a short condescendence.

10329. The Chairman.—Would it be articulate?—It would run in this way: 'A. B. owes me £20 per bill dated so and so; and he owes me a farther sum of £10,' and so on; that is all that is necessary.

10330. Mr. Baxter.—To identify the claim?—Yes, to make the claim explicit; and he should produce the documents at the same time.

10331. The Chairman.—To show the nature of it?—Yes.

10332. And the defender, if he has a specific defence, should also state the facts connected with it?—I would have him to state them very shortly; and if he has a counter claim, he should state and aver that it is owing.

10333. And explain how?—Yes.

10334. How would you compel the defender to make his statement short?—He should be appointed to put in a simple statement of facts, without argument.

10335. That is, a condescendence?—It must come partly to that.

10336. Have you any other suggestion to make with reference to the Sheriff Courts?—I may say that I don't think the present form of appeal under the new Court of Session Act will be satisfactory.

10337. What is the objection to it?—The objection I have to it is, that when it comes into court, the court has not only the power of ordering the record, proof, interlocutors, and all the productions to be printed, which often incurs a very large expense, but they can allow amendments. They can also decide the case upon pleas in law that have not been before the inferior judges, and they can also take farther proof. I don't look on that as an appeal at all. It is like beginning a new case in the Court of Session.

10338. Do they allow new statements of fact?—

They allow amendments. The Act provides for amendments, so as to decide the case upon the proper points of law, whether they are stated to the inferior court or not, and proof also may be allowed.

10339. Do you object to the case being decided upon the proper points of law, though these have not been stated in the inferior court?—No, I don't go that length; but I object to amendments, and to proof particularly, because I think that involves something like a new case.

10340. If it appeared to the Supreme Court that the matter had not been properly expiscated in the inferior court, and that there was a miscarriage as to the real case between the parties, what do you think the court should do?—I cannot well suggest that. I think that would scarcely take place if we had the new system of a good resident Sheriff and two appeal Sheriffs.

10341. Does not the statement of the case in the court below depend somewhat upon having good procurators to state it?—No doubt of it.

10342. I don't suppose you anticipate having better procurators?—Yes; we anticipate that too. I think there is no doubt, now that Faculties have been established, and that all apprentices require to be specially examined before being admitted to their indentures at all, besides periodical examinations during their apprenticeship, and a stringent examination before a board of the General Council of Procurators, that we shall have a better class of procurators.

10343. But even with the best practitioners there may be such a miscarriage as I have stated?—No doubt of it.

10344. Do you think it expedient that the practitioners in one Sheriff Court should have the power of pleading in another?—I am in favour of all agents being put on an equal footing; and I think they should be allowed to practise in all the courts.

10345. In the Supreme Court, and in inferior courts also?—Yes.

10346. Would you have them admitted by the Supreme Court?—No. I think the same examination should be applied to the whole of them; and when they have undergone the proper course of study, and passed that examination, they should be entitled to practise in any court.

10347. And that the Supreme Court should have no control over the admission of parties to practise before it?—No; I think if these practitioners were admitted in the way I propose, they would be qualified, and should be entitled to practise in the superior court without any farther control of the Court of Session.

10348. The court having nothing to do with their admission?—No.

10349. Mr. Adam.—Is the Certain Debts Recovery Act much used in your county?—Yes, a good deal.

10350. Does it give satisfaction?—No; we are very averse to it, and I think it ought to be repealed.

10351. On what ground?—There are various grounds in which it is objectionable. For instance, after you get a decree, you cannot attach heritable property; that is one ground of objection. You cannot raise inhibition; that is another. You cannot adjudge; that is a third. Under the decree, there is no power to the officer to open shut and lockfast places to apprehend a party; and if a person produces a counter claim of £12, it is incompetent to state it. It is thrown out altogether, and the defender has to go into another court to establish it. That is a matter of great hardship.

10352. Is there any objection to the costs under it?—The costs in some instances are too high, and in others far too low.

10353. Mr. Baxter.—And you have no oral hearing on appeals?—No, I am not aware that the point has been tried; but it is supposed that if an action of multiplepoinding was raised, and five or six claimants were to come forward with claims of £12 or under, they would be all thrown out.

10354. Mr. Adam.—But, notwithstanding, the Act is considerably used in your county?—Yes.

10355. Mr. Campbell.—Is the Sheriff-substitute usually required to make a note of the evidence in cases under the Debts Recovery Act?—I believe he is; but I have not attended the Debts Recovery Court much myself. The Act also allows considerable delay. Thus a defender appears at the bar, and makes a number of difficulties as to putting in a defence, and he asks the Sheriff to adjourn the case till the next court. The Sheriff very frequently gives this delay, when anything like a good reason can be assigned for it. But, at the next court, the defender does not appear at all, and then there is a decree in absence. At the end of the ten days of charge, he takes out a sist, and serves it upon the pursuer. In this way he gets five or six weeks' delay, and there is no help for it. There is another most decided objection to the Debts Recovery Act, viz. that the defender has the power of appealing, by two or three lines of appeal, to one of the Divisions of the Court of Session; and when he does that, the Sheriff-clerk is bound to remit the case to Edinburgh. And I know a case where the defender never appeared in the Court of Session at all to support the appeal, and yet it cost the pursuer £13 before he could get the case sent back to the inferior court. The pursuer had to employ counsel, and to give intimation to the defender; and it cost him £13 before that small debt case could be remitted back to the Sheriff of Kirkcudbright.

10356. The Chairman.—Was any new question raised in the Court of Session?—No; not except this, that their Lordships hesitated to dismiss the appeal without some intimation being made to the defender. Counsel had to appear, and intimation was ordered to be made personally on the defender.

10357. Have you any farther suggestions to make?—We experience a difficulty in enforcing Sheriff Court decrees. We can get them indorsed in the different counties; but we sometimes have them against parties who shift from county to county. It may be indorsed at Edinburgh, but before it can be enforced the party has gone to Glasgow, and before it has been indorsed there, he has gone to Aberdeen. That causes great inconvenience and trouble. If these Sheriff Court decrees were indorsed by the clerk of the Court of Session, so as to enable us to execute them all over Scotland, that would be a great advantage.

10358. Mr. Campbell.—Would it not be a simpler plan to give the decree of any Sheriff in Scotland force over the whole of Scotland?—That would still be more simple.

10359. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestion to make?—It is the general opinion in Dumfriesshire that we should have the Small Debt Act and the Sheriff Court Act combined, and that the Small Debt Act should be extended to cases of £50, but that, when they come above £12, we should have the power of moving the Sheriff to remit them to the ordinary roll, if there is any intricacy or difficulty about them. We think that would work well, and that it would shorten the procedure in a great many cases. In all cases where there were decrees in absence, we would in this way be able to get a decree for a few shillings. We only pay 2s. 1d. for a small debt summons; and the officer executes it for 1s., with 6d. a mile if he travels; so that the expenses are generally under 5s.; the ordinary cost with us is 4s. 1d.

10360. Mr. Baxter.—Is your Sheriff-clerk resident?—Yes.

10361. Does he carry on any other business than that of Sheriff-clerk?—He is a member of the firm of Gordon & Whitelaw. He is a banker, and they have private practice as agents.

10362. The Chairman.—Do they practise as agents before the court?—His partner, Mr. Whitelaw, used to practise a little before the court; but I think of late years he has given up court practice altogether.

10363. Mr. Adam.—Does the Sheriff-clerk do his duty in person?—He attends occasionally; but he has a depute who attends the court and does the details of the work.

10364. The Chairman.—Have you any further suggestion?—As the court is at present constituted, I think it would be a great advantage when a proof is ordered, that both parties, before bringing up their witnesses, should be bound to lodge a list of their witnesses with the Sheriff a couple of days before the proof, and to have a meeting with him to arrange the number of witnesses likely to be examined, so as to save the expenses of citing ten or twelve men to attend who cannot possibly be examined.

10365. Upon what elements would that arrangement take place?—We would meet the Sheriff, who should know about the nature of the case beforehand, and he should ask the probable time that each witness's examination would take. We could then show the Sheriff the length of the precognitions, and in that way he would be able to judge and fix whether four or six or ten witnesses could be examined, when we would cite the number accordingly, and save the expense of calling superfluous witnesses.

10366. By superfluous witnesses, you mean witnesses who could not be examined that day?—Yes. There is another point which we think would be of great advantage, viz. that we should be able to bring actions of removing in the Small Debt Court up to £50. At the present moment there is no form of removing—to remove a man from a small house and garden, for instance, except by the agent writing out an authority to an officer to warn him before two witnesses. We have no decree against him, and when twelve o'clock on the term day comes, he says he won't go out, and a summary petition has to be presented to the Sheriff to put him out. That is attended with great inconvenience, because the incoming tenant is there with his furniture to go in, and it may land the proprietor in an action of damages.

10367. Mr. Smythe.—What is the remedy which you propose?—I would propose that we should be able to summon the man in the Small Debt Court to remove. We would get the summons for 2s. 1d., and execute it; and if he does not appear then, we have a decree to turn him out at twelve o'clock on the term day. In regard to farms, and matters of more importance, we raise a summons in the ordinary court, and obtain decree in that way, so as to have it to act upon if necessary.

10368. The Chairman.—Have you anything else to state?—If we had the two appeal judges whom I have suggested, I think the appeals under the Small Debt Act, instead of being to the Justiciary judges, should be to these two appeal judges. I also think that the Justice of Peace Court, and Burgh Court, and Dean of Guild Court, should all be abolished, and that we should have instead a stipendiary magistrate at a small salary, who would conduct the police business of the burgh of Dumfries, and who could take up all cases of nuisance, small cases of battery, and petty cases of theft and trespass over the county: he might even be a Circuit judge.

10369. Do the magistrates of Dumfries hold a Bailie Court for cases of debt?—No. They have the power to do so; but it is in abeyance. I have conducted many cases in the Burgh Court myself; but it has been in abeyance for a number of years.

10370. Does your Dean of Guild exercise jurisdiction?—The Dean of Guild still exercises jurisdiction, and has a Dean of Guild Court; but his powers are partly superseded by the new Police Act, which gives the power to the surveyor of the town to condemn houses.

10371. Mr. Smythe.—What is the duty of the Justice of Peace Court as distinct from the Burgh Court?—They decide all cases up to £5, and they decide cases of nuisance, poaching, and trespass all over the county.

10372. The Chairman.—Do they decide many cases of debt up to £5?—Yes; there is a regular court at Dumfries every week, as well as occasional Circuit courts.

10373. Have they an assessor?—They have a clerk; but it is understood that he is not entitled to assess them. They may ask his opinion occasionally, but they are not bound to follow it. The only other matter I have to mention is, that I think we should have a new and adjusted table of fees.

10374. Do you think they are too high or too low?—Some parts of them are high enough, and others far too low. As an instance, I may state that suppose an agent goes from Dumfries to precognosce a witness a distance of twenty miles, he is merely entitled to 3s. 6d. for doing so. He may spend the whole day on it, but all he can get from the other side, if he gains the case, is 3s. 6d., with his outlay for travelling expenses.

COMMISSION.

VICTORIA, by the grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith:—To our right trusty and well-beloved Councillor DUNCAN, BARON COLONSAY; our right trusty and well-beloved Councillor JOHN INGLIS, Lord Justice-General, and President of the Court of Session in Scotland; our right trusty and well-beloved Councillor Sir WILLIAM PAGE WOOD, Knight, a Judge of the Court of Appeal in Chancery; our right trusty and well-beloved Councillor GEORGE PATTON, Lord Justice-Clerk; our trusty and well-beloved Sir JAMES SHAW WILLES, Knight, one of the Justices of the Court of Common Pleas; our trusty and well-beloved EDWARD FREDERICK MAITLAND, Esquire, one of the Senators of our College of Justice in Scotland; our trusty and well-beloved EDWARD STRATHEARN GORDON, Esquire, our Advocate in Scotland; our trusty and well-beloved Sir EDWARD COLEBROOKE, Baronet; our trusty and well-beloved Sir ROUNDELL PALMER, Knight, one of our Counsel learned in the Law; our trusty and well-beloved JAMES MONCREIFF, Esquire, one of our Counsel learned in the Law, Dean of the Faculty of Advocates in Scotland; our trusty and well-beloved GEORGE SCLATER BOOTH, Esquire, one of the Secretaries of our Treasury; our trusty and well-beloved ANDREW RUTHERFURD CLARK, Esquire, Sheriff of the County of Berwick; our trusty and well-beloved HUGH BARCLAY, Esquire, Sheriff-substitute of the County of Perth; our trusty and well-beloved JAMES CAMPBELL, Esquire, Sheriff-substitute of Edinburgh; our trusty and well-beloved WILLIAM SMYTHE, of Methven, Esquire, Convener of the County of Perth; our trusty and well-beloved ARCHIBALD ORR EWING, Esquire, Dean of Guild of Glasgow; our trusty and well-beloved GEORGE HARRISON, Esquire, Chairman of the Chamber of Commerce, Edinburgh; our trusty and well-beloved JAMES ADAM, Esquire, Advocate; our trusty and well-beloved ALEXANDER BURNS SHAND, Esquire, Advocate; our trusty and well-beloved THOMAS GRAHAM MURRAY, Esquire, Writer to our Signet; our trusty and well-beloved CHARLES MORTON, Esquire, Writer to our Signet; our trusty and well-beloved JAMES WEBSTER, Esquire, Solicitor before the Supreme Courts; our trusty and well-beloved JOHN BOYD BAXTER, Esquire, President of the Council of Procurators in Scotland; and our trusty and well-beloved ADAM PATERSON, Esquire, Writer in Glasgow, greeting:—WHEREAS, We did, by letters-patent, dated second day of October 1868, made and passed under the Seal appointed by the Treaty of Union to be kept and made use of in place of the Great Seal of Scotland, appoint you, the said Duncan, Baron Colonsay, John Inglis, George Patton, Sir Roundell Palmer, Edward Strathearn Gordon, Edward

Frederick Maitland, James Moncreiff, George Sclater Booth, Andrew Rutherfurd Clark, Hugh Barclay, William Smythe of Methven, Archibald Orr Ewing, George Harrison, Thomas Graham Murray, Charles Morton, James Webster, John Boyd Baxter, and Adam Paterson, together with our right trusty and well-beloved Councillor RICHARD BARON WESTBURY, to be our Commissioners to inquire into the Constitution and Jurisdiction of the various Courts for the Administration of Justice—Civil and Criminal—in Scotland; to wit, the Court of Session, the Court of Justiciary, the Commission for Plantation of Kirks and Valuation of Teinds, the Sheriff Courts, Commissary Courts, Burgh Courts, Dean of Guild Courts, Baron and Regality Courts, Police Courts, and Justice of Peace Courts; and also to inquire into the forms of Writs and Pleadings, and the Rules of Procedure, and the Privileges of Agents in the said several Courts; and also to inquire into the system of Review of, and Appeal from, the Decrees, Interlocutors, and Orders issued by these Courts respectively:

Now, know ye that We have revoked and determined, and do by these presents revoke and determine, the said Commission, bearing date the second day of October 1868, and every matter and thing therein contained:

And We, reposing great trust and confidence in your zeal, ability, and discretion, have authorized and appointed, and do by these presents authorize and appoint you, the said Duncan, Baron Colonsay, John Inglis, Sir William Page Wood, George Patton, Sir James Shaw Willes, Edward Frederick Maitland, Edward Strathearn Gordon, Sir Edward Colebrooke, Sir Roundell Palmer, James Moncreiff, George Sclater Booth, Andrew Rutherfurd Clark, Hugh Barclay, James Campbell, William Smythe of Methven, Archibald Orr Ewing, George Harrison, James Adam, Alexander Burns Shand, Thomas Graham Murray, Charles Morton, James Webster, John Boyd Baxter, and Adam Paterson, or any six or more of you, to make diligent and full inquiry into the constitution and jurisdiction of the said several Courts, and into the forms of writs and pleadings, and the rules of procedure, and the privileges of Agents, at present in use and force in the said several Courts, and into the operation and effect of the existing laws and arrangements for distributing and transacting the judicial business of the said Courts respectively, as well in Court as in the various Offices of the Clerks of the said Courts, and other Offices connected with the said several Courts, and into the duties and emoluments of all Officers acting under us before said Courts, and into the system of review of, and appeal from, the Decrees, Interlocutors, and Orders issued by the said Courts respectively, with a view to ascertaining whether any, and what changes and improvements, either by altering the constitution or jurisdiction of, or the forms of writs and pleadings, and procedure, and privileges of Agents in the said Courts, or any of them, or otherwise, may be advantageously made, so as to provide for the more speedy, economical, and satisfactory despatch of the judicial business now transacted by the said Courts: And for the better discovery of the truth in the premises, WE DO, by these presents, GIVE and GRANT to you, or any six or more of you, full power and authority to call before you, or any six or more of you, such Judges and so many of the Officers and Clerks of our said Courts, and all such other persons as you shall judge necessary, by whom you may be informed of the truth in the premises, and to inquire of the premises by all other lawful ways and means whatsoever: AND WE DO HEREBY GIVE and GRANT unto you, or any six or more of you, full power and authority to cause all or any of the Officers and Clerks of any of our said Courts to bring and produce before you, or any six or more of you, all records, orders, books, papers, or other writings belonging to any of our said Courts, or in the custody of any of the Officers within the same: AND our further will and pleasure is, that as soon as the same can conveniently be done (using all diligence), you certify unto us, under the hands and seals of you, or any six or more of you, what you shall have done in the premises: AND We further will and command that this, our Commission, shall continue in full force and virtue, and that you our said Commissioners, or any six or more of you, shall and may from time to time proceed in the execution thereof, and of every matter and thing therein contained, although the same be not continued from time to time by adjournment: And for your assistance in the due execution of this our Commission, we have made choice of our trusty and well-beloved Norman Macpherson, Advocate, Professor of Scots Law in the University of Edinburgh, to be Secretary to this our Commission, and to attend you, whose service and assistance we require you to use from time to time, as occasion may require. IN WITNESS whereof, we have ordered the Seal, appointed by the Treaty of Union to be kept and made use of in place of the Great Seal of Scotland, to be appended hereto. GIVEN at our Court at Saint James's, the nineteenth day of November, in the year One thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight, and in the Thirty-second year of our reign.

LAW COURTS COMMISSION.

MINUTES OF EVIDENCE.

MONDAY, 29th MARCH 1869.

Members Present:—

Lord Colonsay.	James Adam, Esq.
The Lord Advocate.	George Harrison, Esq.
The Lord Justice-Clerk.	A. B. Shand, Esq.
James Campbell, Esq.	James Webster, Esq.

J. B. Baxter, Esq.

The Right Hon. LORD COLONSAY in the Chair.

The Right Hon. Sir John M'Neill, G.C.B., examined.

Right Hon. Sir John M'Neill, G.C.B.

10,375. The Chairman.—You were lately chairman of the Board of Supervision for the Relief of the Poor in Scotland?—Yes; from September 1845 till March 1868.

10,376. What is the constitution of that Board? Of whom does it consist?—It consists of three commissioners named by the Queen, of the Lords Provost of Edinburgh and Glasgow, of the Solicitor-General for Scotland, and of the three Sheriffs of Perth, Renfrew, and Ross.

10,377. The Sheriffs who are members of the Board have a certain pecuniary allowance for the duties they perform?—When the Board was at first constituted, these three Sheriffs had an allowance of £100 a year each, in consideration of their attendance at the Board. Subsequently modifications were made on the arrangements relating to the Sheriffs, and that allowance of £100 a year was consolidated with their salaries as Sheriffs, the obligation still remaining to perform their duties at the Board of Supervision as part of their duties as Sheriffs.

10,378. Have you found that the attendance of the Sheriffs has been as regular as that of any other members of the Board, or more so?—The attendance of every one of the Sheriffs has been far more frequent than that of any other class of members, except the chairman. Relatively to the other members, that has been more marked in the latter years in which I was at the Board, than it was in the earlier years; but throughout, the persons on whom I could most rely to enable me to make a Board at our weekly meetings were the Sheriffs.

10,379. Your meetings were generally weekly?—We had a stated weekly meeting on Thursday in each week, and occasionally meetings either of the Board or of committee on intermediate days; but that occurred rarely.

10,380. Besides the frequency or constancy of their attendance, did you find that the legal character of the Sheriffs was a matter of importance in the constitution of the Board?—Undoubtedly I did. But the assistance I received from them was not confined to the work which they did at the Board. For a considerable time it has been the practice to send round the papers that were to come before the Board at its next meeting to the Sheriffs, especially when they involved any legal considerations. They made their notes upon these papers. I had an opportunity of seeing these before the Board met, and they were very often of the greatest benefit and assistance to me in preparing to propose what I thought might be expedient, to the Board.

10,381. At meetings of the Board did questions involving matters of law occasionally arise, on which the Sheriffs were useful?—I think there could have been no meeting of the Board at which some question involving considerations of law did not occur. In all these, not being a lawyer myself, I relied mainly upon the opinion of the Sheriffs; and it is my duty to say here that I should have unquestionably felt myself very greatly embarrassed, and I should often have had occasion to request that the opinion of counsel might be taken, at some expense to the public, if I had not had the advantage of such men as the Sheriffs of these three counties have hitherto been.

10,382. Do you know, or have you the means of forming an opinion, as to whether the weight of the Sheriffs' opinion had any effect in preventing or discouraging litigations that might otherwise have arisen either between parishes, or between paupers and the Parochial Board?—As between paupers and the Parochial Board I am not aware that they have had that effect; but as between parishes, or two parties in the same parish, there are numberless instances in which an expression of the opinion of the Board has prevented litigation, and put an end to disputes, mainly, as I believe, resting upon the confidence in the legal judgment of the Board, which the parties had in consideration of the presence of the Sheriffs.

10,383. Are we to understand from what you have stated, that you consider that legal element in the constitution of the Board to be one of very great importance,—almost essential?—My own experience would lead me to say that it is essential. I really do not know how the business could have been conducted without the assistance of that legal element in the Board.

10,384. Do you think that the circumstance of the chairman of the Board being himself bred a lawyer would command the same amount of confidence in the Board, as having so many gentlemen connected with the law on it?—I do not. I think that the knowledge that these Sheriffs were men prominent at the bar, as the Sheriffs of these counties have invariably been, had the greatest possible influence in giving weight to the judgments of the Board upon legal questions, and that parties who would not have been satisfied with the opinion of any chairman of the Board, however good a lawyer he might be, finding the opinion of such a body opposed to their view, were prepared to give way.

10,385. You mentioned that the Solicitor-General was a member of the Board. Did you find that his avocations, or whatever might be the cause, permitted his attendance as frequently as that of the Sheriffs?—Not always. Shortly after the formation of the Board, when Mr. Maitland was Solicitor-General, he was very regular in his attendance. So also was Mr. Anderson, when he was Solicitor-General, and Mr. Mure, Mr. Deas, Mr. Craufurd, and others. Our business was new, and they gave the Board all the assistance they could. More lately we have seen less of the Solicitor-General. His other avocations did not permit him to give attendance at the Board.

10,386. Mr. Adam.—By Mr. Maitland you mean Mr. Thomas Maitland?—I mean Mr. Maitland, who afterwards became Lord Dundrennan.

10,387. Can you give us any idea of the number of written opinions which the Sheriffs might give in the course of a year on the papers sent round to them?—I could not venture to do that. I know that in the early part of the Board, one of the things they did was to examine all the cases of lunatics, as a committee, with a view to determine whether they should be ordered to an asylum or not. They had to go through some 3000 or 4000 cases.

10,388. In the course of a year?—They did not accomplish it all within a year; and there were more coming in afterwards.

10,389. The Chairman.—And the opinions you got from them at that stage were not necessarily written opinions?—They were not necessarily written opinions.

10,390. But they were expressed at the Board?—Yes. Latterly we have been in the habit of sending round all the more important papers,—all papers involving any legal questions; and I suppose there are generally six, or eight, or ten parcels of papers of that description sent round weekly, which are to form part of the business of the Board.

10,391. Mr. Baxter.—How many members were a quorum?—Three were a quorum of the Board; but it occasionally happened that I could not get a quorum together, and the Board passed a resolution authorizing a committee, which the Act sanctioned,—a committee of two, which reported to the next meeting of the Board, and in that way the business which it was very important not to delay was carried through. I refer more especially to complaints of inadequate relief, which the Board was always desirous of disposing of with as little delay as possible.

10,392. You spoke of three commissioners appointed by the Queen. Were they all resident in Edinburgh?—No; the first commissioners named by the Queen were Mr. Home Drummond, Sir George Macpherson Grant, and myself. Sir George Macpherson Grant died, and his son, Sir John Macpherson Grant, was appointed in his place. He died, and Mr. Murray of Henderland was appointed in his place. He died, and Sir William Gibson-Craig was appointed in his place. Mr. Drummond survived until recently, and on his death Mr. Smythe of Methven was appointed in his place.

10,393. The Lord Advocate.—Do the Sheriffs attend very regularly?—I would suggest that this Commission should call on the Board of Supervision to furnish (which they can easily do) a tabulated list of the attendance of all the classes of members. I know that the attendance of the Sheriffs has far exceeded that of all other classes of members; and I think the tabulated list will show that it has been most creditable to them, considering how they were otherwise employed.

The Right Hon. LORD COLONSAY in the Chair.

John M'Laren.

John M'Laren, Esq., examined.

10,394. The Chairman.—You are a member of the bar?—I am.

10,395. In what year did you come to the bar?—In 1856.

10,396. You are now Sheriff in Chancery?—I am.

10,397. I believe you have had occasion to turn your attention a good deal to the procedure in the Court of Session?—I had occasion to direct my attention to that, in the first place, from preparing an edition of the statutes relating to procedure; and after that I was employed in 1863 by the Lord Advocate and Solicitor-General (the same gentlemen who hold these offices now), to assist them in preparing a bill to consolidate the Acts relating to procedure, and to introduce certain amendments. I was employed in the following year to prepare another bill on the same subject, and last year I was employed by Lord Advocate Gordon to assist him in preparing the Court of Session Act 1868.

10,398. Have you any suggestions to offer to the Commissioners as to the procedure in the Court of Session?—With the permission of the Commissioners I should wish, in the first place, to give a short statement of what has been already done or attempted in the way of legislative improvement of procedure since 1863. I have made some notes from the bills which I have, and from the Act of last session. Lord Advocate Moncreiff's first bill, besides consolidating the existing procedure, in so far as it was to be retained, and making amendments in detail, had for one of its objects to introduce the English system of pleading in actions for money. Prior to that time some dissatisfaction had been felt with the manner in which actions of that kind were disposed of in our courts. This was attributed to the defective procedure of the courts, more especially in regard to the preparation and adjustment of issues, which often consumed much time, and caused unnecessary expense; and an impression prevailed amongst members of the profession, and I think in the public mind, that actions of that kind were more expeditiously and satisfactorily tried in England under the common law system of procedure. Upon considering what could be done to improve our process, Mr. Moncreiff was desirous that we should embody in a bill a system of pleading based upon the English principle, but to be confined to money actions, which are, I believe, the description of actions forming the chief business of the common law courts of England. Accordingly, the bill which was prepared in 1863, and which was brought into the House of Commons by Mr. Moncreiff, was based on the principle of a division of actions for the purposes of pleading, embracing (1) actions containing only money conclusions, and (2) actions of a different nature. In regard to actions containing money conclusions, provision was made for bringing such actions into court upon a writ of summons similar in form to the writ of summons introduced in England by the Common Law Procedure Act, and it was provided that the pleading in such actions should be of this nature: the pursuer was to furnish a short statement of his ground of action, and the defender was to be obliged to meet that in one of three ways. First, he might demur; or, secondly, he might traverse the statement, that is, deny the whole or a material part of it; or, thirdly, he might meet it by way of confession and avoidance, or, as we should say, by special defence; and in the latter case the pursuer again might either demur, or traverse the defender's statement, or he might meet it by replication. In regard to actions containing conclusions other than pecuniary, the action was to be brought into court by a petition or bill; but in substance this was nothing more than the Scotch form of summons in a new guise. It contained specific conclusions, and the record was to be made up by condescendence and answers, according to the existing practice. I believe that bill was intended to be merely tentative. The Lord Advocate desired to submit it to the profession and the public for their consideration; and, accordingly, the different professional bodies in Edinburgh, and I think in other places, appointed committees to examine the bill and report upon it. I think that, without exception, the reports of all the professional bodies were unfavourable to any radical change in our system of pleading—I mean to the introduction of the issuable or English common law system of pleading; and I believe the Lord Advocate, in consequence of the view taken by the profession, abandoned his intention of proceeding with that part of the bill, and the matter has not since been brought forward in Parliament, or I think in any way. I may just state, before leaving that subject, that my own opinion is in accordance with what I understand to be the general opinion of the profession, that it is undesirable, where a different system of pleading has so long prevailed, to introduce such a radical change. It would be very difficult, I think, to accustom the profession to a new form of pleading, and I think that in practice our system of pleading is found to be well adapted to the trial of all descriptions of actions. Passing from that part of the measure of 1863, it proposed a number of special amendments in the law of procedure, the greater part of which have been embodied in the Court of Session Act of 1868. They were generally approved of, and were adopted by Lord Advocate Gordon in preparing his measure. I have made a note of some of the principal points, and they are as follows: The power of stating a question of law in the form of a special case, for the opinion of the court, in place of condescendence and defences; next, the power given to the court, of amending the pleadings at any stage in the proceedings. In the bill of 1863 that power was to be exercised upon payment of such costs, not exceeding the costs of the discussion, as to the court might seem fit; under the Act of last session the power in relation to costs is absolute. I would suggest, as a further amendment, that the costs in such cases should be limited to the costs of the day, or of the particular discussion at which the amendment is allowed.

10,399. Mr. Webster.—What is your reason for that?—I think that it is too severe a penalty in any case, to subject the party making an amendment, to the whole costs of the action, which I know is sometimes done in administering this provision of the Act of last session; and practically, if that were to be adopted as the rule, the right of amendment is nullified, because parties won't amend under such conditions.

10,400. But does it give the opposite party fair protection to give him only the costs of the day? Should he not get at least all the costs that are rendered abortive, or created by the amendment?—I have great difficulty in conceiving a case where the party would not be sufficiently compensated for the inconvenience to which he had been put, by being allowed the expenses of the discussion.

10,401. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—You say it is not fair to give the whole costs of the action. Has that been done in any instance to your knowledge?—In one instance. It was done in a case in which I was engaged.

10,402. But not in any other case so far as you know?—Not so far as I know.

10,403. Mr. Baxter.—Would it not depend very much upon the nature of the amendment, whether it should be confined to the costs of the day, or how far it should go?—Where it was held that the whole of the litigation had been thrown away, and that therefore the whole of the expenses of the litigation had been needlessly incurred, I think the proper course would be to dismiss the action, and allow a new one to be brought.

10,404. Mr. Webster.—But it might be the defender who wants to amend?—There might be a case where he had been put to greater expense than the expense of the discussion.

10,405. Mr. Baxter.—Might it not be left safely to the discretion of the court what sum of expenses to give, considering the nature of the amendment, and the time at which it was made?—I think it might; but in that case there should be a regulation by Act of Sederunt, or in some other way the principle should be recognised, that in general the expenses awarded should be limited to the expenses of the day. There might be exceptional cases.

10,406. The Chairman.—At present I believe it is entirely in the discretion of the court?—Yes.

10,407. If there is evil arising from it, probably that may lead to a correction by the court itself of the practice of giving large expenses?—I think so. I think the tendency of the opinion of the court now is not to give large expenses.—The next amendment proposed in the bill of 1863, and carried out by the Act of last session, was the power of taking a verdict subject to the opinion of the court upon a reserved point. Then there were the provisions for shortening bills of exceptions, and giving facilities for raising questions of law upon a motion for a new trial; the power of substituting a special case for a special verdict; the power to conjoin a prayer for specific performance, with a prayer for interdict; the prohibition of revised papers, except upon special allowance by the judge; a provision that in actions of multiplepoinding the record is to be closed on the original papers, and that the parties are not to answer each other's papers, except on special cause shown to the judge; the provision for taking the evidence before the Lord Ordinary in person, with the assistance of a shorthand writer,—that was carried into effect by the Evidence Act, and amended by the Act of last session; the provision for obviating objections to deeds arising upon the stamp laws; provisions enabling actions to be wakened and transferred against new parties by minute, in lieu of actions of wakening and transference.

10,408. Mr. Webster.—There have been no summonses of that kind since the Court of Session Act of 1850?—The Act of 1850 enabled actions to be wakened by minute, and the Act of 1868 enables them to be transferred as well as wakened, the two things often requiring to be done at the same time. Then it was proposed in the bill of 1863, and carried out in the Act of last session, that a summary form of appeal from inferior courts should be substituted for the process of advocation. By these enactments the means of review of judgments of the inferior courts was materially simplified,—I think simplified as much as it is possible to simplify such proceedings, and it was provided that an appeal should bring up the whole cause as between all the parties. Under the old practice each party must have appealed against so much of the proceedings as he complained of. Then power is now given to four of the Lords Ordinary to sit as a court for hearing appeals, when the state of the business in the Inner House is such as to render their assistance necessary.

10,409. Is that a power which has been found practically to obstruct or to facilitate the work of the court?—It is very difficult to give an opinion on that point. I think the exercise of the power has had a very beneficial effect in reducing the rolls of the Divisions. At the commencement of the last session I think they were nearly a year in arrear, and now the arrears have been entirely wrought off. On the other hand, it has thrown the Outer House business back a little; but the Lords Ordinary, I think, are rapidly making up the arrears, and in the course of next session there will probably be no arrears in any branch of the court.

10,410. The Chairman.—Does it occur to you that the working off of the arrears that existed last year will render the resort to that court of four Lords Ordinary less frequent than was necessary in order to get the better of the arrear?—I think so. I think it is an entirely exceptional arrangement, and there is every probability that when the arrears of the Divisions are once brought down, the judges will be able to keep pace with the business coming into their courts.

10,411. Mr. Webster.—The clearing off of arrears of business in the Inner House has, to the extent of the cases disposed of by the court of Lords Ordinary, been their work; but has it not also partly arisen from this, that there has practically no business come from the Outer House to the Inner House during this session?—I believe much less business has come from the Outer House to the Inner House. During the times when the Lords Ordinary were engaged in that court, of course there were no decisions in the Outer House, and consequently no appeals from such decisions. I am aware, too, that some of the Lords Ordinary had great difficulty in disposing of their debate rolls during the last session; but I think that has arisen more from a defect in the arrangement of the business than from their being engaged during part of the time in the Court of Appeal. The other legislative amendments which I have noted are,—and one of them is very important,—viz. the provision of the Act of last session enabling a party to reclaim or appeal to the Division, after the whole cause has been decided in the Outer House, and thereby to bring all the previous interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary under review. Under the old process it was necessary, if you wished to appeal against the interlocutor of a Lord Ordinary, to appeal within a limited time,—never in any case exceeding twenty-one days. If an appeal was not taken at the time, that interlocutor became final; and if it were necessary, in order to do justice upon the merits, to review that interlocutor, it could not be done at the end of the case; consequently parties were very often obliged to reclaim more than once, when, if they had had the power which they now have, they would have been content to wait till the whole cause had been decided, before going to the Division. Very frequently there were two successive reclaiming notes, under the old system. I don't think there were often more than two. Then there is a provision enabling the judge to sit in vacation to grant decrees in absence, and to dispose of motions. I think that is a great convenience to the public, particularly the power of obtaining decrees in absence in vacation. In addition to those provisions, which were all contained in Lord Advocate Moncreiff's bill, there are many other useful provisions in the Act of last session, among which I may mention the extension of the time during which the court is to sit, enabling them to get through a greater amount of business; the regulation of inhibitions; the clause allowing summonses to be served by sheriff-officers in districts where there are no messengers-at-arms; the simplification of the mode of bringing actions into court, and obtaining decree in absence without the intervention of counsel; the giving finality to decrees in absence where the defender has been personally served, and has been charged. I would suggest that that power might be extended, and that the decree should be final if he has either been personally served or personally charged,—so that where within the proceedings there is evidence of the action having been brought to the notice of the defender, the decree against him should be final.

10,412. Within what period?—Within a very short time. I would allow a short time, within which the decree might be brought under review by suspension—not longer than is necessary for that purpose.

10,413. Would you make any exceptions for cases of parties under age or incapacitated?—In the case of money actions, to which the clause is at present limited, I would not make that exception. In regard to actions of declarator, the provision of the statute is that they shall be final in twenty years, and I would not propose to make any change on that. Then the statute provides for simplifying the mode of making up a record, which I think is a great improvement. Under the old form, the revisal of pleadings was the rule, and the closing upon summons and defences the exception. In a very large number of cases an order to revise was taken as of course, which necessitated the re-writing of the papers, with such additions as were thought necessary, and that involved a considerable delay in the progress of the cause; there was then a further adjustment by marginal addition, which was competent to each party. Under the Act of last session, the adjustment is made by marginal addition on the original papers, and revised papers are prohibited, excepting upon special cause shown to the Lord Ordinary. In practice, I believe revised papers have been very rarely allowed—almost in no case; and it is found that the case of the parties can be stated quite satisfactorily upon the original papers, with the power of amendment by marginal addition.

10,414. Is there not a want of opportunity given to the pursuer to admit statements in the defence, according to the present practice?—There is not the same facility given for admitting such statements.

10,415. Is there any opportunity?—Perhaps it would require legislative provision or regulation by the court, to enable that to be done by marginal addition. I think it could be quite easily done in that way. But as a general rule, I don't think much is gained by these admissions. Admissions are generally given subject to qualifications which prevent the opposite party from getting the benefit of them. While on the subject of admissions, I may suggest that a provision contained in the Common Law Procedure Act might be advantageously introduced into our practice; which is, the enabling either party, before the trial of the case, to tender a note of admissions which he requires the other party to make. In the event of the facts stated not being admitted, the party asking for the admission would then be entitled to the expense of proving them, irrespective of the result of the trial. There is a similar provision in regard to the production and admission of documents, which I think deserving of consideration.

10,416. The Chairman.—That is, to give by legislation an authority to do that which used to be not uncommon in practice, in jury trials?—Yes.

10,417. The one party asked the other for certain admissions, and if he refused them, and there was expense incurred in proving them, that was considered in dealing with the expenses?—Yes; and I think either party might be entitled to call on the other party to produce documents in his possession, without the intervention of the court; and in the event of his refusing to do so, and a diligence being granted, he should be subjected to the expense of the diligence.

10,418. Mr. Webster.—If documents were asked for which parties were not bound to give,—such as confidential documents,—what would be the remedy?—If they were confidential, they would not be recovered under the commission, and in that case the party would not be subjected to the expense; on the contrary, he ought to recover his expenses. In short, I think the party should consider the character of the documents, and if there is no substantial reason for refusing them, he should produce them without a diligence.

10,419. That is as between the two parties to the action?—Yes. As regards documents in the hands of third parties, of course there is no way of getting at these except by diligence. Taking the new clauses in the Act of 1868 in their order, I should wish to make a remark upon sec. 28, which regulates the procedure, or rather directs the Lord Ordinary how to regulate the procedure, after the record is closed. It appears to me that the Lord Ordinary is too much tied down by this clause to a series of alternatives, and that it would be better that it should be left entirely to his discretion how to deal with the cause after the record is closed, subject to review by the Inner House. In the introductory part of the section it is provided that if the parties shall not agree to renounce farther probation, the Lord Ordinary shall appoint the cause to be debated summarily at the end of the motion roll on a day to be then fixed; and according to the result of that debate, certain things may be done. Prior to the passing of the Act of 1868, this matter was regulated by an Act of Sederunt, passed, I think, very recently; and under that Act of Sederunt, at the time the record was closed, the parties were to state to the judge what view they took of the case—whether it required probation or not; and the Lord Ordinary was empowered to dispose of the matter of procedure then and there, but with power to adjourn to a day to be named. This provision was found to work very well in practice. Under the new Act the Lord Ordinary must send every case to a summary debate roll,—at least it has been so interpreted, and a great part of the Lord Ordinaries' time is taken up in hearing causes summarily under this section. These discussions, I think, in the majority of the cases, are entirely thrown away; they just end in the case being remitted to proof.

10,420. And these discussions are always the cause of a great deal of expense as well as a good deal of delay?—Yes; there is the expense of the attendance of counsel and agents at the debate, which might be saved, and there is often a considerable delay in hearing those cases.

10,421. Mr. Baxter.—I suppose parties are not very willing to renounce probation generally?—No. I think counsel are generally very averse to sign a minute renouncing probation until a cause has been heard; and for this reason, that the question of proof or no proof depends a good deal upon the view that may be taken of the legal bearings of the case by the judge; and until they have had an opportunity of being heard before the court, they don't feel entitled to renounce probation even upon points which may appear to them to be immaterial, but which the court may think to be material.

10,422. Supposing a party does not renounce probation, is the case sent to proof as a matter of course?—If the party does not renounce probation, it is sent to the summary debate roll, and upon the case being explained, the Judge then, if he thinks proper, appoints the case either to be tried by jury, or before himself.

10,423. Mr. Webster.—Counsel are very often agreed as to what the course should be after the record is closed, viz. that there should be a proof or a jury trial; so that practically the summary debate roll is a useless procedure, excepting in a very few cases?—I think so. I would suggest that the provisions of the Act of Sederunt should be re-enacted, and that if the counsel are agreed that a proof is necessary, an order for proof should be pronounced at the closing of the record. If not, the parties should then debate the case in the ordinary debate roll; and I think it is time enough to renounce probation at the close of the debate, and before the case is taken to avizandum. If the Lord Ordinary points out to the parties that there are matters requiring proof, the case may then be dealt with in that way.

10,424. The Chairman.—Do you refer to the Act of Sederunt of 1866?—Yes. Reverting to the Court of Session Act, 1868, there is a provision, in section 31, that the motion rolls of the Lords Ordinary should in the first place be called before the depute-clerks of Session, and in the case of such motions being opposed, there is a power to adjourn them to special motion days, not exceeding two a week, when they shall be heard and disposed of by the Lords Ordinary. That clause was introduced with the view of endeavouring to save some part of the time that is consumed in making motions; but I believe that in practice it has not been found to effect any material saving of time, because the motions that are unopposed don't occupy much time, and they are generally made in the intervals between the opposed motions, when the bar is vacant. It appears to me, however, that much time might be saved,—though this is rather a matter to be regulated by Act of Sederunt,—if each Lord Ordinary had only one, or at most two motion days a week, because when the motion roll is long, I think less time is occupied in the discussion of each case. Under the present system, from one to two hours are occupied every day during the greater part of the session in the discussion of motions, and the time for hearing debates is very much abridged by the operation of the present system.

10,425. Mr. Webster.—You propose to have only one or two motion days a week. Is not that part of the business that often requires very great rapidity? Are there not commissions to examine witnesses who are dying, or persons who are going abroad, and other matters of urgency which frequently occur in the course of a case?—I think those cases in which the saving of a day is material are of rare occurrence, and might be sufficiently provided for by the power of applying to the judge at chambers. That machinery would not often be put in operation; but where every day is a motion day, the parties put down the motions on any day that may be convenient for themselves. If there were only two regular motion days, I believe that in practice no inconvenience would be felt.

10,426. Is not a great part of the two hours that you allude to as being spent on the motion roll, occupied really in dealing with the fragmentary parts of cases that have to be disposed of, and where the wish is to have them disposed of without the formality of a debate in the debate roll?—I think that is the case; but still I think there would be greater economy in the disposal of the business by arranging it so that motions should be taken on one day and debates on another. For example, I think that if debates were begun at ten o'clock, and proceeded with continuously till three, they would be got through much faster than by being taken up later in the day and adjourned, as they frequently are at present.

10,427. Would you propose to abolish the calling of cases before the depute-clerks of court?—I am not able to speak to that more definitely than I have done, as counsel are not engaged in these motions; but I understand in practice it is not found to save much time.—A very important part of the changes which have been effected in our procedure relates to the mode of taking proof. That is regulated by the Evidence Act, and by sections 32 and 33 of the Act of last session. The nature of the provisions of these statutes is, that the Lord Ordinary appoints the proof to be taken before himself, without the assistance of a jury; the evidence is taken down in shorthand, and is summed up by one counsel on each side at the conclusion of the proof, as in the case of a jury trial. The Lord Ordinary then issues an interlocutor containing specific findings in fact and law, with a note of his opinion; and his judgment is subject to review by the court on the merits of the case. I believe there was a difference of opinion in the profession at the time when these provisions were mooted, as to whether it was a right thing that the Lord Ordinary's judgment upon matter of fact should be subject to review. In the case of a jury trial, the court don't interfere with the verdict of the jury, excepting in so far as it proceeds upon matter of law under the direction of the judge, or unless it be clearly against the weight of the evidence. Now, I cannot contemplate a court setting aside the judgment of a judge of the same jurisdiction, upon the ground that his judgment is clearly against the weight of the evidence. I think that is not a case requiring to be provided for; but the power which the court actually has is larger; it is that of forming an opinion for itself upon the evidence, independently of the opinion of the Lord Ordinary. On the other hand, if the means of review were expressly confined to a power of reviewing the Lord Ordinary's findings in point of law, the difficulty is, that there may be matter of law involved in the findings in fact, which the court, in consequence of such a restriction, would not be able to reach; and I know that that difficulty was experienced in attempting to bring under review judgments of the Lord Ordinary pronounced under the Court of Session Act, 1850. Under that Act his judgment was only appealable upon his findings in point of law. If it be necessary to make any change on this part of our procedure, I would suggest that while the whole proof should be brought up to the court for the purpose of enabling it to review the Lord Ordinary's judgment, his judgment should be reviewable only in so far as it appears to the court to proceed upon matter of law. I think in practice the Act has been so interpreted, and I don't know if there is any case in which the court has reversed a judgment of the Lord Ordinary expressly upon error in matter of fact.

10,428. There are some, but not many such cases?—Well, if review on the facts were excluded by statute or Act of Sederunt, I think it would diminish the number of reclaiming notes on proofs, which are necessarily very expensive, involving the printing of a large mass of evidence, oral and documentary.

10,429. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Do you know that the cases which were tried before the Lord Ordinary, at the time when his findings on fact were final, were very frequently brought under review?—I am not able to answer that question; but the number of such trials was very much smaller.

10,430. Was not a considerable degree of dissatisfaction expressed at the system which precluded the court from looking at the facts otherwise than in the view that the Lord Ordinary had taken of them?—I think there was dissatisfaction.

10,431. When a case is brought under review on matters of fact and law, and giving effect to the feeling that the Lord Ordinary has seen the witnesses, do you not think it is right that the court should have the power of setting right the facts, if they are clear upon them?—I think that probably the object which I had in view in my former answer would be accomplished if the Divisions of the court, in disposing of such cases, gave it clearly to be understood that they were not inclined to entertain reclaiming notes merely upon matters of fact; and I think this to a considerable extent has been done, and that there are not so many reclaiming notes against judgments of Lords Ordinary on proofs as there were when the Evidence Act first came into operation.

10,432. The Chairman.—In cases of trial by jury, the tribunal for disposing of the fact is the jury, but their verdict is reviewed by the court if they think it is against the weight of evidence, and although concurrence with them of the judge who tried the case is a most material element for them in the disposal of it, it is not conclusive. There you have an instance of a court reviewing the opinion of the jury, in accordance with that of the judge of co-ordinate jurisdiction, with a power of setting aside what the jury has done?—No doubt there are great difficulties in interfering with the general power of review of the Inner House. I would venture, however, to express a decided opinion, that when a Division of the court disposes of a case of this kind, it should pronounce findings of fact and law in the same manner as in the case of advocations, and that the findings of the Division upon matter of fact should not be subject to appeal to the House of Lords.

10,433. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Has not that been so in point of practice?—I believe there is no statutory restriction. I know that appeals have been taken to the House of Lords in such cases, and some are in dependence at present.

10,434. There has been a difficulty experienced, I believe, in the case where a judge is desirous of taking down the proof himself, in order to save expense to the parties, instead of employing a shorthand writer, arising from the fact that the judge is compelled to read over to the witness his notes taken at the time. Is there any necessity for that being continued?—I think not. I believe that some of the judges would prefer to take the notes in their own hand, and the judge should have the discretion of doing so, in which case I think the evidence should be noted as in the case of a jury trial. The system of taking proofs by the judge, with the aid of a shorthand writer, has worked well, and has given satisfaction to the bar. Upon this subject another suggestion has occurred to me, which is, that it would be desirable that the appointment of the shorthand writer should be in the power either of the court or of the judge taking the evidence. At present the practice is that any person brought up by the agents is accepted; and I believe that some of the judges have complained that the responsibility is thrown upon them of certifying notes of evidence taken by persons who are not selected by themselves, and for whose notes they are not truly responsible.

10,435. Some judges have refused, I understand, to have any shorthand writer except one of their own appointment. Is that not so?—Yes.

10,436. The Chairman.—That goes to confirm your suggestion?—Yes. But it appears to me that it is desirable that in every case the appointment should rest either with the court as a body, or with the judge, because the office is a very responsible one; it is similar to that of a commissioner taking proof; the judge has not the means of checking at the time what is taken down, and the party occupying that position should, I think, be entirely independent of the agents.—Then the Act of last session makes several changes in the mode of selecting and summoning juries. Juries now are to consist in every case of eight common and four special jurors. I should hope that would be found an improvement, as securing a certain number of intelligent men on the jury. Under the former practice I think it was entirely a matter of chance what proportion of special jurors there might be on a jury summoned and balloted for.

10,437. Mr. Webster.—And there was no certainty that any one of the special jurors would be on the jury trying the cause?—No.

10,438. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—With reference to special juries, has your attention been called to the way in which they are struck at present?—Yes. I know that was under the consideration of Lord Advocate Gordon at the time of preparing his bill; but I think he had a difficulty in devising a more convenient method, while aware of the inconvenience and expense caused by the present mode of striking the jury.

10,439. Besides the inconvenience and expense, are there not other objections to the present system, in having the jury fixed a very considerable time before the time of trial?—I believe so. On the other hand, it was thought that there was a hardship in compelling the attendance of a large number of special jurymen, many of whom might be men whose time was valuable, and who might have to be summoned from a distance merely to be balloted for, without any certainty that their services would really be required.

10,440. Supposing that they were to be balloted for without their presence, instead of being struck out by objection, would that not be an improvement?—The names of the jurors being put into a box and balloted for according to the present system, without requiring their presence?

10,441. With a few names in addition, to guard against non-attendance?—Yes; I think that would be an improvement. Then the statute provides for the jurors, in cases tried on Circuit, being taken from the criminal assize, and it enables agents practising in the Circuit town to practise as agents at such trials.

10,442. With regard to the provision for trials at Circuit, I suppose we may anticipate an increase of the number of such trials, in consequence of the facility given to agents there to conduct them?—I think so.

10,443. Would it not be desirable to make provision for the attendance of judges other than the judges at Circuit, by which the civil and criminal business should be kept separate?—I have not considered that point; but as there are two judges attending each Circuit, perhaps the object might be accomplished if one of them was to take the criminal business, and the other to take the civil business, which, I understand, is the practice at the English assizes. My impression is, that there is a provision to that effect in the statute.

10,444. In Glasgow it was found necessary to have two judges sitting in separate courts at the same time for criminal cases?—Therefore my suggestion would not meet the case of Glasgow, where, probably, it would be most important to have jury trials.

10,445. The Chairman.—And in other towns another court-room would probably have to be built?—Yes. There is a provision, in section 46, that such trials may proceed at the same time with the sittings of the Circuit Court of Justiciary; and that, notwithstanding the provisions herein contained, it shall be competent for any judge of the Court of Session to preside at the trial of any civil cause which may fall to be tried during the sittings of any Circuit Court of Justiciary.

10,446. Mr. Webster.—Unless some provision of that kind were made, there would be great inconvenience, I presume, in the attendance of counsel and witnesses waiting on for the finishing of the criminal business, before the civil trials commenced?—I think so; and that inconvenience has been the chief reason why civil cases have not been tried at Circuit.

10,447. And the cost of taking a staff of counsel there?—Yes. At the same time, I may say on this point, that Scotland, being a much smaller country than England, and the number of jury trials being very small in proportion to the whole number of cases, I don't think the introduction of the system of trying cases at Circuit a point of very great importance. I think also that the power of bringing up witnesses by railway, which we have in modern times, has, to a considerable extent, lessened the inconvenience that would result from bringing the witnesses to Edinburgh. Then, continuing the analysis of the provisions of the Act of last session, there is a provision that in case of an equal division of opinion in the court on any motion for a new trial, the verdict shall not be set aside. Under Mr. Moncreiff's bill it was proposed that in all cases in which the court were equally divided the previous judgment should stand; but I understand the judges of the Inner House, who are probably better informed on that matter than persons outside, think that change not desirable, and that it is better there should be a re-hearing where the difference arises not upon the import of a verdict, but on a question of law coming before them on a reclaiming note; and in practice there are not many re-hearings in consequence of difference of opinion. Then there is the power, at any stage in an action, of stating a special case for the opinion of one of the Divisions of the court. The clause giving this power is an improvement on the clause proposed in Mr. Moncreiff's bill, and I believe has given great satisfaction. A number of cases have been tried during last winter session under the powers of that clause, and the expense is very much less than it was under the old system. It has been found particularly beneficial in cases which used to be tried under an action of multiplepoinding,—questions of disputed succession where there are a great many parties. Under the old form, each party, or at least each group of parties, having separate interests, lodged a condescendence and claim: every claimant answered the claim of every other claimant in a revised paper, and sometimes there were adjusted revised papers; that is, three papers on each side, which had to be copied. Then the record had to be printed, often a very voluminous document, with an appendix of deeds; and there was an argument, first before the Lord Ordinary, and then before the Inner House. Under the provision of section 63, the question or questions may often be stated very shortly in a special case; that goes at once to a Division of the court; and I think that, besides the saving of expense, the parties, and perhaps the judges also, are enabled more clearly to see what the questions are that are brought before them, than under the old system of claims.

10,448. You can now go at once to the court with a special case, without any previous summons?—Yes, that is so; and I have known cases where the parties have begun by an action, and have lodged claims, and these have been superseded by a special case, and even then there has been a considerable saving of expense.

10,449. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Is there any reason why a party who comes before the court with a special case should have a right to have his case taken up and disposed of in the summar roll?—I think not. I should humbly venture to express my disapproval of any statutory provision requiring certain classes of cases to be disposed of in preference to others. The result often is, that cases of very little importance get precedence, while cases involving large sums of money or important questions of right are delayed, to the inconvenience of the public. Then there are the provisions in sections 81 to 88 inclusive, relating to actions of accounting, the object of which is to give an accountant, to whom the case may be referred, greater powers in regard to compelling the attendance of parties, and the recovery of documents, and also to place him in direct communication with the judge. I believe that some of the judges, before this Act was passed, felt a difficulty in giving assistance to accountants to whom cases were remitted, and thought that they would be able to dispose of such cases more rapidly if they were in a position to take the accountant along with them, to receive assistance from him in making the necessary calculations, and at the same time to give him indications as to the principles upon which he ought to proceed. I am not aware, however, whether there has been time to test the value of this provision. The number of such cases is of course comparatively limited, and the Act has not been long in operation.

10,450. Do you not consider that it would be an advantage to have a chief clerk or public official accountant?—Does your Lordship mean that the duties performed by an accountant under the present system should be performed by a chief clerk?

10,451. An official salaried party in constant communication with the judge?—I should be favourable to the appointment of such an officer, upon the general ground that I don't think it right to throw the expense of the decision of a cause upon the parties. Under the present system the accountant is entitled to a fee from the parties, which is often very large, because the investigations in such cases occupy a great deal of time. I see no reason why that charge should be borne by the parties in cases of accounting, any more than the salaries of the judges in other cases should be raised by fees levied from the parties. I think the whole expense of the proper judicial procedure ought to be borne by the public. The chief difficulty in substituting a chief clerk for an accountant acting under a remit, arises from the fluctuating character of the business. Some years there might be very little for such an officer to do, and at other times he would not be able to overtake the business. But it occurs to me that in very heavy cases, such as that of the Western Bank, the parties would be willing to be at the expense of providing assistants, who should perform the calculations under the superintendence of the chief clerk. It has often occurred to me that there is a defect in the machinery of the Court of Session, in the court not having any officers to whom it can depute routine duties of this description. Not only in accountings, but in many other cases, there are matters requiring to be cleared up by inquiry, and yet which are not well fitted either for jury trial, or for a formal proof before the Lord Ordinary. These could be more expeditiously and satisfactorily disposed of by a remit to a chief clerk. I understand that in the Court of Chancery, in that department of its business connected with the distribution of estates and successions, a great deal of assistance is given to the judges by the chief clerks, who call the agents before them, and ascertain in any way they think proper the facts material to the decision of the case, which they then embody in a short certificate; and if the parties are dissatisfied, they may appeal to the judge to vary the findings in the certificate, and he may then direct proof to be taken if necessary. I think the services of an official of that description would be very useful, and would save time. I think these are all the material changes which have been introduced into the procedure by the Act of last session, and it appears to me that our forms of process have been very materially improved by that Act.

10,452. Mr. Webster.—Another improvement was allowing the Lords Ordinary to settle issues?—Yes.

10,453. The Chairman.—Have you any further suggestion to make?—I have one or two. I wish, in the first place, to state to the Commission a reason why I think it unnecessary that any material change should be made on the forms of pleading. I adverted to that before, but it is one of the points specially mentioned in the memorandum sent me by the secretary of the Commission. The proportion of cases coming into the Court of Session involving merely pecuniary conclusions is very small; and it is only to pecuniary actions that the form of issuable pleading has been applied in England and in those countries which have adopted the English form of procedure. Now the great proportion of actions involving only a pecuniary demand are brought in the Sheriff Courts in Scotland. I looked over the last volume of Macpherson's Court of Session Reports, with the view of seeing what proportion these cases bear to the general mass of litigation, and I find there are 193 cases reported: of those there are 33 originating in summonses containing only petitory conclusions; but out of these 33 there are at least 10 cases involving equitable considerations, which would require something more than a bare statement of the ground of action, and which don't appear to be well adapted for the form of issuable pleading, leaving only 23 cases of money claims, such as would be disposed of by the common law courts of England under their form of process. That is in the proportion of one-eighth of the whole business. I think there is no reason to suppose that the proportion of such cases in the whole business of our court would be different from the proportion which I have found in the reported cases, because the reported cases are just an average of all the cases; and I don't think it is necessary to make such a great change for the sake of disposing, in a way that may be thought a little more convenient, of one-eighth of the business; much the more important class of business being that which is best disposed of under a detailed statement of the ground of action, and a detailed defence. If the system of issuable pleading is to be introduced at all, I think it would be more appropriately introduced into the Sheriff Court practice than into that of the Court of Session. Then I think the objection which was formerly made to our pleadings as being too diffuse cannot fairly be made now. I think there is a great improvement in that respect, and no person now has any interest in long pleadings. Under the former system there were a great many copies of pleadings made. There was the original paper, and the revised paper, and generally five manuscript copies for debate in the Outer House—two for the counsel on each side, and one for the Lord Ordinary. Now, there are only the original pleadings, and they are printed at once. Besides, I think that the power of amendment given by the recent statute has enabled parties to state their case shortly, because they are no longer under any apprehension that their statements may be found irrelevant for want of specification of details. That may now be supplied by amendment at any stage; and in practice the pleadings in the Court of Session are very much shorter and less prolix than those of the Court of Chancery, judging from the specimens of Chancery proceedings which I have seen, where the form of record is similar to our own. Next, with regard to debates upon relevancy before proof, it has occurred to me that the best mode of dealing with that question is, that either party should be entitled to a debate on the relevancy, upon condition of paying the expenses if he is unsuccessful in having the pleading of the other party found to be irrelevant.

10,454. Mr. Webster.—Do you think that would be a sufficient protection against undue delay?—There might be cases where a party would be willing to incur the expense merely to have a large claim staved off, but in most cases I think it would be a protection. I think counsel and agents are always very unwilling to enter upon any incidental discussion where they believe that an award of expenses will be given against them, although they might be willing to risk it if the expenses were to be dealt with as part of the general expenses of the cause. They are afraid of giving dissatisfaction to their clients. With regard to the general arrangement of the business of the court, it has occurred to me that it would be an improvement if the Lords Ordinary took a roll of proofs and a roll of debates alternately—that is to say, that for one week, or a longer period, they should hear nothing but proofs, taking them up one after another as they do at sittings in vacation, and then that the debates should be allowed to proceed continuously for another period. Under the operation of the Act of last session, there is very great inconvenience felt by the profession from the hearing of debates in the Outer House. It consists with my knowledge that the same cases which were put out for debate before one of the Lords Ordinary in the week commencing 15th October, are still in the roll undisposed of.

10,455. Mr. Baxter.—Not heard?—Not heard.

10,456. What is the cause of that?—And the counsel who are instructed in these debates must attend every day from 10 till 3, upon the chance of one of them being called. The cause of that is, that Lord Manor was occupied fully with summary petition business and Bill Chamber business, and with the taking of proofs; and from the way in which the business is arranged, these matters get precedence of debates. Everything else has precedence of debates; and consequently where the judge has more business than he can dispose of, the debate roll is never heard. The roll which was formerly before Lord Manor has since been transferred to Lord Mure.

10,457. Might the case which was set down on 15th October have come on any day since then?—On any day except the blank day of the Lord Ordinary.

10,458. Then it might have come on suddenly?—Yes, it might have come on upon any one of four days a week during the whole of the winter session. Now I think that inconvenience would be completely remedied by having certain weeks appropriated to debates and others to proofs; if the business were in arrear, the arrear would then be shared equally by the different descriptions of business instead of being all thrown on debates. Many of the cases sent to the debate roll are cases of very great importance as regards their pecuniary value. Then a great deal of the Lord Ordinary's time is now taken up by hearing proofs, and I believe that some of their Lordships have felt that an undue tax upon their time. I think something might be done to relieve them, by appointing examiners or permanent commissioners, who should undertake part of this work. The Lord Ordinary, in reading the records at the time when they are declared closed, would select those cases which he thought most suitable to try personally; and in other cases which he might think suitable for trial by commission, the proof would be taken by a permanent commissioner and reported to the judge. I would suggest this as preferable to restoring the old form of granting commissions to members of the bar, which was found to work badly, for this reason, that the commissioner, not sitting regularly from day to day, was generally willing to accommodate the parties, and to take up the cases at such times as might be convenient for the counsel and agents. They were often taken up at two o'clock in the afternoon, when the Outer House business was over, and heard in fragments extending over weeks and sometimes months. If these proofs were taken by a salaried commissioner, who should sit during the same hours as the court, the parties would require to arrange to take in counsel who were able to attend, and the proofs would go on continuously just as they now do before the Lords Ordinary. Then they would not have to pay the commissioner; and under such a system I think there are a great many cases in which the proof might quite well be taken by a gentleman of less position, and who should be less highly paid than a judge of the Court of Session.

10,459. The Chairman.—There was something analogous to that in regard to consistorial cases at one time. After the abolition of the Commissary Court there were certain Sheriffs nominated to take proofs in consistorial cases, and they did so for several years?—I think that was abolished by the Conjugal Rights Act, which introduced the system of the judge taking the proof, with the assistance of a shorthand writer.

10,460. But it is a precedent for what you suggest?—Yes; only the plan which I suggest might be expected to work better, because these Sheriffs were practising advocates, and could not necessarily give regular attendance.

10,461. You would have these examiners paid so as to remunerate them for giving their whole time to it?—Yes, I think so. Another point which suggests itself to me, is the consolidation of the statutes relating to procedure. Probably that would be best postponed until an Act were passed embodying the recommendations of the Commissioners, and then the whole matter should be consolidated. I think a Consolidation Act should not contain any new matter, and then it is passed without opposition, upon the responsibility of the member of Government introducing it. There is another point which I would like to mention, but I am not sure whether it falls within the scope of the Commission. I think it desirable that something should be done which would offer an inducement to counsel in leading practice to accept seats on the bench. For several years past, it is quite well known, there has been a difficulty in inducing men in the highest walk of practice to go to the bench, unless to one of the chairs of the Divisions; and although sometimes men who are not in large practice make excellent judges, yet, as a rule, I think it desirable that the Government should have it in its power to command the services of the leading men at the bar, if they desire to do so. The only way of accomplishing this result, as it appears to me, is to increase the salaries of the judges; and so far as I can judge, from conversation with people out of the profession, I think there would be no opposition to it. That is not a matter on which the public care for economy. They are willing to pay well to get the highest legal talent. I believe that the salaries of the judges in Scotland are less than those in Ireland, although the wealth of the country and the importance of the interests involved in litigation here are equally great, and from the large commerce of this country, I think I may say probably greater than in Ireland. As regards the importance of the interests, the difficulty of the questions, and their variety, I see no difference between litigation in Scotland and litigation in the most wealthy districts in England; and I think that substantially the administration of the law should be put on the same footing.

10,462. Mr. Webster.—In connection with that, have we not also very much too small salaries for all the officials below the judges connected with the Court, for the conducting of the business, as compared with either England or Ireland, or with what is fair professional remuneration?—I believe that is so. There are not so many of them either, I believe. We have no chief clerks or masters who perform the duties performed by such officers in the superior courts of law in England. Practically, our clerks of court do nothing but register the decisions of the judges,—write out the interlocutors. I believe that in the superior courts in England these duties are performed by officers called Registrars, who sit in court, and write out the interlocutors, and that they have a separate class of officials who are called Chief Clerks in Chancery, and Masters in the Common Law Courts, who assist the judges in performing the routine business of the court.

10,463. But we have no such officials in the Court of Session?—We have no such officials in our courts.

10,464. The Chairman.—Have you any other observations to make?—No, these are all the points I had noted; but I shall be glad to answer any questions on any other points on which the Commissioners desire my opinion.

10,465. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Has your attention been called to the procedure in teind cases?—In my own practice, I have had very little experience of teind cases, and I would rather not give evidence upon that branch of practice.

10,466. Do you see any propriety in the reservation of a particular day for the teind cases by the Lord Ordinary in the Outer House?—No, except in regard to motions. I think there is the same advantage in having the motions on one day a week, that I expect from having motion days in other causes. As regards debates, I should think they are best taken continuously until they are finished.

10,467. Complaint has been made of the expense of the proceedings in the Court of Session. Have you any suggestion to make on that subject?—Expense is, of course, a relative term. As far as I can judge from anything I have seen of the proceedings of the superior courts in other parts of the kingdom, I don't think those in the Court of Session are more expensive. I think they are lower than those of the superior courts of England. The scale of remuneration for agents is lower. In regard to counsel, I imagine the fees are very much the same, excepting that many of the leading English counsel require a special retainer,—a very large fee, upon being first instructed in a case. We don't have that practice with us. The expense, however, I believe, will be materially lessened by the Act of last session.

10,468. Mr. Baxter.—Is not the expense very much increased by the adjournment of debates and the refeeing of counsel?—In debates before the Lord Ordinary, the practice is not to send refreshing fees to counsel when debates are adjourned. In the case of proofs, there are fees sent for each day that the proof continues, because counsel who attend proofs are necessarily occupied during the whole or greater part of the day in conducting the case, and cannot be present elsewhere. In the Inner House there are refreshing fees.

10,469. Then before the Lord Ordinary counsel are not fee'd again if the debate is adjourned?—Not in the debate roll.

10,470. The Chairman.—There are refreshing fees which used to be understood to be given at the beginning of session; but there are also now what are called continuation fees in the Inner House?—Yes. In the Inner House continuation fees are allowed to counsel when a case is adjourned from one day to another. If I were asked my opinion, I would say that I think it is a reasonable thing, when professional gentlemen are engaged for more than one day, that they should receive fees according to the length of time that they are occupied; and I may mention that I have known debates in important cases occupying more than the whole of two days,—that is to say, a case is begun on Tuesday, heard during the whole of Wednesday, and again on Thursday; and I cannot see any justice in asking counsel to give their time day after day for one day's fee.

10,471. But supposing you were fee'd to state a case, and it comes on about a quarter before four, and is adjourned at four?—In these cases, of course, the counsel are better paid than where the case lasts the whole time; but they have to give their attendance in court. Very frequently they are occupied during the day, while waiting for the case, in preparing for it. As a general rule, I think it a fair thing to pay continuation fees.

10,472. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—New cases are not now called within a quarter to four?—No. Since the hour of meeting of the court has been altered to ten, they don't call a new case shortly before four. If it is to be gone into, it is right, for the information of the public, to say that these continuation fees are very small—generally two guineas or sometimes three to a senior counsel, and two to a junior, and that although the case may last the whole of the second day.

10,473. Mr. Webster.—Does it occur to you that expense or delay would be saved by counsel not being taken in at all stages of motions before the Outer House and the Inner House as at present, and having that done, as in chambers, by the agent alone attending?—I thought it would be advantageous to allow of motions being made by agents at chambers; and accordingly, in preparing the bill which became law last session, under the direction of the Lord Advocate, provision was made for the motions being made in the first instance by agents; but I understand that they don't like the system.

10,474. Who don't like it?—The agents themselves.

10,475. But it is not at present permitted for an agent to make a motion before a Lord Ordinary: he is only permitted to do so before the clerk?—Well, I see no objection to agents being allowed to make motions before the Lord Ordinary; but I think that the power, if given, would not be largely used: for this reason, that to a large extent the agents themselves are engaged in carrying on their general business in their offices, and many of them don't come at all, but send clerks to look after the cases in court; and they would dislike being obliged to give personal attendance. Of course there are exceptions, as in your own case, where the court business is large, and requires the attendance of the principal. I think it should be optional to the agent to attend without counsel; but that if he in his discretion thinks proper to instruct counsel, the expense should be a good charge against the opposite party, because sometimes there are very important points of practice decided in the motion roll.

10,476. At present, is it not the rule that reclaiming notes do not require any formal prayer, but merely contain the words, 'which interlocutor is submitted to review?'—It is so.

10,477. Do you see any reason for requiring that the expense of feeing counsel and his clerk, and the agent for getting that paper signed by counsel, should be incurred, or why the agent should not sign a paper in the statutory form without any addition to his fee?—I think the business would be equally well done under the present form of reclaiming note, without the intervention of counsel; but the saving of expense would be very small. I think I might answer the question in this way, viewed as a matter of expense; a party is never advised by his agent to reclaim without consulting counsel, or very seldom; in my experience, it is the practice to consult counsel before reclaiming, and no fee is sent for taking his opinion; but a fee is sent for signing the reclaiming note, which covers the advice given as to the propriety of reclaiming.

10,478. In appeals under the Debts Recovery Act, I think the practice at present is, that a note signed by counsel is presented to the Lord President of the Division, stating that such an appeal has been presented, and asking that it be sent to the roll. Do you see any necessity for having such a note?—In cases of such trifling value, I think it would be desirable to save every expense that could be saved, and therefore to dispense with a note of that kind signed by counsel.

10,479. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—In appeals from the Sheriff Courts, which are now very common, there is no such note signed by counsel?—No.

10,480. An enrolling slip is given in by the agent to the clerk, and the case sent to the roll?—I have already said I don't see any necessity for having a note of that kind under the Debts Recovery Act.

10,481. Mr. Webster.—In connection with the first step in ordinary actions, the custom at present, and from the origin of the College of Justice, has been to have a summons signeted in the Signet Office?—Yes.

10,482. Is that, in your opinion, a proper requisite for commencing a suit in the Court of Session, where the privilege of acting as agent is not limited to Writers to the Signet?—I don't see that any inconvenience would attend the abolition of that formality, because it is not required in petitions or notes of suspension and interdict, which are modes of commencing a different description of action.

10,483. Do you know any other court which requires that the first writ should pass under a similar ordeal?—I am not quite sure what the practice is in the English common law courts, but my impression is that it is not required. The writ runs in the Queen's name, but is not signeted. There might be a reason for retaining the form of signeting where arrestment was to be used on the dependence of an action. Although the Signet officer does not read the summons, and has no power of preventing an improper writ being issued, still it is a form of authentication which the person in whose hands the arrestment is to be used looks at, to see that it is an authentic document.

10,484. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—You mentioned that under the new Act the execution by a messenger-at-arms was dispensed with in a number of cases of citation. That is not applicable, I believe, to diligence?—No; only to summonses.

10,485. Is there any reason why, if there is to be a change as to the execution of summonses, there should not be a similar change as to the execution of diligences?—I think the provision of the statute should be extended to diligences—to all writs passing under the Signet.

10,486. Mr. Webster.—What test would you propose for ascertaining whether there was a messenger resident within the district, so as to save the cost of a special application to the court in each case?—Section 19 of the Act says: 'Where any defender called in any summons, or any person upon whom service of any proceeding is ordered by the court, etc., resides within any county or within any district of a county, subject to the jurisdiction of the ordinary court of any Sheriff-substitute of such county, in which county or district of any county there shall not be at the time a resident messenger-at-arms, or within any of the islands of Scotland, it shall be competent for a sheriff-officer of such county or of the sheriffdom within which such island is situated, to serve such summons or to make such service or citation upon such defender or other party,' etc. I think it would be desirable to have an official register of the residences or places of business of messengers-at-arms, so that, in the event of any objection being afterwards taken to the execution, there should be the means of knowing whether it was a case within the section of the statute.

10,487. The Chairman.—But if the service by a sheriff-officer is a good service where there is no messenger-at-arms, why should it be a bad service where there is a messenger-at-arms?—I believe the clause was a compromise, having regard to the vested interests of messengers-at-arms. Prior to this statute they had the exclusive right of serving all writs passing under the Signet.

10,488. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Has your attention been called to the possibility of doing away with executions altogether, and substituting citation by way of registered letter?—That was under consideration in preparing the bill of last session, and was applied to the citation of jurors. It has since been applied by an Act of Sederunt, I think, to cases where the citation is edictal. The court have laid down a rule, that in cases of edictal citation there shall also be a notice sent to the known place of residence of the defender by registered post letter.

10,489. Mr. Webster.—When in the United Kingdom?—Yes. I do not think that a registered letter could be substituted in the general case of a citation.

10,490. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Citation may be given by knocks upon the door, and by putting a copy in at the keyhole. Why might it not be given by registered letter?—Keyhole citation is certainly an anomalous proceeding. There was a clause in regard to such citations in the Lord Advocate's bill, but I rather think it has been struck out.

10,491. Mr. Webster.—It was reported against by the law bodies, was it not?—Yes.

10,492. Does the system of jury trial meet with your approval, for the trial of the classes of cases at present submitted to juries, or is there any other tribunal you would prefer?—I think, on the whole, it is a satisfactory tribunal for trying actions of damages for wrong, especially cases which might be the foundation of criminal proceedings, or analogous cases. But in regard to mercantile cases generally—cases on contracts, to which it was formerly extensively applied—I do not think it a satisfactory tribunal; and, so far as I can judge, it has not the confidence of the mercantile community for that description of cases: in fact, they would prefer almost any tribunal to a jury of men who are not personally conversant with large transactions, and who have not had the means of becoming acquainted with them that judges and counsel have in their professional experience.

10,493. Then you would limit the class of cases which go to juries to the class which you first mentioned?—I would not be understood to say that I think any statutory limitation is necessary. At present discretion is given to the Lord Ordinary as to fixing the mode of trial. He always consults the wishes of the parties through their counsel; and I observe a growing disinclination to submit mercantile cases involving questions of law to a jury. I think in the meantime it may be safely left to the discretion of the judge.

10,494. For cases of wrong, why would you prefer the verdict of a jury to the decision of the court, or of a single trained judge?—I think, if I were engaged as a party, I should prefer the decision of a judge to that of a jury; but dealing with jury trial as an existing institution, I think the class of cases that I have mentioned are cases within the comprehension of a jury; and if the system is to be retained, that is the class of cases with which a jury is best able to deal. At the same time, personal actions of every description are disposed of by the Sheriffs in their courts without the intervention of a jury, and their decisions are reviewed in the Court of Session upon the facts and upon the law, and this system gives general satisfaction.

10,495. Perhaps much greater satisfaction than is given by the verdicts of juries in the same class of cases?—I think so.

10,496. The cost of jury trial is very much greater than the cost of investigation and decision in any other form, is it not?—I am not aware whether it is much more expensive than a trial before the Lord Ordinary under the present system. I should suppose it was more expensive, in so far as it generally occupies more time. A greater number of witnesses are examined in order, if possible, to impress the mind of the jury upon matters on which a judge accustomed to evidence would be satisfied with what one credible witness says; and from the proceeding being regarded as rather of a speculative kind, it is gone into more elaborately, and at greater length.

10,497. And always with two counsel on each side, whereas in many of the proofs before the Lord Ordinary the rule is one counsel on each side?—Yes, that is so. And even in proofs before the Lord Ordinary without a jury, where two counsel are instructed, they are instructed—at least in the case of seniors—on the footing that they are at liberty to take other business for the day. They are not confined to that case; whereas in jury cases larger fees are given to senior counsel, on the footing that they give up other business for the day, and confine themselves to the trial.

10,498. Mr. Campbell.—I am not quite sure whether your general observation as to jury trial applies to a large class of cases, viz. those which relate to the competency of the granting of deeds—to all questions, for instance, involving the question of sanity, imbecility, fraud and circumvention, and matters of that kind, more especially in regard to the reduction of wills. Do you think that such questions can be satisfactorily determined by the verdict of a jury?—With regard to reductions upon fraud, I should say that these were unsuited to jury trial. The decision of what constitutes a fraud is one of the most delicate subjects of judicial investigation, and I think peculiarly fitted for the court as distinguished from a jury. In fact, I think a jury could only dispose of such a case by being guided almost implicitly by the judge trying such a case, and then the jury becomes a mere instrument for carrying out the direction of the judge. I observe also that in the Court of Chancery, which in England alone takes cognizance of these cases, they are never submitted to a jury, but always dealt with by the judge upon the evidence. With reference to questions of the capacity of the party, there might be room for taking a distinction. If the object is to set aside a will or contract, I would deal with the case exactly as I would with a reduction on the ground of fraud, and for the same reason. The question of capacity to make a will is a peculiarly delicate question. Judges of the highest eminence have differed in regard to the ratio of decision in such cases. Where, on the other hand, the object is to put the party under personal restraint, there comes in the feeling which I think exists in the minds of the public, and it is a very natural feeling, that a party should not have his liberty taken away without the opportunity of having the case submitted to a jury of indifferent persons taking a rough, common-sense view of the matter. A court of law might pronounce a man insane, and properly so, where a jury, while perhaps thinking him insane, would also think that he might just as well be left at large. I mean a jury is not so bound down to a strictly legal view of the case as a judge would be.

10,499. The Chairman.—Cognition by inquest was part of the law of Scotland when jury trial in civil cases was not?—Yes; and in the Act of last session, while the jurisdiction in such cases is taken from the Sheriff and transferred to the Court of Session, it is provided that it should be tried by a jury before one of the judges.

10,500. There are cases in which the court, upon the application of the relatives, and on medical certificates, do put parties under restraint?—No doubt; and I presume that the greater number of persons who are confined in asylums are so confined simply under medical certificates, or by a warrant from the Sheriff. At the same time, if there be a serious question as to the insanity of the person, and he has an opportunity of giving instructions to a solicitor, he has the means under the present practice of having the question of his sanity tried by a jury.

10,501. Mr. Webster.—In connection with fixing limits to the right of going from one judge or one court to another, have you considered whether there should be no power of appeal from the Lord Ordinary, where the amount in dispute is below some fixed sum, say £50, and no power of appeal to the House of Lords from an Inner House judgment, where the amount is below some other sum, say £200?—I have not given consideration to that question, but I think there are theoretical objections to it. It is the same jurisdiction. It is a form of procedure in the same court; and I doubt the propriety of having different forms of procedure in the same court applicable to actions of different value. There is also the difficulty of determining the value of the action; for, as I already observed, but a small proportion of cases litigated in the Court of Session are actions involving only pecuniary claims,—so that I don't think that any very great advantage would result from that. As regards appeals to the House of Lords, I should think the House of Lords would probably be against any interference with their jurisdiction, and I don't think there is any demand for it on the part of the public.

10,502. Mr. Campbell.—Are you aware that there is an analogy for some such course as has been suggested, in the Sheriff Court, and that judgments of the Sheriff on appeal from the substitute, when the amount is under £25, are not appealable to the Court of Session?—Yes; these are regarded as small causes, which should terminate in the local court in which they are brought. But where a case is fit for consideration by the Court of Session, I would not be disposed to restrict the power of appealing upon matter of law to the House of Lords.

10,503. But don't you think that, where the case is under £250, or some such sum in value, it should be necessary that permission should be granted, with reference to the nature of the case, by the Court of Session, to take an appeal to the House of Lords?—Under the present practice, the certificate of two counsel engaged in the case is required, to the effect that there is reasonable cause of appeal; and I think that it would not be right for the counsel to grant such a certificate where the case was of trifling value, unless there was an important question of principle involved. I have no doubt that in many cases counsel refuse to give such certificates, and that appeals in consequence are not taken.

10,504. The Chairman.—Must not one of them have been counsel in the cause?—Yes. There is one point which I had overlooked, not immediately connected with this subject: in a return which I made to the Commission as Sheriff of Chancery, I took the liberty of adding a note, suggesting that, as that court has jurisdiction to some extent in regard to the appointment of guardians and minors, if anything was to be done in the way of relieving the junior Lord Ordinary of part of that description of business, it might be done by allowing the Sheriff of Chancery to appoint factors loco tutoris and curators bonis upon summary petition, not interfering with the jurisdiction of the junior Lord Ordinary, but giving a co-ordinate jurisdiction. I think, where the estate is of small value, the appointment might be obtained more cheaply in the way I suggest. The petition would not be printed, counsel would not be employed to prepare it or to appear in court; and as the court sits in Edinburgh, there would be no difficulty in bringing that description of business under the supervision of the Accountant of Court. In fact, the Sheriff of Chancery in these matters might be regarded as simply an officer of the Court of Session, carrying out a subordinate branch of its duties. I am aware, however, that evidence has been given recommending that similar jurisdiction should be given to the Sheriffs of counties. If the Commission were to adopt that view, I should not think it necessary or expedient also to give it to the Sheriff of Chancery; but in one way or other, I would submit that some provision should be made for enabling appointments of that kind to be made more cheaply with reference to estates of small value.

10,505. Have you considered the expediency of granting such power to the Sheriff Courts over the country?—I think the power might be given quite well, as far as it depended upon the judge. It is a mere ministerial duty, which the judges in the Sheriff Courts are quite competent to exercise, and in cases of difficulty there is always the power of appealing to the Court of Session. The only objection is, that I think it would be more difficult to bring these appointments under the supervision of the Accountant of Court in Edinburgh, and also, perhaps, that an application might be made in one county unsuccessfully, and might be renewed in another county: in short, that it would be better done by some central court.

10,506. Mr. Webster.—In regard to your own Court of Chancery, do you approve of the form of procedure and investigation and of intimation which at present exists?—So far as I have had experience, the form of procedure appears to be quite satisfactory.

10,507. And the mode of obtaining evidence quite satisfactory?—I think so. Considering that it is an ex parte proceeding, and may be brought under reduction, I think the mode of taking evidence by affidavits before a magistrate or justice is satisfactory. I have some doubt as to the expediency of the provision contained in the Titles to Lands Consolidation Act of last session, enabling notaries without special commission to take depositions. I don't see the necessity of that, and I would prefer that it should have been left to the Sheriffs and Justices of the Peace, as under the old statute.

10,508. Do you think Justices of Peace are better than notaries for the taking of evidence?—No; I don't think they would necessarily be better qualified. The objection that occurred to me is, that the notary may be mixed up as agent in the case for one of the parties concerned. I found, on entering on my duties in the court, that several depositions were given in, taken by the notary who was himself the agent; and I thought it right to disallow these, and to require them to be taken over again by a neutral party; but where they come from the country, we have no means of knowing whether the gentleman who signs the deposition is himself a partner with the gentleman who signs the petition: he may be, and we have not the means of checking it. With reference to another court with which I am connected as assessor—the Dean of Guild Court of Edinburgh—it has occurred to me that it would be an improvement on the procedure in the Dean of Guild Courts and the Burgh Courts, if the new form of process contained in the Sheriff Court Act were extended to these courts; that is to say, that the record should be made up by summons or petition and minute of defence, or at all events upon the original condescendence and answers. At present, in the Dean of Guild Court, there is generally a petition and answers, then a condescendence and answers, and then a revised condescendence and answers, and a good deal of time is lost in preparing these steps; and the warrants are delayed often to the great inconvenience of the parties, because it is a serious thing, when a person wants to build a house or warehouse, that he may have to wait three or four months before he can get a warrant to do so.

10,509. In adopting the Sheriff Court Act, would the Dean of Guild be qualified to take notes of evidence with his own hand, as the Sheriff does?—At present there are very few cases in which a proof is found to be necessary. The cases requiring proof are cases of disputed possession, where defences are lodged on the ground that the party is not entitled to a possessory judgment; and I think it would be better that the present mode of taking evidence should be continued. My remark had reference chiefly to the record.

The Right Hon. LORD COLONSAY in the Chair.

John Clerk Brodie.

John Clerk Brodie, Esq., examined.

10,510. The Chairman.—You are a member of the Society of Writers to the Signet?—I am.

10,511. How long have you been so?—Since 1836.

10,512. You were for some years Crown agent?—Yes, for more than ten years.

10,513. And you are now Keeper of the Register of Sasines?—I have been so since 1858.

10,514. You and your firm have had a great deal of experience in litigation before the court?—We have.

10,515. Have you any suggestions to make to the Commission in regard to improvement of the procedure in the Court of Session, specially with reference to the diminution of expense and delay?—One most important object connected with the judicial system of Scotland appears to me to be a diminution of the number of courts of appeal.

10,516. Would you explain what you mean by that?—Taking a general view of our judicial system, we have the Sheriffs, with their substitutes, and the Court of Session sitting as Lords Ordinary, with an appeal to the Inner House. In the Sheriff Court, there is an appeal from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff, which may take place several times in the course of a case, and very often does so. The Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff are frequently both members of the bar. There may be very little in point of qualification between them; indeed, in some cases greater weight may be thought to attach to the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute. It appears to me, that in these circumstances an appeal from one single judge to another single judge is not a desirable appeal. It occasions besides great delay, though the expense may not be considerable.

10,517. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think that where the Sheriff alters the Sheriff-substitute's judgment, it is apt to create dissatisfaction?—I think it frequently causes great dissatisfaction.

10,518. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestion?—I am unable to see any advantage in an appeal within the Sheriff Court itself, or other than direct to the Court of Session. If, however, that is to be the only appeal, the expense of proceeding in the Court of Session must be diminished to a very considerable extent. In regard to the Court of Session, I have long been of opinion that the present arrangement of Lords Ordinary, with an appeal from them to the Inner House, is not an expedient arrangement. I think that out of the Lords Ordinary should be formed a third court of four judges, and that there should be no appeal from these courts of four judges, except that which at present exists to the House of Lords; and that appeal, I think, ought to be restrained within some limits.

10,519. Have you considered the mode by which you would limit the expense of the Court of Session otherwise than by forming the Lords Ordinary into a third court?—I think a great deal that is merely formal, at present done through counsel, might be done quite as well, and at much less expense, through the agents and clerks of court.

10,520. Would you explain more fully what that means?—There is, for instance, in the Court of Session a rule which requires all papers to the court to be signed by counsel. That infers very considerable expense. You have the fee to counsel and a high fee to his clerk; and also the agent's fee for attending upon counsel. Then you have attendances of counsel in the course of making up the record. A great many of these are merely formal attendances, and I see no reason why the end should not be accomplished through the agents and the clerks of court, with a reference to the court where necessary.

10,521. Do you mean that all papers should be signed by the agents?—By no means.

10,522. What class of papers do you allude to?—A great many petitions, minutes, and notes—many papers lodged incidentally in the course of a case.

10,523. More formal than anything else?—Yes.

10,524. In regard to the proceedings at making up the record, do you contemplate that the record should be made up by counsel?—I think it would be a great advantage if pleas in law were done away with. They force a resort to counsel, because no agent will undertake the preparation of them; and I do not think there is any advantage in them commensurate with the disadvantage. The summons may be, and is in many cases, prepared by the agent. It would be so more frequently if pleas in law were done away with. In the defence, counsel might be employed or not, according to the judgment and discretion of the agent. I have no idea that agents would resort less frequently than necessary to counsel.

10,525. Would you do away with condescendence and answers?—Not in all cases. A great deal must depend on the importance of the case. In cases coming from Sheriff Courts, which are frequently of no great importance, and in unimportant cases originating in the Court of Session, you might do so. I think, in the manner I have endeavoured to explain, very considerable saving in expense might be obtained. In a large class of cases before the Court of Session, the saving would not be so great. All important cases must substantially be entirely conducted by counsel.

10,526. Do you make any distinction between cases which are mere claims for debt, and cases of another description involving more matter of law, such as declaratory actions and actions of reduction?—In that latter class of cases I think the interposition of counsel is indispensable throughout.

10,527. Would you do away with pleas in law in such cases?—I think so.

10,528. But you would still have the aid of counsel?—Yes.

10,529. Have you formed any estimate of the proportion of cases that are mere claims of debt, as compared with the other class of cases that I have alluded to?—I have not; but I know generally from long experience the class of cases that come from Sheriff Courts.

10,530. But, taking all cases that come into the Court of Session, have you formed any estimate of the proportion of these that are mere claims of debt, as compared with those that involve other kinds of conclusions altogether?—I have not entered minutely into the statistics. I speak from the general impression on my mind, induced by the experience of a great many years.

10,531. Mr. Adam.—In the case of agents resorting to counsel, have you considered in what cases that should be done, or who is to be the judge of whether or not that expense is to be allowed against the opposite party?—The auditor must in the first instance judge of it, and the court after the auditor.

10,532. Then you think the agent should run the risk in the first instance of having that expense allowed?—Certainly. The agent must always run the risk of conducting his case with propriety.

10,533. The Chairman.—I infer from what you have said, that you think there should be only one Sheriff?—I think there should be only one Sheriff.

10,534. With an appeal direct to the Court of Session?—Yes.

10,535. Would you allow the Sheriff to review his own judgment?—I see no objection to that, provided it be done inexpensively; and he ought certainly to have the power of reviewing it to the extent of correcting any merely clerical or inadvertent error.

10,536. Mr. Baxter.—Would you allow him to have an oral hearing against his own judgment, before appeal to the Court of Session?—I see no objection to it.

10,537. Mr. Adam.—In the event of its being thought desirable to preserve an appeal in the Sheriff Court itself, would you prefer the present system of one judge, or an appeal to a tribunal of two judges going through the various country towns?—I should prefer an appeal to two judges.

10,538. Mr. Baxter.—To deliberate together?—Yes. I think an appeal from one judge to one judge, in the circumstances I have mentioned, most unsatisfactory.

10,539. The Chairman.—You mentioned that, under the present system, in the event of the Sheriff altering the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, that gives dissatisfaction?—I think it gives great dissatisfaction.

10,540. I suppose you mean dissatisfaction to the party against whom the judgment is pronounced?—I mean dissatisfaction to the profession.

10,541. As showing uncertainty of result, or how?—In respect that the profession do not always consider that the judgment of the Sheriff ranks at all higher than that of the Sheriff-substitute, and may sometimes rank the Sheriff-substitute's judgment higher than the Sheriff's.

10,542. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think the Sheriff-substitute has some peculiar advantages which the Sheriff has not?—I think he has.

10,543. In the making up of the record, and in the taking of evidence?—Yes.

John Clerk Brodie.

10,544. The Chairman.—And, per contra, do you think the Sheriff has any advantages that the substitute has not?—It does not seem to me that the Sheriff is in a better position to judge of the case than the Sheriff-substitute.

10,545. Mr. Webster.—Is there no advantage from his being non-resident among the parties who are involved in the litigation?—I do not think inconvenience has been experienced from the Sheriff-substitute being resident.

10,546. Nor from the Sheriff practising in the Supreme Court?—A great many of the Sheriffs have no practice in the Supreme Court. I don't think there are above six or seven of them that are in any practice to speak of.

10,547. Mr. Campbell.—Your professional practice has given you a pretty considerable familiarity with a great number of the counties of Scotland?—It has.

10,548. Have you ever had occasion to form an opinion that the Sheriff-substitute is in any way, from his association with the county and residence in it, a person suspect, with reference to prejudice or partiality?—By no means.

10,549. Any suspicion of that kind would tend to diminish, as you raise the status of the resident Sheriff, would it not?—Probably; but I don't think the suspicion exists.

10,550. The idea of a division of Scotland into districts, with ambulatory judges, consisting of two for each district, acting as a court of review of the judgment of the resident Sheriff, has been strongly forced on our attention. Do you think there is any superior advantage to be derived from such a scheme over that of a direct appeal to the Court of Session; or do you prefer the latter alternative?—I prefer the latter alternative; but if such an appeal court should be constituted, I think it should be with this quality, that its judgments should be final, and that there be no appeal from it to the Court of Session.

10,551. Mr. Baxter.—But I understand you to prefer a direct appeal to the Court of Session, on the condition that the expense should be much lessened?—Certainly.

10,552. Mr. Campbell.—Assuming the present constitution of the court to subsist, consisting of Lords Ordinary and an Inner House, do you see any difficulty in the Lords Ordinary discharging those functions in appeals which are now exercised by the Sheriff?—Under the present system, the Lord Ordinary could not do it so inexpensively as the Sheriff does.

10,553. That is to say, when there was an oral hearing; but Sheriffs may be appealed to without any hearing?—I don't think that, under the existing system, you could have an appeal to the Lord Ordinary so inexpensive as the present appeal to the Sheriff.

10,554. But the expense of proceedings like the present might be greatly obviated by assimilating the procedure before the Lord Ordinary to that before the Sheriff, by first prohibiting printing, and second, preventing more than one counsel being heard on a side?—I think, whether you keep the Lords Ordinary as they are, or throw them into a Third Division, new arrangements might be made for the conduct of cases coming into the Court of Session from inferior courts, that would so diminish the expense as to make an appeal from the Sheriff to the Court of Session an inexpensive appeal. I do not say it would be an appeal as inexpensive as the present appeal to the Sheriff; but I am of opinion that the very inexpensiveness of that appeal is to some extent a disadvantage, because it creates delay. It frequently happens that a great object of the defender in a cause is delay; and if you enable him, at several stages of it, to take an appeal to another judge, and make it a very inexpensive appeal, it is sure to be frequently taken, and thus there are disadvantages in its very inexpensiveness. I think the expense of the appeal to the Court of Session might be so diminished, that it should not be more onerous than it ought to be.

10,555. Do you think that the superiority of decision in the altered appellate tribunal would be so great that it would be worth the public's while to pay for it?—I am clearly of that opinion.

10,556. If you were informed that 19-20ths or some such percentage of the judgments of the Sheriff-substitutes were affirmed on appeal by the Sheriffs throughout Scotland generally, and yet that in every final judgment an appeal is taken as a rule, would that tend strongly to confirm your opinion that the appeal is taken merely because it is cheap, and not with any legitimate idea of getting a better decision?—I have no doubt that is the case.

10,557. Mr. Baxter.—Would not the evil be greatly mitigated if the number of appeals were lessened, and an appeal made competent only at final judgment?—I am of opinion that, if the present system of Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute is to be maintained, the number of appeals ought to be materially lessened.

10,558. Then you think that, in any event, the number of appeals should be diminished?—I think so.

10,559. The Chairman.—Do you mean the number of appeals in the course of the cause, or do you mean that there should be a finality of judgment where that does not exist now?—I mean that the number of appeals in the course of a cause should be diminished.

10,560. Mr. Baxter.—And the whole case brought up on an ultimate appeal from the decision on the merits?—I am not prepared to say that I would limit it in every case to the final judgment.

10,561. The Chairman.—But there are certain appeals in the course of a case which you would prohibit?—Yes.

10,562. Mr. Shand.—Apart from your experience in advocations in the Court of Session, have you any personal experience of the working of the Sheriff Courts?—One sees the working of the Sheriff Courts very clearly, in the causes that come from those courts to the Court of Session.

10,563. Apart, however, from that source of information, have you had any personal experience of the working of the Sheriff Courts?—No, I am not a Sheriff Court practitioner.

10,564. Have you had any connection with the Sheriff Courts, so as to bring you into personal contact with the working of them?—I have had no more personal connection with the Sheriff Courts than agents in the Court of Session usually have.

10,565. Mr. Campbell.—You have had constant personal intercourse with practitioners in the Sheriff Court, I suppose?—For a great many years.

10,566. And you have been conversant with the views which they entertain of the working of their own courts?—I have.

10,567. Mr. Shand.—Is it the result of your intercourse with agents, that you find they desire that there should be only one local judge?—I don't think that the present system of appeal from Sheriff-substitute to Sheriff gives satisfaction generally to the country practitioners.

10,568. Do you think the country practitioners, as a body, or the majority of them, would approve of what you have proposed,—namely, that there should be no intermediate appeal between the resident Sheriff and the Court of Session?—I have no means of knowing.

10,569. Have you not made that a subject of conversation with country practitioners?—I know a great many are of opinion that a direct appeal to the Court of Session would be advisable; but whether they form a majority or not, I cannot say.

10,570. Can you tell me from what counties you can represent that as an opinion that has been expressed to you?—I cannot say that it applies to one county more than another.

10,571. Could you recall the names of half-a-dozen procurators who so expressed themselves to you?—Really I do not bear that in my mind.

10,572. I am not asking you to give their names, but I merely ask if you can, in your own mind, recall six procurators throughout Scotland who have so expressed themselves to you?—I have no doubt that I could recall a great many more.

10,573. You don't think the absence of expense in an appeal is a disadvantage to that appeal?—I have stated that, in some respects, I think the inexpensiveness of the appeal is a disadvantage.

10,574. Do you think it is an advantage to have an appeal which is inexpensive in itself?—Certainly.

10,575. What you object to is that it leads to delay?—Yes.

10,576. If that delay can be avoided by any means, would you desire to have an appeal with as little expense as possible?—Yes; but I think that you may have an inexpensive appeal to a court not properly constituted, that is not nearly so advantageous as a more expensive appeal to a court better constituted.

10,577. That objection goes to the constitution of the court, and not to the question of expense?—Of course, abstractly considered, the diminution of expense is a very important object.

10,578. What do you think the expense of an appeal to the Court of Session, in a case upon a concluded proof, must involve as a minimum in ordinary circumstances?—It would be difficult to answer that question.

10,579. You have had a great deal of experience in appeals and advocations from the Sheriff Court to the Court of Session?—I have; but I really could not venture to answer the question.

10,580. Is it not an important element in forming your opinion as to the disadvantage of the existing appeal, as compared with a direct appeal to the Court of Session, which you think should be substituted for it, that you should ascertain what the expense is?—I don't propose that the Court of Session should be the direct court of appeal, unless the expense of procedure in the Court of Session in appeals from Sheriff Courts be materially lessened.

10,581. If matters remained in the Court of Session substantially as they are now, would you retain an appeal in the Sheriff Court?—No; I would not retain an appeal from one judge to one judge, in such circumstances as exist at present.

10,582. Can you form any idea of the expense of the appeal in the Court of Session?—I could easily ascertain it; but I cannot venture to name a sum offhand.

10,583. Suppose it were put at a minimum of £15 a side on an average, would you say that in these circumstances there ought to be no intermediate appeal between the local resident judge and the Court of Session?—I think the appeal to the Court of Session might be, in a very large number of cases, much less than £15 a side.

10,584. But assuming that it were not so, in that case do you think there should be no intermediate appeal?—In that case, I think an intermediate appeal might be desirable, but not the present appeal.

10,585. What appeal do you suggest in that case?—Two judges might be enough.

10,586. How would you constitute the court of appeal in that case?—You must constitute it from the bar.

10,587. Do you mean, then, that judges should be appointed to go circuit, or what do you propose?—The proposal is not mine. I do not think it the best mode of arranging the appeal business of the inferior courts.

10,588. I understood you to say, that if the expense be as I have put it, you would think it desirable still to have an intermediate appeal?—But, being of opinion that the expense need not be so much as you mention, I have not directed my attention to the details of the appeal court which, in such circumstances, it might be best to constitute.

10,589. The Chairman.—Would you explain to us what are the arrangements which you would propose, whereby the expense of an appeal to the Court of Session in such cases would be so greatly diminished?—I have alluded to some of them. I think, in a great number of cases coming from inferior courts, the employment of counsel might be very much limited; and that the expense might also be much lessened in the less important procedure, as well as in the making up of records, by entrusting those matters to the agents and the clerks of court.

10,590. Mr. Webster.—Have we at present, in the Court of Session, such clerks of court as would meet your views for that kind of preparation?—I cannot say that we have.

10,591. Nor are the salaries at present such as would be adequate for parties qualified for the duty?—In some cases, I doubt if they are.

10,592. Mr. Shand.—That suggestion would not apply to cases coming from the Sheriff Courts, in which the record has been already there made up?—Where the record has been made up in the Sheriff Court, it will stand in the Court of Session.

10,593. The cause would come up on the record and the proof taken there?—Yes; if there be a proof.

10,594. The Chairman.—Would there be any mode of limiting the expense that you suggest in that case, except holding the record in the court below as the record in the Court of Session?—If there be a Third Division, I think that in many of the smaller class of cases it should not be required to print the papers, and that the court might utilize the process, trusting to the statement they would receive from counsel in regard to what was to be found there.

10,595. But if there was not a Third Division?—The same thing might be done by the Lord Ordinary.

10,596. And what would be the saving of expense in that case?—The saving of copies of the papers for the Lord Ordinary.

10,597. Mr. Adam.—In the case of appeals to the Justiciary Court at the present moment, are you aware that they are in many cases disposed of without printing?—Yes; and I think it advisable that that system should be extended as far as possible.

10,598. Mr. Shand.—Do you contemplate then, that Sheriff Court cases should come before a Lord Ordinary?—I have stated my opinion that there should be a third court formed out of the Lords Ordinary; and that the Lords Ordinary, as at present constituted, should not remain part of the system.

10,599. Mr. Webster.—Do you not find that printing, on the whole, tends very greatly to diminish expense in the way of length of discussion and amount of fees?—I am much in favour of printing; but there is a large class of cases in which it is quite unnecessary, and in these it ought not to be required.

10,600. Mr. Shand.—Do you think it would be possible to dispense with printing in the case of advocations from the Sheriff Court where there is a proof, and where the case has to be disposed of on the proof by several judges?—That would depend upon the particular case. There are a great number of cases in which it would be necessary to print the proof, but many in which it might be dispensed with. The dispensing with printing must be left with the court in the particular case, and with the parties.

10,601. In what class of cases, where a proof has been led, do you think the printing of it might be dispensed with?—In cases of little intricacy.

10,602. In that case, how are the court to consider the proof?—They have the proof before them, and the counsel to tell them what is in it.

10,603. Do you think it would be satisfactory that the judges should dispose of the case without each reading the proof?—I think, in the general case, if the judge reads what the counsel on both sides bring before him, he will probably read all that is material.

10,604. Would you be content to have a case of your own disposed of on the partial reading by counsel at the bar, of proof led in the inferior court?—In a large number of cases I should not be content with anything of the kind, but in many cases I should be quite content with it.

10,605. And do you think that litigants generally would?—I think so.

10,606. Do you think that judgments on which reliance could be placed might be expected under such a system?—I am quite of that opinion.

10,607. Mr. Adam.—Would you in any case dispense with counsel in debating a case?—No, certainly not. It is only in the more formal matters, of which there are a great number in the court, that I would dispense with counsel.

10,608. Mr. Shand.—Would you leave it to the clerk of court, or to whom would you leave it, to settle whether the proof was to be printed in each particular case?—That is matter of detail; but it might perhaps be safely left to the clerk of court.

10,609. It would of course be necessary, in order to determine that, that he should read the proof and judge of the case?—Yes; but a very cursory reading of the proof would be sufficient, and reading it at all would be necessary only where there was a difference of opinion between the agents.

10,610. Mr. Webster.—Would the agents judge of that matter for themselves, or would they not resort to counsel, and thereby cause more expense than the whole cost of printing?—I think the agents would judge of it themselves; and, if they resorted to counsel, I think the charge for that should not be sustained by the auditor.

10,611. The Chairman.—In regard to dispensing with counsel, I did not understand whether you confined that to the proceedings before the clerks of court which you suggest, or whether you extended it also to certain appearances before the Lord Ordinary or the court itself?—I think, if it is mere formal matter, counsel might be dispensed with.

10,612. Mr. Webster.—As is done in the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords?—Yes.

10,613. The Chairman.—You have said that you think the Lords Ordinary might be formed into a Third Division, and the Lords Ordinary as such dispensed with. Would you retain any Lord Ordinary as such?—I think the present staff of the Court of Session is not more than sufficient to perform the duties of that court, and that the judge who would not be a member of the Third Division might be a very useful and important member of the court.

10,614. What duties would you assign to him?—There are a great number of petitions which at present come before the court that might be disposed of advantageously by a single judge, saving much of the time of the court, and performing the duties not less satisfactorily than they would be performed by a court of four judges. He would also be useful where the court were divided in opinion. Where there was any appearance of that, he might be called in, and thus the expense of a re-hearing, which is often considerable, might be saved. If the Teind Court be kept up, that duty might perhaps be entrusted to him.

10,615. And those petitions which now go to the junior Lord Ordinary you would send to him?—Yes.

10,616. And the duties of the Teind Lord Ordinary, if that is to be kept up?—I think they might be advantageously sent to him also.

10,617. Mr. Adam.—And the Bill Chamber?—I think it doubtful whether the Bill Chamber as a separate court should be maintained; but he might be very useful in granting the first orders in Bill Chamber cases, where these require despatch.

10,618. The Chairman.—Would you explain what you mean when you say it is doubtful whether the Bill Chamber should be preserved, and yet that it should be kept up for granting orders of that kind?—At present a case is disposed of first in the Bill Chamber with reference to the merely temporary object, it may be, of interim interdict. From the single judge in the Bill Chamber it goes to the Inner House with reference merely to that temporary object; and afterwards it commences anew in the Court of Session, as if almost a new suit. I think there are inconveniences in that arrangement which it would be desirable to obviate; but there must, of course, be some machinery for meeting the pressing cases which come into the Bill Chamber, and require immediate despatch. I think a single judge would be better for that than a court of four judges.

10,619. Mr. Shand.—On the assumption that there shall remain several judges in the Outer House, do you see any reason why applications for interdict and ad factum præstandum might not be presented to any Lord Ordinary, just as they are now to the Sheriff?—I see no reason why they should not.

10,620. And if that were so, the principal use of the Bill Chamber would be dispensed with in that way?—Yes.

10,621. You said you thought that having a single Lord Ordinary would save the expense of a re-hearing. In what way do you contemplate that that would be done?—I contemplate that the court, in any case of intricacy, or likely to give rise to difference of opinion on the bench, would call in the assistance of that judge.

10,622. But if that difference does not appear till the argument is almost concluded?—Of course there may be cases in which you will not derive full advantage from the arrangement.

10,623. In that case, if you call in the Lord Ordinary, a re-hearing must take place?—You cannot ask a judge to decide a case which he has not thoroughly heard.

10,624. Do you mean that the re-hearing would only be saved in those cases in which the judges, having read the papers beforehand, anticipated a difference of opinion?—I think it should be competent to call in a judge at any time with consent of parties. I would not call him in, without their consent, during the progress of the case; but I think consent would generally be given, though the case might have been commenced.

10,625. You mean that where, in the course of an argument, it appears likely that there is to be difference of opinion, the Division should send to the Lord Ordinary sitting in the court, and ask him to take part in their deliberations?—I mean that, in such a case, the Division should take the Lord Ordinary's assistance.

10,626. Suppose the Lord Ordinary was engaged with important business at that time?—I don't think it likely that much practical difficulty would be found to exist.

10,627. Suppose the Lord Ordinary to be engaged with business fully more important than that which the Division is engaged in?—I don't know what more important business he could be engaged with.

10,628. If an important interdict was going on before the Lord Ordinary, and the case before the Division was an appeal from the Sheriff Court in a £25 case?—You are assuming a very special case, and the Lord Ordinary to be sent for on the instant. It might, or might not, be possible to get him on the instant.

10,629. If that course is not taken, you would contemplate that the case should be at once adjourned?—I should contemplate the court taking the course which, in the circumstances, it found convenient. It is impossible to anticipate all the circumstances that may occur, in such detail as you are now giving them.

10,630. But they must either have a Lord Ordinary present or adjourn the case, if they require his presence?—If it be necessary to adjourn the case, I see no difficulty in making the adjournment.

10,631. If a Third Division be formed, and you have one Lord Ordinary alone in the Outer House, in what way do you contemplate that inquiry into facts should take place?—The services of the judge who formed a member of none of the three courts might be available in many of the cases remitted to proof. It might also be possible to detach from a court of four, when thought expedient, one of the judges. I think the Court should have that power, and I believe that by means of that kind there would be little difficulty in providing for all the cases you are now contemplating.

10,632. Have you any idea of the proportion of cases in which inquiry into matter of fact occurs, and the time which such inquiries occupy before the Lords Ordinary at present?—I know the inquiry is often very prolonged.

10,633. And that it occupies a very great part of the time of five judges at present?—No doubt that is so, but these are judges having the whole duties of a court to perform.

10,634. I speak of the time occupied in inquiring into matters of fact alone?—It often requires a great deal of time to conduct an inquiry into facts.

10,635. Do you think it would be possible for one judge, suppose he gave his whole time to inquire into matters of fact, to overtake the business that the Lords Ordinary now do?—I do not propose that there should be only one judge for that business.

10,636. But supposing that one gave his whole time to it?—I don't think it would be expedient to limit yourself to the services of that judge, when there are other judges with whom the work might be shared.

10,637. If you detach a judge from each of the three Divisions to take proof, is that very different from having four Lords Ordinary sitting?—Very different indeed; and I don't contemplate the constant detachment of one judge from each court.

10,638. The Chairman.—As there is a large amount of time occupied by the judges at present in taking proofs, it is probable that there would be an equal amount of time occupied in taking proofs, even if your system of three Divisions were adopted. You would have the command of the extra judge, and you would have the power to command the services of three other judges?—Just so.

10,639. It would probably occupy as much of the time of those three as is now occupied by three of the Lords Ordinary taking proofs. Would that not almost practically reduce each court to a court of three instead of four?—I don't think so. The present Lords Ordinary are able to do all the other business of their courts, and to take these proofs. Proofs, though a very important part of their duty, by no means occupy their whole time. I don't think the system I have suggested would infer anything like a continuous detachment of one judge from each of the three courts.

10,640. Mr. Webster.—Would you contemplate that the single judge who investigates the facts should hear counsel and dispose of the case at the end of the proof, or that the case should go into the Division to which the judge belongs, to be heard and decided there?—I should contemplate that it might go into the Division.

10,641. In that case would you contemplate that the evidence should all be put before the Division in print, and counsel then heard?—That must depend upon the nature of the case. In a great number of cases it would be necessary, but I think in very many it would be unnecessary.

10,642. How would you ascertain the class of cases in which printing was necessary, and in which it was not necessary? Would you leave it to the judge who has heard the evidence to state at the time whether he thought it should be put before the court in that way, or how would you do?—It might perhaps be left to the judge to state his opinion on that point, leaving the court to dispose of it.

10,643. Then you would have no judgment by a single judge on the merits of a cause in the Court of Session?—I would not; unless where it was thought convenient that the facts of the case should be finally disposed of by a single judge. In those cases the facts would be definitively ascertained at the proof before the single judge. In cases in which it might not be thought expedient to commit to a single judge the final decision of the facts, it would be necessary that the proof should be brought, in some way or other, under the notice of the court.

10,644. That would add greatly to the cost of the decision, in the first instance, in all cases where the proof was to be disposed of by the court. At present the rule is, that the counsel who has taken the proof shall discuss the case then and there before the judge, and the decision is given on that discussion. What would occur in the way you are now proposing would be, that there would be an entirely separate discussion before a different tribunal, involving of course new instructions to counsel?—That is so. In cases that would not have gone to the Inner House, the cost would in the first instance be greater; but in those which were ultimately to go to the Inner House, it would be very much less.

10,645. Would the decision of the Inner House given upon such discussion or proof be more or less satisfactory to you than the decision of the judge who heard the evidence?—I should extend, as far as possible, the finality of the judge who took the proof.

10,646. Do you think that a judge is the best qualified person to ascertain facts upon evidence?—That is, generally, my opinion.

10,647. The Chairman.—You said that you would extend the finality of the judge who heard the evidence as far as possible. What limit do you put to that? Is it not possible in every case, if you make the law so?—As far as it is safe to make the judge final on the evidence, I think it would be a great improvement to do so.

10,648. Then you think that should be done in all cases?—I am not disposed to say that it would be safe to make a single judge final in all cases upon the proof.

10,649. Mr. Clark.—You mean that he should find the facts on the proof?—Yes.

10,650. Mr. Shand.—Then you would not have the proof reported to the Division, and there debated; but you would have the case debated before the judge who took the proof?—Where the judge is to decide on the proof, the debate on the proof must of course take place before him.

10,651. Mr. Clark.—How would you apply that in such a case as the Breadalbane case? Would you have made the single judge who took the proof there final upon the question of fact involved in that case?—I have not said that I think a single judge could with safety be entrusted in all cases with finality in matters of fact. I think it desirable that it should be done as far as possible; and in any exceptional case the court might have power to reserve to themselves the adjudication of the facts.

10,652. So that they should be the judges of whether a single judge was to be conclusive in fact, or whether they themselves were to be the judges of the fact?—Yes.

10,653. Lord Barcaple.—Do you anticipate that, assuming the court formed in the way you propose, the order for the proof would emanate from the Division?—If the court consists only of three Divisions, it must emanate from a Division.

10,654. And therefore you would assume that the discussion out of which the order for the proof arises, should take place before the Division?—Yes.

10,655. Have you considered whether the desirableness of sending causes at once to a Division of the court, in place of to a Lord Ordinary, is equally strong in regard to all classes of cases; or whether there is a broad distinction between cases which it would be more peculiarly desirable to treat in that way, and cases where there would be strong reason for having the case disposed of in the first instance by a single judge?—I am not in favour of two courts within the Court of Session itself, an appeal lying from the one to the other.

10,656. And you think that applies equally strongly in a general way to all classes of cases?—I think it does.

10,657. In forming that opinion, have you had any regard to what seems to be the practice in the Court of Chancery in England, by which in modern times they have a double judgment of that kind?—That is so in the Court of Chancery, but not in the Courts of Common Law.

10,658. That is the reason why I ask, have you had any regard to the fact that in modern times that practice has been introduced into the Court of Chancery?—Until a comparatively recent period, the judgments of the Court of Chancery were all by single judges. Until the introduction of the Lords Justices of Appeal, there was not, so far as I am aware, any court of two in the Court of Chancery.

10,659. But have you had regard, in forming your opinion upon this matter, to the existence of that practice in the Court of Chancery?—I am aware of the system which prevails in the Court of Chancery, and nothing that I know of that system induces me to think that the arrangement of the Court of Session in three Divisions is not an expedient one.

10,660. And nothing induces you to think that it might with propriety be subject to a limitation in regard to any particular class of cases?—Your question does not make me aware of the class of cases you allude to.

10,661. I allude to that kind of case in Scotland which assimilates to the class of cases which come before the Court of Chancery in England?—No, I am not aware of any class of cases in which a court of first instance, consisting of four judges, and without any appeal except to the House of Lords, would not be a satisfactory court.

10,662. And attained with reasonable ease by a court of four?—I think so.

10,663. Have you any knowledge as to whether that system in Chancery is satisfactory to the profession and the judges, and the public?—I have heard no dissatisfaction expressed in regard to the constitution of the Court of Chancery.

10,664. You spoke of pressing cases in the Bill Chamber. What do you allude to?—I alluded to cases of urgency.

10,665. What class of cases have you in view?—Principally interdicts.

10,666. Do any others occur to you?—No.

10,667. Suspensions?—I include them in interdicts.

10,668. But is not that almost the entire business of the judge in the Bill Chamber?—It is a very large portion of it.

10,669. Is it not almost his entire business? He, being Bill Chamber judge, does a great deal else; but in the Bill Chamber what other business does he do?—It is his chief business. My suggestion was, that the Bill Chamber judge should merely deal with the matter in the first instance.

10,670. You mean that a Bill Chamber judge would be necessary to be kept up for dealing with the first order in an interdict, or in a suspension, because that is urgent?—Yes.

10,671. That being substantially the whole, or very nearly the whole, of the proper Bill Chamber work done in the Bill Chamber, do you think that it would be an advantage to divide that, assuming the Lords Ordinary to remain as they are at present, among five of them, and to divide the office management of it among five different offices?—I would not divide the office management. Though you give a jurisdiction in Bill Chamber matters to each of four or five judges, it is not necessary that you should interfere with the Bill Chamber clerk.

10,672. I thought you proposed to abolish the Bill Chamber?—Not at all.

10,673. Then if the Bill Chamber is not to be abolished——?—Whether the present arrangement of the Bill Chamber be abolished or not, I do not contemplate that the Bill Chamber clerk should be abolished.

10,674. Well, what is the benefit that you would anticipate from dividing the Bill Chamber business among five judges?—I am assuming that you have a judge not a member of any of the three courts; and as the business of the Court of Session is, in my opinion, quite sufficient to occupy the time of these three courts, with all the assistance that an additional judge can give them, I would relieve, as far as possible, the Division judges of whatever work may be safely performed by a single judge.

10,675. But in the event of the Lords Ordinary being retained as they are at present, I understood you to propose that these urgent cases should be divided among the Lords Ordinary, and not confined to one?—The question was not so put to me.

10,676. Mr. Shand.—I so put it, and I thought you assented to my view. The question I put was: Supposing there was to be no change, and no Third Division made, was there any reason why the Bill Chamber should be kept up; and might not every Lord Ordinary deal with applications for interdicts and suspensions, just as every Sheriff-substitute is doing daily throughout the country? And might not the clerks attached to these Lords Ordinary deal with these matters as the Sheriff-clerks do throughout the country, as part of their ordinary business?—I see no objection to every Lord Ordinary dealing with suspensions and interdicts as you suggest.

10,677. There is this in its favour, that it abolishes a separate office which appears to be unnecessary?—I don't think the saving of expense of such importance as to make it advisable to abolish the Bill Chamber clerk.

10,678. And in the second place, it removes a sort of outer court which you stated you found objectionable as leading to additional procedure before a party gets into the proper Court of Session?—Yes. I think the present arrangement, by which you commence as it were a new case, after emerging from the Bill Chamber, is not a convenient one.

10,679. That would be obviated under the system suggested by my question?—I think it ought to be obviated.

10,680. Lord Barcaple.—How would it be obviated? An interdict is asked. The demand is for interim interdict in the meantime, and for interdict; the interim interdict becomes the subject of discussion, and it may be a great deal more important than all the rest of the case put together. It is either granted or refused, and the note is passed; and then a discussion takes place upon the case generally. In what way is it that the change you propose would in any way diminish the procedure in such a case?—I contemplate a Third Division, and that the case once in the Inner House should remain there, and should not be commenced of new.

10,681. That is simply getting quit of the Lords Ordinary. Whether there be a Lord Ordinary or not, the case must still first of all be heard on the question of interim interdict, and afterwards, if the parties are not satisfied with having that decided, and go further, it must be heard upon the question of permanent interdict. Now, how will the procedure in such a case as that be diminished by the change you propose—I don't mean the change of abolishing the Lords Ordinary, but some change by which you anticipate there shall be less procedure in whatever court?—I see no objection to the alteration Mr. Shand suggests, but it is not the alteration I myself proposed. The only alteration I have proposed is in connection with the institution of a third court in place of the existing courts of the Lords Ordinary.

10,682. And without any intention to have any bearing upon this matter of the amount of procedure in interdict or suspension processes?—No.

10,683. Mr. Webster.—I think your view is, that the Lord Ordinary, whoever he may be, that is dealing with the application in the first instance, shall merely pronounce the order for service, with or without granting an interim interdict?—Yes.

10,684. And that after that is served, and after answers have been lodged, the future discussion in the case shall go on in one of the three Divisions?—Precisely.

10,685. And that there is to be no discussion before a single judge upon the note and answers?—That is what I contemplate.

10,686. Mr. Clark.—Do you think the three courts would be able to overtake all that work?—I think they would.

10,687. Mr. Webster.—In reference to Mr. Shand's question about applying to any of the five Lords Ordinary, would there not be a risk of a party who has experimented on one judge, and found that he would not give the interim interdict, trying another judge who would have less scruples about it?—That system is, I believe, permitted in England, but I do not think it an expedient one. If a party has applied to a judge of his own selection for an interdict, and failed to get it, that ought to terminate the matter.

10,688. What check would you provide against that, unless there was only one clerk to such applications?—I have proposed that there shall be only one clerk. Unless there be only one clerk, I don't see how you could conveniently provide against it.

10,689. Mr. Shand.—Does it not occur to you, that even supposing such a thing were competent, a second judge, on being informed that that course had been taken, and that one judge had refused the interdict, would regard the application as one in which the petitioner had an additional onus on him?—Unless you maintain the Bill Chamber clerk, I do not see how he is to be informed of that. He is not likely to be informed by the applicant.

10,690. You take the case of an application in absence?—Such applications are for the most part in absence.

10,691. The Chairman.—You said you thought the three Divisions would be able to overtake all the business, without the Lords Ordinary. Have you any estimate of the number of cases decided by the Lords Ordinary that are appealed to the two Divisions?—I have not.

10,692. Have you any estimate of the number of cases in which the judgments of the Lords Ordinary are allowed to become final, without being appealed to the Divisions?—I do not know the precise statistics. I speak from my general knowledge of the court.

10,693. The business that goes into the Divisions at present appears to occupy two Divisions pretty fully, and these are the cases that are decided by four or five different Lords Ordinary, and they may be probably regarded as business sufficient to occupy the two Divisions. There are also cases which are not appealed to the Inner House. Do you think another Division would overtake all these?—I think, if a larger amount of business were thrown upon the court, it would find it necessary to economize its time much more than at present. A good deal of the time of the court is consumed at present, not perhaps in the most beneficial manner, by the practice of each judge stating his own opinion separately, where there is no substantial difference of opinion on the bench. Great saving of time might also be most beneficially attained by the court not allowing to counsel so much latitude as they are in the habit of doing. I think the court might often interpose, and curtail with great advantage the speeches; and probably such a system as I have suggested would make it absolutely necessary for the court to prevent, by these and other methods, the expenditure of time from which no advantage is reaped.

10,694. In regard to the time consumed by the judges in giving their opinions, you think that one judge ought generally to give the opinion of the court?—Whenever that is possible.

10,695. Is there not some risk of the public believing—I don't say rightly—that judges who merely express their concurrence had not taken the trouble to apply their minds thoroughly to the case?—I don't think so.

10,696. Mr. Webster.—In suggesting that there should be three courts, is it part of your suggestion that there should be any change in the system of pleading? Are you to suggest a change in the system of pleading as an accompaniment of your proposed change to three courts, or is the system of pleading to continue the same?—I think the system of pleading should be directed to bring cases as simply and speedily as possible under the consideration of the court.

10,697. How is that to be done? Do you mean that that is to be done by any change of the system, or by trying to work the present system better?—I don't propose to introduce any system essentially different from that which now prevails.

10,698. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Do you anticipate that the time of the four judges would be much occupied in the preparation of the causes?—I think it would not.

10,699. You propose, I think, that it should be very much done by utilizing the clerks acting with the agents in the preparation of the cases?—Yes, that the making up of the record should be in great measure performed by means of the clerks of court and the agents, without the intervention of counsel.

10,700. How would you dispose of motions for diligence, and matters of that description?—These, to a very large extent, might be disposed of in the same way.

10,701. Would you give the clerks power of absolute disposal, or would you have an appeal to the court in cases where parties were dissatisfied?—I think there should be a reference to the court or to some member of it.

10,702. There has lately been an introduction of the system of the clerks disposing of motions to a certain extent. Has it been found that that has lessened the expense, or otherwise?—I am not able to answer the question.

10,703. You have said that the present clerks are not fitted to discharge the function which you propose to give them. Do you contemplate having a class of clerks superior in point of position and emolument?—I think to some extent that would be necessary.

10,704. Then, as precedent to the third court, there would be the selection and appointment of these chief clerks, with proper salaries?—Yes.

10,705. With that, and with the constant appeals from clerks, I suppose the expense of preparing the record before four judges would come to be very considerable?—Not if you utilize the clerks of court. Otherwise, I think it would be difficult to conduct the business.

10,706. Have you found that a single judge gives a better and more expeditious disposal of these cases connected with the preparation of records and incident diligences, than when they are brought before four judges?—I do not think there is any difficulty in the preparation of records through the medium of the court, although consisting of four judges; nor that there should be more expense or delay; but it is necessary, if you are to have only three courts, that you should save as much as possible the time of the court, in order to enable it to overtake the business.

10,707. Have you noticed the difference of expense and of speed in the management of cases which have been to a certain extent in preparation in the Divisions, and in preparation before the Lords Ordinary?—At present the preparation of a record before the Division is exceptional; it is usually prepared before the Lord Ordinary; and, as may be expected where it is only done in exceptional cases, the business is not conducted in a satisfactory manner; but I think there is no essential difference in that matter between the Inner House and the Lords Ordinary.

10,708. Is there not the expense of the feeing of counsel at every stage in the Division, and the absence of that in cases of ordinary motions before the Lord Ordinary?—But I do not see why counsel should be fee'd before the Inner House for what they are not fee'd for before the Lords Ordinary; and I am of opinion that, in making up the record, the services of counsel should, as far as possible, be dispensed with.

10,709. And that the conducting of the matter in the Inner House should be left to agents?—Not so.

10,710. Before the clerk?—Yes.

10,711. Suppose there is an appeal from the clerk?—If it take place in open court, it must be done by counsel; but it is not necessary that should be the arrangement. The court may depute to any one of its number the decision of matters of that kind, and it might be done at chambers, not in open court.

10,712. Mr. Campbell.—You spoke of the inadequacy of the present staff of clerks to the discharge of the duties which you proposed should be devolved upon them. I presume you don't refer to the principal clerks of Session, but to the depute and assistant clerks?—The present class of clerks has not been selected with any view to the performance of the duties which I am now contemplating should be thrown upon them; and therefore I think it might be necessary to introduce into some of these offices clerks with peculiar aptitude for the work they would have to perform.

10,713. Lord Barcaple.—For the new work?—Yes, for the new work.

10,714. The Chairman.—And improved emoluments, probably?—In some cases with improved emoluments.

10,715. Mr. Campbell.—Don't you think the emoluments of the present first clerks of each Division would be sufficient emoluments for the first clerks of the three courts?—I think they might.

John Clerk Brodie.

10,716. And for such emoluments you might get three gentlemen quite able to discharge the duties you speak of?—Perhaps you would.

10,717. Lord Barcaple.—You were asked about the supervision thrown by statute on the Lords Ordinary in regard to the preparation of records. From your experience, does it appear to you that there is any material benefit got from that supervision?—I do not think there is much that would not be got under the new system.

10,718. Mr. Shand.—Do you contemplate that the pleadings should be prepared or revised by counsel under the system which you propose?—I have stated that I would propose to abolish pleas in law, that the summons might be prepared as far as possible by agents; and that it should be competent for agents also to prepare the defence, which is often a very simple matter; and that I thought it might be safely left to their discretion whether to employ counsel in these first stages of the case or not, being of opinion that they were not likely to dispense with the services of counsel unless they could safely do so. As regards revisal, I think it should be very much limited; but where it is necessary to revise, it may probably be found necessary to employ counsel.

10,719. Lord Barcaple.—Have you observed that in the last session revisal has almost ceased to exist?—I believe that is so.

10,720. Mr. Shand.—Then, revisal having ceased to exist practically, do you contemplate that in the great majority of cases the pleadings should be prepared by the agents alone?—I do not say in the great majority of cases, but in a very large class of cases. A large number of cases are so important, that agents will not, nor can they be expected to take responsibility in regard to them; but the saving of expense is not so very material in those cases as in the others which are less important.

10,721. The Chairman.—I think you distinguished between mere claims of debt and cases which involved other conclusions, such as declaratory actions or the like?—I did.

10,722. Mr. Shand.—Do you not think that with such a system, for which agents have not been trained, the result would be, that after the case advanced to its next stage it would be found that the pleadings in many cases required amendment, and so additional expense would be caused?—I have no fear of that.

10,723. Lord Barcaple.—Would you still contemplate, that while pleas in law are abolished, the record should disclose the grounds of action on the one hand, and the grounds of defence on the other?—Yes.

10,724. And that the parties, when they come to proof, shall not be entitled to any proof except with reference to those grounds of action and grounds of defence which are disclosed?—Not unless permitted by the court.

10,725. By an addition probably to the record?—Yes, if the court thought that necessary.

10,726. And possibly a stoppage of the procedure at the proof?—I think matters of that kind should, by the operation of the court itself, be simplified as much as possible, and that the court should direct its attention more to arriving at the justice of the case than the enforcing very stringent and technical rules.

10,727. But is there not a danger, on the other side, that a party—we shall say a pursuer—may come with evidence to prove his case, and to set aside all that he can see disclosed in the defences; but there may be another ground of defence undisclosed, and he has no evidence at all to meet that?—I can very well conceive cases in which it may be proper for the court to interfere, and to visit a party who has not conducted his case properly with censure.

10,728. And with the consequences, as to expense?—Certainly.

10,729. But would you consider it the duty of each party to disclose their grounds of action or defence, as the case might be, upon record?—I think the general rule should be for parties to disclose their case fully on record, but as shortly as possible.

10,730. The Chairman.—I think you said, at an early period of your examination, that you thought pleas in law should be dispensed with; and you assigned as a principal reason, that no agent ought to undertake to draw the pleas in law?—I did.

10,731. And that necessitated the employment of counsel, and added to the expense of the procedure?—Yes.

10,732. I rather think you made an exception in reference to actions of declarator and reduction. Did you mean to dispense with pleas in law even in these cases?—I meant to dispense with pleas in law in all cases.

10,733. Lord Barcaple.—Do pleas in law do anything else than disclose the grounds of action and of defence, if they are properly framed?—The grounds of action and defence may be stated in the summons and defence without pleas in law.

10,734. That is, the facts upon which they are rested?—Yes.

10,735. But, in the sense in which I use the term 'grounds of action' and 'grounds of defence,' that is not setting forth facts, but the pleadings upon these facts,—the legal grounds of action?—I think these may be safely left to be argued by counsel at the bar.

10,736. And to come out at the proof, without previous notice to the opposite party?—I think so.

10,737. Mr. Shand.—Has anything occurred to you as requiring amendment in regard to accountings?—The expense of accountings is often very considerable, and there is no table of fees for accountants, as for other practitioners. I think it would be advisable, if possible, that there should be such a table, but there are difficulties in framing it. I don't know that these difficulties are insuperable, and it would be an important object if it could be attained.

10,738. The Chairman.—What do you think are the chief difficulties?—I think the chief difficulty is, that the time employed in arithmetical calculation is very difficult to be judged of.

10,739. And there is no check upon it?—There is no check.

10,740. Does it occur to you that there might be an advantage in having one or more officials to do that duty under the control of the court?—I think it is a suggestion well worth considering.

10,741. Mr. Webster.—At present, the cost of investigation by accountants is borne by the litigants?—It is.

10,742. In place of being borne by the public, like other judicial expenses?—Yes.

10,743. Lord Barcaple.—Is there not a very large number of accountings in which private parties, very much apart from any question of litigation, get the benefit of having trust accounts, family accounts, or copartnery accounts, arranged and brought into proper order by the accountant to whom a remit is made?—There is.

10,744. Would it not be difficult to fix on any principle that should mediate equally between the public and those private parties, if they were as matter of course to get the benefit of those officials whom you propose?—It might be very just in such cases as you allude to, that the court should have power to throw on the private party a certain portion of the expense, or the whole, if it thought fit, and that that amount should go into the public exchequer.

10,745. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Do you know how the Court of Chancery deals with parties in that matter? Are not accounts there considered by an officer salaried by the State?—In some cases I believe they are.

10,746. Without any expense to the party?—I think so. I think there is no expense paid by the suitor to a public officer, but I am not well informed as to that.

10,747. Does it occur to you that there ought to be any distinction between the course here and the course in England in that respect?—I don't see why there should.

10,748. Lord Barcaple.—It is a common thing, I believe, in England for a partner to make application against his copartners, to have the accounts of the copartnery stated. Do you understand that that is done at the public expense, where he is successful in obtaining an accounting?—I should think not, but I really have no information to enable me to answer the question.

10,749. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Does anything occur to you in reference to processes in connection with teinds?—It is a difficult subject, but I think it would be a great advantage if the duties which the Court of Teinds now performs could be thrown into the ordinary duties of the Court of Session. Perhaps one of the things that would most facilitate the perfecting such an arrangement, would be the providing in some different manner for augmentations. If a satisfactory enactment could be framed establishing a proper principle on which augmentations should proceed, having reference to the various matters which influence the court in determining their amount, and fixing the periods at which a change might be made, I think it would be very desirable.

10,750. And with reference to other cases, you would have them introduced in the regular order of procedure in court—not distinguishing them?—I would.

10,751. I believe complaints are made of the delays in the Outer House in the disposal of the teind cases?—I would not propose to discontinue the institution of the Teind Office.

10,752. But you would allow the debates to be heard and the motions made in the ordinary rolls?—Yes.

10,753. And to be disposed of in the ordinary process of review?—Yes.

10,754. Lord Barcaple.—When you speak of its being desirable to have some definite principle fixed for the granting of augmentations, have you it in view to leave the granting of augmentations to the Teind Court, as at present constituted; or would you propose that if a legislative change were made, that also should go before one of the Divisions?—I should see no objection if definitive rules could be established by Act of Parliament, on which the court were to proceed, to committing the decision of the questions of augmentation to more than one court. Unless such rules were laid down, it might give rise to dissatisfaction, by reason of the supposed greater liberality of one court than another; and I think all that element should be excluded as much as possible, and that, as far as it could be accomplished, the duty to be performed by the court should be merely ministerial. If it were so limited, I should see no objection to all the three courts being open to any clergyman pursuing an augmentation.

10,755. Each of them?—Yes.

10,756. Do you see no objection to a function of that sort, which you say very truly is a ministerial function, and necessitating to some extent discretion, being performed by so small a body as four?—Not under such an arrangement as I am contemplating; but I am afraid that if the matter be left on its present footing, and the question of augmentation be so arbitrary as it is at this moment, it would scarcely be satisfactory to have more than one court open for the determination of such questions.

10,757. Do you think, in any view, it would be satisfactory to have so small a body as four persons disposing of that ministerial duty?—If it be simply ministerial, I don't see any objection to it.

10,758. Is it not very common, that a ministerial and discretionary duty committed to commissioners is performed by a body rather larger than that?—I am not aware.

10,759. Do you conceive the duty to be in any proper sense of the word judicial?—I don't think that at present it is in any proper sense judicial; but if principles were laid down upon which the court should proceed, so as to reduce it to a mere legal question, so to speak, whether a minister was entitled to an augmentation, I think it might very fairly be left to be determined by any one of three courts, the minister having his choice of any one of them.

10,760. Can you give us any suggestion generally as to what the nature of the principles to be fixed should be?—I have already said it is a matter of much difficulty. Various interests enter into it which it would be very difficult to deal with; but perhaps a commission might settle in each parish the state of the teinds and the fund available for the minister, and that fund might be operated upon in fixed cycles of years, as at present, giving determinate weight to the elements of the population and extent of the parish, and those other elements which now in a general way enter into the consideration of the question.

10,761. Would that be discretionary to any extent?—I should endeavour to limit the discretion as far as possible.

10,762. But in so far as it would be discretionary, do you think it is right to commit such a duty to one of the ordinary courts of law?—It may be possible a better tribunal might be found.

10,763. Are you at all aware what amount of time prior to this last session, when a change was made, had for some years back been employed in the sittings of the Teind Court?—I don't know the statistics, but I know that a large portion of time is expended by the court on these matters, and to the great inconvenience of its ordinary business.

10,764. You mean by the full Teind Commission sitting?—Until very recently it was necessary that the full Teind Commission should sit.

10,765. And what you mean is, that a large amount of time was expended, to the inconvenience of the other suitors, by the full Teind Commission sitting?—Yes.

10,766. It sat once a fortnight: have you any idea how long they sat upon an average?—I cannot speak with accuracy.

10,767. What would you call a large amount of time?—With the whole court sitting together, and thereby entirely obstructing the ordinary and proper business of the court, I should think one hour a large amount of time.

10,768. The Chairman.—One hour a fortnight?—I consider even one hour a fortnight a large amount of time to be taken up from the ordinary business of the court.

10,769. Lord Barcaple.—You mean with the nine judges sitting?—Yes.

10,770. Mr. Shand.—In point of fact, do you know that it was a considerable obstruction to business?—There can be no doubt of it.

10,771. The Lord Justice-Clerk. — That has now ceased?—It has now in great measure ceased.

10,772. Mr. Webster. — I think you made it an element in what you said, that there should be an ascertainment by a commission of the state of the teinds of each parish?—Yes.

10,773. Is not that a matter which is found to be attended with very great difficulty, and to lead to a very great deal of litigation with individual heritors?—It is, when judicially inquired into by a court of law; and one of the main objects I should have in view would be to render such inquiry unnecessary.

10,774. Lord Barcaple.—How would you expect to get quit of the questions that are arising as to valuations of teinds,—whether they are good or bad, and whether they apply to the particular lands? Would these things be inquired into by the commission you suggest, or would a report of that commission, once for all, shut the mouths of everybody on that subject?—I think the report of the commission should finally determine it.

10,775. Do you understand, however, that the commission should have inquired into that matter, or that they should determine it from such investigations as they made themselves?—I think it a great discredit on our system, that we have questions of the kind now alluded to depending on what has taken place more than two centuries ago, and ending, as they not unfrequently end, in the inversion of a possession which has existed during all that period. I think it a great public object to put an end to that state of things, and that it would be very advisable to have that inquired into by a properly constituted commission, who should have power to determine what, according to their view, was the state of the teinds in the parish, and the state of the rights of the parties.

John Clerk Brodie.

10,776. Then you would anticipate that the commission would call for production of valuations and other rights?—I should.

10,777. And that they should adjudicate upon them?—Yes.

10,778. And that they should allow the parties to state their views, and be heard by counsel?—If they thought fit.

10,779. Would that not be equivalent, or nearly so, to a locality in every parish in Scotland?—I think not.

10,780. To all the questions about a locality, short of the formal matter discharged by the Teind clerk, when he simply performs an arithmetical operation after the principles are investigated?—I believe there would not be so much contention in a matter that did not immediately affect the purses of individuals, but might only possibly do so at a long distance of years. I think the contention would not be nearly so great as it is in localities.

10,781. You would probably be prepared strongly to recommend some such proceeding, altogether apart from any question about the constitution of the Teind Court?—I should.

10,782. As a matter of public policy?—As a matter of public policy.

10,783. Mr. Webster.—Would you favour us with your view in regard to the system of trial by jury in civil cases?—Jury trial in civil cases has never properly taken root in this country. I don't think there is a great amount of confidence in the verdicts of juries; and my belief is, that the public at large have much more confidence in the judgments of our courts of law upon proofs led before them, than they have in the verdicts of juries in cases remitted for jury trial.

10,784. The system is attended with great uncertainty, and I believe with very great expense?—With very great expense, and much uncertainty.

10,785. Have you not in practice frequently advised clients rather to abandon claims, or to make great concessions, than to hazard a trial by jury?—I have frequently done so.

10,786. Mr. Shand.—Would you propose, then, to abolish jury trials in civil cases?—There is a class of cases which I think it may be hardly fair to throw on our courts of law for decision—cases in which the question is really not so much for a lawyer on the evidence, as for a sensible man of affairs. In that class of cases I am afraid that it would not be possible to dispense with jury trial; but I think that in a very large class of cases—perhaps all except those that come under that category—it would be for the benefit of the public at large that jury trial should be dispensed with.

10,787. Mr. Campbell.—Would you give us some illustrations of the category to which you refer?—Actions of damages, for instance, where you have to fix the amount of damages, but have nothing to go upon except an arbitrary view, and where a jury might give £200 or £1000.

10,788. You think that would be much better left to a jury?—I think so. I don't think it fair to throw cases of that kind upon the court.

10,789. You are aware that in the Sheriff Court such cases are constantly disposed of without a jury?—I am aware that they are.

10,790. Don't you think that the decisions of the Sheriff are usually more reasonable than those of juries?—In the Sheriff Court the amount is, generally speaking, extremely limited, and there it might not be necessary to make any alteration. I would not contemplate doing so.

10,791. The Chairman.—You spoke of questions of damage. Are not these a very large class of cases? Did you mean certain cases of damage?—I meant certain cases.

10,792. You don't mean cases of breach of contract?—No.

10,793. You mean cases of personal injury, or cases of slander?—Yes, that is the class of cases to which I particularly allude.

10,794. What do you say to cases of reduction on the ground of fraud?—I would entrust these to the court.

10,795. Mr. Webster.—Where, besides the question of the amount of damage, there was also involved the legal question of liability as between master and servant, or the like, would you send that class of cases in both branches to the jury, or would you have it disposed of by the court?—I think, in the case of master and servant, it would be best disposed of by the court.

10,796. Lord Barcaple.—On what ground do you say that you would not send actions of damages for breach of contract to a jury, while you would send other actions of damages to them?—Where there is a legal question in regard to the contract, and the legal question and the matter of damage are much mixed up together, I think the case is more proper for a court of law than a jury.

10,797. That is, in consequence of the legal element?—Yes.

10,798. Does not the legal element exist very generally in all actions that go to a jury?—Yes, to some extent.

10,799. Mr. Webster.—In cases of breach of contract there may not be the difficulty in proving actual damage which exists in cases of slander and the like?—In cases of that kind you have generally much less for arbitrary determination than in the others.

10,800. Lord Barcaple.—But you have not necessarily any actual measure of damage from the statement of the case upon the issue?—You may not; but it is not a matter so widely discretionary as in other cases.

10,801. You say that jury trial is thought to be extremely uncertain. In what sense is it uncertain, more than all other results of litigation?—I wish it could be said that the result of a jury trial was equally certain with the result of a case in a court of law.

10,802. In what sense do you say it is uncertain?—That there is no knowing what a jury may do.

10,803. And probably each party has an opposite opinion from that of the other as to what the jury will do?—There are a good many cases in which an opinion may be formed with some satisfaction as to what a jury ought to do, but whether that will be done or not is very problematical.

10,804. Have you found that experienced counsel have had much difficulty in giving you advice as to what was likely to be the result of an action which must be sent to a jury?—Counsel will give you an opinion, but you cannot always rely on that opinion being justified by the result.

10,805. Have you found that they have been more generally mistaken in that matter, than in advising you about the probable result of an action which would be decided without the intervention of a jury?—I think counsel are very chary of stating the probable result of a jury trial.

10,806. Have you found that their opinion, when given, was less generally correct in regard to the probable result of an action which would go to a jury, than when given with reference to an action which would be decided without a jury?—I think so.

10,807. Mr. Webster.—Even taking into view the element, that wherever there was anything like sympathy that could be excited, there would be greater chance of the jury giving effect to that feeling?—When feelings of that kind operate, it is really quite impossible to tell what may be the result of a jury trial.

10,808. Lord Barcaple.—It may be impossible to put a precise figure on the amount of damages to be given; but have you not found that experienced counsel and experienced agents, relying upon their knowledge of men, can form a pretty good idea of the prospects of a case before a jury?—I think counsel are very frequently mistaken, and agents also, in regard to the results of jury trial.

10,809. You say you have very often advised your clients rather to give up their case than go before a jury. Have you not very often advised your clients not to prosecute a case at all, even when there was no risk of its going before a jury?—The question whether the client should prosecute his case or not, depends very much on the extent of his interest. Unless the stake is something considerable, it is often better to endeavour to settle the question, than to enter upon litigation in a court of law; but the chances are much less easily calculated in jury trial than in ordinary cases before the law courts.

10,810. Has the expense of jury trial been an element with you in advising your clients?—Yes, a very considerable element.

10,811. Do you think that the juries have been properly selected? Has there been a proper representation, do you think, of different classes of people upon the juries?—Juries certainly vary very much, owing to the manner in which they are chosen. You may get a more or less intelligent jury.

10,812. But, as a general rule, do you think that juries are sufficiently carefully selected, so as to give a fair proportion of persons of intelligence and knowledge of the world?—I think it would often be of advantage to have a higher grade of jurymen than you have.

10,813. Mr. Shand.—Do you see any objection to leaving matters on the footing on which they now stand—leaving it to the court to determine in each case according to their view, whether it should or should not go to a jury for investigation of the facts?—I think that duty should not be thrown unqualifiedly upon the court.

10,814. Do you propose, by Act of Parliament, that jury trials should be limited to certain cases, and that it should not be competent in any other?—You must carry out the object by Act of Parliament; there is no other mode by which you can do it.

10,815. Lord Barcaple.—Have you had much experience of the proofs which have been recently substituted for jury trials?—No; not personally.

10,816. Do you know whether it has been proved satisfactory to your branch of the profession?—I think it has.

10,817. Do you know what their experience has been in regard to the expense?—My impression is, it is considered an improvement upon the old system.

10,818. You mean upon jury trial?—Yes.

10,819. Do you mean that they have found it to be much less expensive than jury trial?—I think so.

10,820. But you have not personally had much experience of it?—I have not. I am speaking from impression.

10,821. Do you say the same in regard to the time occupied?—Yes.

10,822. You have not been present at any such proofs?—I have not.

10,823. I think you put value on what you said as to the judge having seen the witnesses. What is the ground on which you particularly put value on the judge having seen the witnesses?—I think a judge, having the witness before him, can form a better estimate of the person he has to deal with, and of the value of his evidence.

10,824. Of his credibility?—Of his credibility.

10,825. Do you think that, in a very large proportion of cases, there is really a serious question about the credibility of witnesses?—It is not merely as to credibility, but mistake. A person may be perfectly honest in telling you what he himself believes; but you may see, from his exhibition in the witness-box, that he is very liable to be mistaken.

10,826. That is credibility; but do you think there is a large proportion of cases in which credibility, including that, is a serious question?—I think there is a great number of cases in which the value you can attach to the evidence of a particular witness depends to a considerable extent upon his appearance in the witness-box.

10,827. If there is a doubt about his credibility, either from his having given wilfully or innocently false evidence, but not otherwise. But do you think that in the class of cases that are the subject of proof in the Court of Session, there is a large majority of them where the question of credibility of witnesses, in the sense you have explained, enters materially into the decision of the causes?—No; I don't think that in the great majority of causes that is so. But I think there are a great many cases in which it is true; and that the judge who tries the case has to that extent considerable advantage over any one who has merely the written proof upon which to form an opinion.

10,828. Do you think that, as a general rule, one judge sitting alone, and without an opportunity of communicating with any person on the subject, is a better judge of the credibility of evidence than twelve reasonably well-selected persons, who have an opportunity of talking about it among themselves?—I think the education and training of the one man, and the liability to sympathetic feelings, and a number of other influences which frequently prevail in the twelve, render the one man a tribunal superior to the twelve.

10,829. A superior tribunal for judging of the credibility of the witnesses, do you mean?—A superior tribunal for judging of the effect of the evidence generally.

10,830. But my question, in the first instance, referred to judging of the credibility of the witnesses?—I think the one man is often the best judge of the credibility of the witness.

10,831. Do you mean better than any one of the twelve, or better than the whole twelve?—Better than the whole twelve.

10,832. The Chairman.—Have you any suggestion to make about criminal business?—I think every judge of the Court of Session should be a judge of Justiciary.

10,833. Lord Barcaple.—Do you see any benefit that would arise from the change?—It would more equally distribute the business.

10,834. Mr. Webster.—The Justiciary judges do not take Bill Chamber work, and those who are not Justiciary judges take the Bill Chamber?—I see no reason for these distinctions. I think all the judges in the Court of Session should perform the same class of duties.

10,835. Mr. Shand.—But the present system has been found to work very well?—I am making no complaint of the manner in which the business of the Court of Justiciary is conducted. My experience of it, during the long time I was connected with it, left on my mind the impression that the business was extremely well conducted.

10,836. Lord Barcaple.—You must keep in view that there are three circuits, none of them very extensive, and apparently that may have entered a little into the reason for limiting the number of Justiciary judges?—Originally there was a separate salary attached to the office of Justiciary judge. I believe that to have been the origin of the distinction between Justiciary and Court of Session judges. But that distinction no longer exists. There is another matter connected with criminal business. It is a question whether the jurisdiction of the Sheriff in criminal matters should be extended; and there is a class of cases in which it might be advisable that such extension should take place. For instance, in cases of robbery, it is often a question whether the case really amounts to robbery, or is simply theft; and at present the Sheriff has power to award a punishment which is apt for the one, and has not power to award the punishment that may be apt for the other. I think the jurisdiction of the Sheriff might be beneficially extended to enable him to inflict penal servitude in cases of that description; but I see no occasion to extend his jurisdiction generally to cases in which penal servitude is usually inflicted.

10,837. Mr. Baxter.—Cases of robbery, and thefts with many previous convictions—you would extend the Sheriff's jurisdiction to these?—I think not. Robbery, where there have been many convictions, is a very serious offence.

10,838. But I mean theft, where there have been many convictions?—Theft, where there have been many convictions, I should be inclined to say might be dealt with by the Sheriff, with power, in those cases, to inflict penal servitude.

10,839. Mr. Webster.—We have had a great deal of evidence about extending the jurisdiction of the Sheriff to cases which are at present competent only in the Court of Session; would you give us your view as to any change of that kind which you think might be desirable?—One matter which has been very much mooted is the giving Sheriffs a jurisdiction in matters affecting heritable rights. I think, within proper limits, such a jurisdiction might be advantageously given them; for in regard to subjects of very small value, the limitation of jurisdiction absolutely to the Court of Session amounts almost to a denial of justice, and the decision in these cases would not tend to unsettle the law of heritable rights. But it would seem to me a very unwise thing to give Sheriffs jurisdiction generally in heritable rights, which would probably have the effect of introducing conflicting decisions, and unsettling the law. I think that is a department of the law in which it is peculiarly advisable to have certainty as far as that can be obtained; and I see no expediency in giving more than a very limited jurisdiction to Sheriffs in matters of heritable right.

10,840. In regard to the appointment of judicial factors, factors loco tutoris, and curators bonis, would you approve of the Sheriff having jurisdiction?—Where an estate is of very trifling value, it might perhaps be given; but I would not give a general jurisdiction to the Sheriff in all such cases. It might be limited, as in suspensions, to a particular amount. There is no complaint of the mode in which the jurisdiction of the Court of Session has been exercised in these matters, and I believe it has been exercised with perfect satisfaction to the community. In regard to suspensions, which are limited at present to £25, I think the jurisdiction of the Sheriff might with advantage be extended, and probably doubled.

10,841. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—If power were given to the Sheriff to appoint tutors, would the estate be brought under the surveillance of the officer of the Court of Session?—I think it ought to be so.

10,842. Do you think much advantage would be gained by going to the Sheriff Court for the appointment, and coming to the officer of the Court of Session for his superintendence?—There might be some saving of expense in carrying through the original application, which would be an advantage in such cases as I have in view.

10,843. The Chairman.—It has been suggested that that expense might be considerably lessened by giving a jurisdiction to the Sheriff in Chancery to make these appointments, where the parties choose to apply to him?—I don't think that would be so satisfactory as the present system. I believe the jurisdiction of the Court of Session in that matter is exercised with perfect satisfaction to the public at large.

10,844. Mr. Shand.—Do you see any reason why such appointments should not be made in the Court of Session, by manuscript applications, at considerably less expense than is now incurred?—I think that would be very proper.

10,845. Such applications, until within recent years, were made to the Divisions of the court, and printing and boxing of the applications was necessary. Is there any reason whatever now for maintaining the system of printing and boxing a number of petitions in an application of that kind, any more than printing and boxing a summons presented to the court?—I think not.

10,846. Lord Barcaple.—I suppose printing sometimes is not a cause of additional expense, where copies can be used for service?—Printing is a saving of expense if you have several copies to make. If you require three, or certainly four copies, printing is not an additional expense.

10,847. Mr. Webster.—What is your opinion as to extending the jurisdiction of the Sheriff to cases of declarator of marriage, divorce, legitimacy, and separation and aliment?—These cases do not all fall under the same category. In regard to cases of aliment, I see no objection to the Sheriff having jurisdiction. But in regard to cases of declarator of marriage or divorce, I think there is grave objection to any such jurisdiction being conferred on the Sheriff.

10,848. In regard to the privileges of agents, a suggestion has been made that every agent should have the privilege of practising in every court; and another suggestion has been made, that agents before one Sheriff Court should have the right to practise before every other Sheriff Court. If you have considered the subject of the privileges of agents in connection with these matters, would you give us your view upon it?—I see no objection to the whole inferior court procurators of Scotland, especially those who pass under the Procurators Act, being allowed to practise not only in all the Sheriff Courts, but in the Court of Session. I don't know that they would largely take advantage of that privilege; but if there be any desire on the part of the procurators in Scotland for such a system, it does not appear to me that there is any objection to it.

10,849. If that were adopted, how would you manage the system of borrowing processes, so as to enable the adverse party to get the papers when really wanted?—The country practitioner must not carry off to the country the papers of the Court of Session. He must be dealt with as any other agent in the Court of Session, and be responsible to the clerk of court in the first instance, and then to the court itself.

10,850. Lord Barcaple.—But assume that he has carried them off?—Then he must be responsible, as any one else, to the court.

10,851. Are you confident that at present processes are not transmitted to the country?—They may be transmitted at present to the country on the responsibility of the agent, who is aware of the state of the case, and the possibility there may be of the document being required. The same thing would hold as regards the country practitioner.

10,852. Mr. Webster.—You would have no one in the immediate vicinity who might be taken up on caption?—The caption of the court is sufficient to reach the agent in any part of Scotland.

10,853. The Chairman.—Perhaps not within the time that you want the process?—That might occasionally be an inconvenience.

10,854. But would there be any difficulty in country agents having an arrangement by which somebody in Edinburgh might be responsible, and represent them for the borrowing?—I think none. Such a system might possibly introduce this state of things, that a country agent who has conducted a lengthy case in the inferior court, and is thoroughly conversant with it, sending it up to the Court of Session, might take a considerable charge of it in that court. In that event, without increased expense to the client, there might be reasonable distribution of the ordinary costs between the country practitioner and the Edinburgh agent. If the inferior court practitioners have any desire for that state of things, I see no objection to it.

10,855. Do you see any objection to doing away with what is understood to be pactum illicitum as between agents—namely, participation in the profits?—I see no objection to it.

10,856. Mr. Webster.—Is it your view, that exclusive privileges of practising in courts of law should be abolished? Take such as exist in Glasgow, with the Faculty of Procurators before the Sheriff Courts there; in Aberdeen, with the advocates; in Edinburgh, with the solicitors-at-law. Is it your view that all such exclusive privileges should be abolished?—It is.

10,857. As to writers to the signet, do you see any necessity or reason for keeping up the system of signeting summonses, as distinguished from any other mode of authenticating them,—a large part of the business of the court being done not by writers to the signet, but by solicitors?—I myself put no value upon it whatever.

10,858. In regard to counsel, we have had some suggestions made about having a table of fees. Would you favour us with your views as to the expediency or possibility of constructing a table that would really operate suitably for conducting the business of the court as to fees of counsel?—I think you cannot have a table of fees for counsel. The remuneration to counsel should always depend on the estimate which the agent may form of the trouble counsel will have in the case; for I believe that to be the best security for all concerned. One exception to this has grown up recently in what are known as continuation fees, which are based upon a supposed etiquette that an additional fee should be sent to counsel for every day the case may be in the roll.

10,859. Mr. Webster.—Where anything has been done, however little?—Yes. I have some reason to believe that that practice may be found not to have the sanction of the Faculty of Advocates; and, at all events, I think it should be done away with. In many cases it considerably increases the expense; and it is an exception, and I think an unnecessary and improper one, to the ordinary rule, that the solicitor judges in each case what is the proper fee.

10,860. Mr. Campbell.—And it would not interfere with his discretion in sending an additional fee, if the case turned out to be more protracted than he anticipated?—Certainly not; it has always been the custom to send an additional fee to counsel where there has been greater trouble than was anticipated.

10,861. Mr. Shand.—Do you not think that many of the adjournments which take place might be very advantageously avoided by a case which is partly heard, it may be to-day, being taken on at a much earlier period on the following day than it often is?—I think the more continuity can be observed in the discussion of a case the better.

10,862. Do you not think that, according to the existing practice, there is a good deal of interruption to continuity of cases, by beginning new work in the early part of the day, and then taking up a partly heard case of the day before?—I have heard frequent complaints of it.

10,863. Have you any suggestion to make about costs?—I think it inexpedient that the rule should exist, that two counsel are necessary in a case; so that if a party has only one counsel, and he happens to be engaged for the moment in another Division, the agent should be complained of that he has not employed two counsel. That system necessitates in all cases the employment of two counsel, and adds very much to the expense. It is a matter which can only be modified by the court itself; but I don't know that it is out of place to mention it here, for it would be very expedient that some different arrangement should be made. I am sure an alteration in the practice of the court would be very satisfactory to the profession; for I know that very great objection is made.

10,864. Would you make that a rule that should be applied in every case, or only in cases of a particular class? Suppose a case to involve a considerable stake, do you not think it is reasonable to enforce the rule?—In any case in which the court intimated that it thought a second counsel necessary, a second counsel would be at once employed, and it could enforce that if necessary; but I think the general rule should be, that only one counsel need be employed.

10,865. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Unless the cases where single counsel are retained were considered exceptional, might it not lead to great disturbance of the rolls, and to putting off cases, and interfering with other arrangements?—I don't think so. I am old enough to recollect when a very distinguished member of the bar, ultimately on the bench—I mean Mr. Adam Anderson, afterwards Lord Anderson—had a very large practice as single counsel; and no business was better performed than that which he conducted as single counsel. But it would be perfectly impossible, according to the rules of court as at present understood by the profession, that any such business could now be conducted.

10,866. Lord Barcaple.—You mean in the Inner House?—I am speaking of the Inner House.

10,867. Do you understand that there has been a change of rule since that time?—Yes. I have frequently heard very great complaints on the subject.

10,868. Mr. Shand.—Mr. Anderson was in very large practice. What occurred when cases in which he was alone were called while he was engaged elsewhere?—They were put off for him, and no inconvenience was experienced.

10,869. Would it not occasion frequent inconvenience where case after case was put off in that way, and other cases brought on unexpectedly?—It was not found to do so.

10,870. The Chairman.—In regard to Mr. Anderson, were the court always in use to put off all the cases in which he was single counsel?—I think no material inconvenience was found to arise from the court putting them off.

10,871. But was it their use to put off the cases in which he was counsel, and not to put off cases in which other parties were counsel?—It was the practice to put them off not only for Mr. Anderson, but for any counsel similarly situated.

10,872. But it would be a very considerable interruption of the business of the court in many cases, if by the mere non-employment of a second counsel a case was to be stopped, that had been put out for hearing for the day; and the inconvenience might be materially increased if the court were to sit in three Divisions?—It has been often suggested that there should be a division of the bar between the Divisions; and if the consequence of having no such division be to render it necessary to have two counsel in every case, and so to infer much additional expense, it seems a considerable argument in favour of that division.

10,873. Do you think the business of the Court of Session is such as would induce counsel of eminence to confine themselves to one Division? Would it not be accompanied perhaps with this, that if you wished the services of that counsel in another Division, you would have to give him a special retainer?—I don't think it advisable, if it can be avoided, to have any such division of counsel; but the circumstance that we have no such division, renders it highly desirable that the court, so far as it can, should make such arrangements as will not deprive the public of the means of conducting their cases at the least possible expense.

10,874. Would this meet your view, that the court should exercise its discretion in regard to the matter in the particular case? If you make it the general rule, that one counsel should be sufficient, then generally there would only be one counsel in each case?—Of course it would always be open to the court, if in any case they thought fit, to direct that another counsel should be employed.

10,875. But in the meantime the case would stop. The case is called, and counsel is in another Division. You cannot conjure up a counsel on the spot?—That has often occurred in my experience; and I don't recollect of any material inconvenience arising from it.

10,876. What was done?—The case was delayed.

10,877. When was it taken again?—If counsel could not come, the agent took notes, and handed them to him when he came; but if it was necessary that he should speak, the case was delayed for him.

10,878. When was it taken again?—The court generally fixed a time for that.

10,879. Mr. Baxter.—At present, have you often to go on in the absence of senior counsel?—In the Outer House you have frequently to go on without senior counsel. It often happens that very little is obtained for the fees given to senior counsel.

10,880. Lord Barcaple.—Do you know whether there has been a considerable change in that respect in the Outer House since the passing of the Act of Sederunt in 1866, making the procedure much more peremptory?—I understand it is often the case that the services of the senior counsel employed are not obtained before the Lord Ordinary at all.

10,881. Do you know that it frequently happens that the senior counsel in the Outer House have to take the whole burden of the case if the junior counsel is engaged elsewhere?—Yes; but I think that duty is seldom thrown on senior counsel.

10,882. It happens universally, if the junior counsel is elsewhere?—If the senior be present, and the junior not present, the senior must of course take the case.

10,883. And that was not so before 1866?—But it rarely happens that the senior is present and the junior absent. The common case is, that the senior is absent and the junior present.

10,884. It can hardly be said that it very rarely happens that the junior is absent. Juniors are very frequently absent, and very frequently the seniors have to speak?—I think that is not the view of the profession.

10,885. The Chairman.—I daresay you recollect the time when in the Inner House a junior counsel seldom spoke at all?—Perfectly.

10,886. Have you any other suggestion to make?—The fees of counsel have very largely increased in my time, and great complaint is made of their amount. It is not easy to apply a check, but it would seem to me of great importance that the court should support the auditor, in taxing fees of counsel, more than they have been in the habit of doing. It is the only check that exists in regard to counsel's fees; and if it be withdrawn, or not applied, the grievance may come to be very serious. It is already considered extremely oppressive.

10,887. Is there not a certain amount of check in the hands of the agents?—Undoubtedly there is, inasmuch as the agent is the person by whom the fee is sent; but I believe there is no effectual check on counsel's fees except the one I have adverted to—namely, an application of the rule of audit when the account comes before the auditor for taxation. If counsel's fees were allowed to be regulated by the auditor in taxation, I believe there would come to be something like rules which would be followed; but unless in some such way, I fear the evil, which is considerable, will not be abated.

10,888. There was a time when the discretion or liberality of agents was exceedingly various; but I suppose the greatest expense in that way arises in jury trials?—Not exclusively in jury trials; but jury trials are a very prominent instance.

10,889. Are you aware that three or four years ago the court made a very considerable reduction of counsel's fees, and gave a sort of indication that that was the utmost that would be allowed, excepting in very rare cases?—I am aware that sometimes the court have to a certain extent interfered: but it is very important that they should do so efficiently; because there can be no doubt that a great deal of the expense that is so much complained of arises from the very much larger fees now paid to counsel than used to be paid to them in former days.

10,890. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Are you aware of any case recently in which the auditor disallowed a portion of counsel's fees, which was restored by the court?—I am not; but the impression is, that the auditor has very limited authority in that matter.

10,891. The Chairman.—I think the auditor was deterred a good deal at one time by such expressions as this, that the agent was the best judge of the fees, and that his discretion ought not to be interfered with; but that has not been a rule. The auditor has been sustained several times in dealing with fees; but you think he ought to be more uniformly sustained?—I think so. The auditor has no interest whatever except to do his public duty, and to allow such an amount of fees as may seem to be reasonable. The whole case is before him in the account, and the parties on each side state their views; and I think there can be no better judge as to what is a fair and reasonable fee to give to counsel in the circumstances. If confidence were reposed in him, and he were allowed to judge without much check of that matter, I think it would allay much of the discontent which pervades the profession in regard to the expense occasioned by large fees to counsel.

10,892. Lord Barcaple.—Any portion of the counsel's fees which the auditor taxes off, I presume, is made by the agent a charge against his own client?—No doubt it may.

10,893. Do you know how the auditor deals with such an account between agent and client in regard to that surplus fee which he has taxed off in his account against the opposite party?—I don't know how the auditor deals with it; but the taxation of accounts between agent and client is much more rare than between party and party. The auditor may allow a somewhat higher fee in those cases; but in that case also, I think he ought to have power to use the pruning-knife when he thinks fit.

10,894. The Chairman.—The agent may consider it, in the exercise of a sound discretion, right to give a somewhat larger fee than the court may sustain as a good charge against the opposite party?—He may.

10,895. Mr. Webster.—But giving it only in the interest of his client, would you permit the auditor to interfere with what the agent in his discretion had done?—I would. If the auditor thought the fee far too much to be sent by the agent in such circumstances, I think he ought to have a power of curtailing it. It may happen that the agent, in the performance of his duty to his client, thinks it necessary to secure the services of a particular counsel, and cannot obtain these services except by giving him a certain fee; and discretion should in such a case be allowed him; but I think the discretion should be always subject to the supervision of the auditor, who should have authority to deal with agents' accounts whether taxed as between party and party, or between agent and client. I have not the least fear that he would perform that duty otherwise than justly and satisfactorily.

10,896. The Chairman.—Is it now the case that counsel estimate their own value in that way, and do not leave it to the agent?—Sometimes I believe it practically is so; counsel may not do it themselves, but their clerks sometimes do it for them.

FRIDAY, 2D APRIL 1869.

Members Present:—

LORD COLONSAY.
THE LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.
THE LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.
JAMES CAMPBELL, Esq.
GEORGE HARRISON, Esq.
JAMES ADAM, Esq.
A. B. SHAND, Esq.
JAMES WEBSTER, Esq.
J. B. BAXTER, Esq.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD COLONSAY IN THE CHAIR.

Patrick Fraser.

PATRICK FRASER, Esq., examined.

10,897. The Chairman.—You are a member of the bar?—I am.

10,898. In what year did you come to the bar?—1843.

10,899. You are Sheriff of Renfrewshire?—Yes.

10,900. You have been so for several years?—I have been so since January 1862.

10,901. You have two seats of court in Renfrewshire—one at Greenock, and one at Paisley?—Yes.

10,902. And a substitute at each place?—Yes.

10,903. In Greenock, I suppose, there is a good deal of occasion for the exercise of the maritime jurisdiction of the Sheriff?—A very great deal,—perhaps as much as at any other port in Scotland. In reference to that, I may say that I have had frequent complaints made as to the necessity of having two arrestments—an arrestment to found jurisdiction, and an arrestment upon the dependence. Unless the arrestment upon the dependence is used at once, and the ship dismantled, the captain is off next morning.

10,904. Mr. Baxter.—Have you any complaints of this kind: A great many foreign vessels come to our ports, and disputes arise about freights; the foreign captain is obliged to sail with his ship, and cannot get a settlement of his freight, and there is no summary process by which he can compel it?—A very great number. That is a great hardship. The ordinary process of the Sheriff Court does not meet that case at all. The captain must take the terms of the consignee, whatever these may be.

10,905. Do you think it would be an advantage to have some summary process for adjudicating between the captain and the consignee, before the Sheriff-substitute or otherwise; or can you devise any remedy for that?—It is very difficult to devise a remedy, because the consignee might wish an appeal; and unless you made the judgment final, the remedy would be imperfect.

10,906. It is almost coercion by the one party, for the other cannot stop?—That is quite true. I have thought that the Sheriff with two experts—merchants—might constitute a court. The Sheriff might not be bound to follow their opinion, but I think a court like that might satisfy mercantile men in Greenock, and meet the occasion.

10,907. The Chairman.—Have you considered generally the remedies you would apply to the imperfection of the maritime jurisdiction?—I don't know any clamant grievances except that. It works very smoothly. The remedies under the Mercantile Shipping Act are very summary, and the ordinary Admiralty jurisdiction is very good. We grant warrants for unlading vessels, and there is no difficulty in doing that; the only difficulty arises when there is a quarrel between the foreign captain and the merchant, and sometimes when there is a quarrel between the foreign captain and his sailors.

10,908. Mr. Webster.—And between claimants on the foreign captain?—Yes; they arrest him as in meditatione fugæ, and in order to get loosed he must simply submit; but otherwise, from all my experience of Admiralty jurisdiction, I think it is very good, and I have no alteration to suggest.

10,909. You would keep up the power of arresting vessels?—Certainly. You arrest to found jurisdiction, but that don't dismantle the vessel; and unless you go vi et armis and seize hold of the vessel itself, the captain is away before any effectual diligence can be done against him. He does not care for an interdict. Now the one arrestment should be sufficient, and it should authorize the immediate seizing of the vessel and putting a man on board.

10,910. Mr. Baxter.—Then you think the arrestment jurisdictionis should have that effect?—Yes. I don't see any meaning in an arrestment jurisdictionis unless it imposes some nexus upon the thing arrested.

10,911. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Has it not been found very hard that damages are not obtainable when a vessel has been dismantled and detained on a false ground, unless in the special case of malice?—It has been decided that if you dismantle a vessel, damages are due; but in the case of an ordinary arrestment, it has been decided that damages are not due unless there is malice.

10,912. The effect of an arrestment of a vessel is not merely to found jurisdiction, but the arrestment detains it in port?—But damages are due for that, and it has been so decided.

10,913. Without malice?—Yes.

10,914. From the mere fact of the arrestment?—From the mere fact of detaining the vessel. If damage results from that, damages are claimable; but where you arrest a sum of money in a bank, it has been decided that without malice no damages are due.

10,915. Mr. Baxter.—Would you have the arrestment just to proceed on the summons?—Yes.

10,916. You would have some time within which to call the summons?—I would make it as summary as possible.

10,917. Mr. Webster.—The service and the calling?—Yes.

10,918. Mr. Baxter.—Would you have the summons competent in the Sheriff Court?—Yes.

10,919. At present the arrestment is competent in the Sheriff Court, but the summons is not?—Yes.

10,920. Mr. Webster.—Then you would subject foreigners to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff?—Yes; foreigners are subjected to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff at present. That is my construction of the statutes. The admiral-deputes had jurisdiction over foreign captains, and the whole of their jurisdiction was transferred to the Sheriff by the Act 1 and 2 Will. iv. c. 69; and Lord Barcaple so decided in a case before him.

10,921. Was that not decided in a case of Warden and Pirie by the First Division?—In the case of Price v. Owen, Lord Barcaple said in his note: 'The Lord Ordinary thinks that section 22 of 1 Will. iv. cap. 69, having in express terms given jurisdiction to the Sheriff in maritime causes against persons residing furth of Scotland, the subsequent declaratory enactment in section 21 of 1 and 2 Vict. cap. 119, cannot be held to take away that jurisdiction, but only to regulate it. The former enactment gave the Sheriff generally jurisdiction in maritime causes against foreigners which he has not in other cases, thus putting him in this class of cases on the same footing as to jurisdiction with the Court of Session. The principle of the commune forum having been thus done away with in maritime cases, and it being on that principle that effect is in general refused to arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa, as making a foreigner amenable to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff, such an arrestment should in that class of cases constitute a legal ground of jurisdiction in the Sheriff Court against a foreigner, just as it does in the Court of Session. Thus the effect of the explanatory enactment of the 21st section of 1 and 2 Vict. cap. 119, in the case of foreigners, is merely that the jurisdiction conferred upon the Sheriff by the previous statutes shall not be exercised against them, unless they are made amenable to it by arrestment used for that purpose.'

10,922. Mr. Baxter.—Is that the practice in your court?—It is.

10,923. Mr. Webster.—Was that judgment brought under review?—No. I think that is a sound construction of the statute.

10,924. The Chairman.—Then your view would be, that the first arrestment should have a double effect—to found jurisdiction, and to be an arrestment on the dependence?—Yes.

10,925. Equivalent to both?—Yes.

10,926. Mr. Shand.—And to give the power to dismantle?—To give power to put a man in possession till the question is disposed of.

10,927. Mr. Webster.—Would you insert the warrant at once in the summons for the combined arrestment, or would you keep up the present system: first, the form of arresting; and second, the form of raising a summons founding on the arrestment?—I think the whole might be put into the will of the summons.

10,928. Mr. Shand.—Do you not think that is a great power to give to a person merely claiming to be a creditor? Is it not a power liable to great abuse, and would it not be desirable that before the warrant to arrest, which may have the effect of detaining a ship, is given, the party should present a prima facie case for the consideration of the Sheriff, and that such a warrant should only be given if the Sheriff thinks such a prima facie case exists?—He makes out a prima facie case when he makes the statement in the summons. What is the hardship in that? The foreign captain is away the moment the arrestment is served on him. You put a man on board, and you detain the vessel two or three days. You detain it at your peril, and that without malice. It is a great power, no doubt, but there is a great evil to be remedied.

Patrick Fraser.

10,929. Suppose that is done at the instance of a man of straw, or at the instance of two or three workmen with reference to a claim of wages, and thereby a vessel with a valuable cargo on board is detained for several days, is not the hardship much greater than the evil?—That is putting an exceptional case. Everything may be abused, and that is an example of the abuse of it. But that is not the ordinary case. A captain contracts with a merchant in Greenock: he incurs a large debt, and won't settle, and won't give good bills on any person here. He is a Spaniard, and he is off, and you must have some detaining power over him.

10,930. Mr. Baxter.—The ordinary representation made to the Sheriff is the claim of debt, and the averment that the captain is about to sail, and claiming the arrestment?—Yes.

10,931. Mr. Shand.—At present the arrestment is given on application, as a mere matter of course?—Yes.

10,932. Do you not think that there should be so much protection against abuse, as that where such a warrant is required, the Sheriff should apply his mind to the question whether he will grant it?—I see no harm in that. I see no harm in requiring the affidavit of the pursuer that he believes the statement in the summons to be true.

10,933. In short, that it should be a matter disposed of after some consideration by the judge, and not a mere formal warrant granted as matter of course by the Sheriff-clerk?—Well, I don't see any harm in that. It would not take much time, and the Sheriff is always there.

10,934. And it would give protection against such an abuse as I have suggested?—Yes.

10,935. The Chairman.—You spoke of putting a man on board. Is there no practical dismantling of the vessel?—There is; but I would not proceed to that at the outset. I would put a man on board, just to give warning if the captain was about to sail during the night.

10,936. But suppose the captain sails with the man on board?—Then the man makes an uproar, and there are the harbour police to come to his assistance.

10,937. In regard to the constitution of the Sheriff Court, and the power of review, have you any suggestion to make?—My opinion upon that subject is, that the present system is the best that I have ever heard suggested. I think that there is a general opinion to the effect that there shall be some review other than the Court of Session. You cannot get a review in the Court of Session without paying a large sum of money for it; and all the procurators with whom I have come in contact are of opinion that they must have some kind of review within the Sheriff Court itself. I have heard one scheme suggested of mapping out Scotland into districts, and appointing two Sheriffs of review for each district. That seems to me to be quite visionary; I think it would be very unsatisfactory, and would just be another Court of Session. You might have a strong mind and a less strong mind together, and there would be divided responsibility. I don't think there would be additional authority conferred by the two. And where are they to deliver judgment? Is it to be a written judgment, and appealable to the Court of Session? Where are they to consult, and at what time? Then, if you give them a very large district, you create this evil, that they cannot practise as advocates; and I think the chief advantage of the present system is, that you have as judges men who are actively engaged in the competition of advocacy, and who are constantly studying law. If you send a man away to the country, he won't study law. A man is a worse lawyer at the end of the long vacation than he is on the 20th of July. Law is entirely a matter of memory; and if you send a judge away to the country, which you must do if you give him a large district of Scotland to travel over, law will fade away from his mind, just as a man will forget his native language after a time. Another suggestion is to keep up the present system, but to join two or more sheriffdoms together. What practical advantage would the public get from that? You give one man more work. Of course you will give him more pay; at any rate, I assume that. Therefore the country saves nothing in point of money; and if you give him more work, he must just go to the country with all the disadvantages I have pointed out. It seems to me that this outcry which has been got up is very partial, arising from two or three of one's own friends who have been appointed Sheriff-substitutes, and who very naturally cannot bear the idea of being reviewed by one man who is an advocate as they are themselves; and from a few junior counsel, who seem to think that if the office of Sheriff is abolished, a great deal of business will flow into the Court of Session from the Sheriff Courts, in the shape of advocations. That notion of a great increase of business in the Court of Session seems to me also to be the statement of a hope not destined to be realized. There is no doubt that, when a man gets two judgments against him,—from the substitute and the Sheriff,—it makes him pause before he goes further, and that is one of the advantages of the system; and he gets the judgment at as cheap a rate as it is possible to be got.

10,938. Mr. Baxter.—I think you are under a wrong impression in imputing it to the Sheriff-substitutes, for I know it to be a very widespread opinion among the procurators in the country generally?—It must be admitted that among the procurators generally there is a very great desire that there shall be an appeal within the Sheriff Court.

10,939. We admit that; but our opinion is that the Sheriff-substitutes are very much improved, compared with what they used to be; and we feel the appeal from most of the Sheriff-substitutes to the Sheriffs to be a very weak appeal,—an appeal from one judge to another judge of the same character and standing; and as to the Sheriffs being actively engaged in practice, I suppose you know many of them that are not so?—There are not many of them that are not so, and at all events they walk the Parliament House every day; and if they are in difficulty, they know where to apply for information.

10,940. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—And they do so in point of fact?—Yes.

10,941. Mr. Baxter.—These are mere desultory conversations?—They are not desultory conversations. They are sometimes very protracted. I have often spent hours with my brethren in considering their cases.

10,942. Don't you think that two judges, with the record and pleadings before them, are far better than one judge holding consultations in the Parliament House with other Sheriffs who have not heard the case?—Where are the two judges to consult? In the inn of the town where they have heard the case?

10,943. No. It is proposed that they should be resident in Edinburgh?—Then they are to make a vizandum with every case, and go back to the country town next month.

10,944. They can go to Edinburgh and decide the case there?—By a written opinion?

10,945. Of course?—That seems to me to be open to the objection I have stated, that there is a divided responsibility. There is no increase of authority, for practically the judgment of every Sheriff in Scotland is arrived at after consultation with his brethren in the Parliament House, if there is any difficulty.

10,946. Do you think that a good system?—I do think it a good system. He has all the responsibility of it, and he gets the aid of all the learning of his brethren.

10,947. Don't you think it would be better for him to consult with a man who has heard the case along with him?—That may be; it depends on the man.

10,948. Suppose a client to get the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute for him, and the judgment of the Sheriff against him?—That is the very case to come to the Court of Session, provided they are equal men.

10,949. The Chairman.—If the Sheriff Court was reduced to one resident judge, without another Sheriff, such as now exists in the Sheriff-principal, and the appeal were to be direct to the Court of Session, that would be attended with considerable expense, I suppose and parties would not in many cases have their eyes so open to the weakness of their cause as if they had appealed to a single judge, viz. the Sheriff, who had affirmed the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute?—Certainly not. It seems to me that it would be a piece of great oppression if, in order to correct a mistake, you must come to the Court of Session and pay £50 or £60. And if you must have an appeal within the Sheriff Court itself, I think all men are agreed as to what should be done, except a few of the Sheriff-substitutes.

10,950. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Do you consider that an intermediate appellate court would increase or diminish the expense of review?—It would increase the expense. It would be a second Court of Session. You would have counsel coming down to plead before these judges in the country towns, and every case would then be appealed.

10,951. Do you think it would abridge the time within which judgment is given, or the reverse?—It would depend on the convenience of two men, and must necessarily increase the time. At the present moment, an appeal can be had at any time. If it is an urgent case, I go down to Greenock and hear it there, or the parties come to me in Edinburgh, and the matter may be disposed of in forty-eight hours.

10,952. That would be quite impossible under the system of itinerating judges?—Quite impossible.

10,953. Mr. Webster.—Do such cases of urgency frequently occur?—Not frequently; but there do occur now and then important cases of interdict, and the like, which require immediate despatch.

10,954. Mr. Baxter.—It has been proposed that the appellate judges should devote their whole time to their appeal duties, so that they could go down to the country when required?—Then they cannot practise as advocates; and the result of that is, that you will have unlearned men. They will not learn law through their procurators, who have no proper law libraries, and who have other business to attend to. The result would be, that these men would have to listen to debates in which the record was read to them, and a piece from the proof; and then they would 'submit to your Lordship' that the judgment is erroneous, or that it is quite right. In that way you would practically cease to have proper judges after a few years.

10,955. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Do you think that constant access to the current decisions is an advantage which the present system possesses, which could not be had under the proposed system?—Yes.

10,956. Mr. Baxter.—If the appellate Sheriffs lived in Edinburgh, they would have that advantage?—If they did not practise, they would not read law either in Edinburgh or in the country.

10,957. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Or attend the court?—Or attend the court.

10,958. Mr. Baxter.—You are aware that many of the Sheriffs do not practise?—But they are bound to attend the Court of Session; and it is a fact that any one of the Sheriffs who is not in very active practice, if he has a difficulty, has his consultation with two or three of the best lawyers at the bar. I know that that is the practical working of the present system.

10,959. We don't like it?—That may be, but in the end it tends to good.

10,960. The Chairman.—When they attend the Court of Session, they have the opportunity of hearing the discussions in the court, and the opinions of the judges delivered?—They have.

10,961. And of hearing the views which the profession take of the current decisions of the court?—Certainly.

10,962. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Are there many judgments of the Sheriff-substitute which are acquiesced in without appeal to the Sheriff?—I don't believe that in my own county there is a single judgment acquiesced in. I am not informed as to the practice in other counties, so as to enable me to give a decided answer as to them.

10,963. Would you say that it is a fair test of the popularity of a system of appeal, that it is universally resorted to?—It has been universally resorted to in Renfrewshire.

10,964. It has been said that there are too many appeals during the progress of a cause before the Sheriff at present, and that delay is occasioned by the very economical mode in which the review of the Sheriff is obtained, inducing appeals for the purpose of delay. Do you think that any change should be made in regard to that matter?—I think that there are only four or five appeals competent before the disposal of the case on the merits.

10,965. Do you think that some of these might be dispensed with, or reserved to a future stage?—It is very difficult to say; but I think not.

10,966. Mr. Shand.—Perhaps you have not considered that point specially?—No; I have not thought on that subject. These are cases that I always deal with in this way: an appeal is entered on a preliminary defence, and notice for an oral hearing is given at my next sittings; I pronounce an interlocutor, 'refuse the crave for oral hearing, and appoint the appellant to give in a reclaiming petition within four days,' and the whole thing is disposed of. They get no delay, and I am not tormented with these intermediate appeals.

10,967. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—You have not found that delay really takes place in that way?—No; all that has to be done is to refuse the crave for an oral hearing.

10,968. Mr. Shand.—In that class of cases I believe that practice is general among the Sheriffs?—I believe it is. At all events, I have urged a number of them to follow it, and they have done it. I think it is done in Forfarshire.

10,969. Mr. Baxter.—The necessary appeals are on preliminary defences and on the merits; a preliminary defence might exclude the action altogether?—Yes; or without that appeal an unnecessary proof might have to be taken at great expense. In the same way, interim execution might be prevented by an appeal. An interim decree for a sum of money is a fair ground of appeal.

10,970. Mr. Webster.—In reviewing interlocutors on the merits, do you follow the system of an oral hearing, or of having reclaiming petition and answers?—On the merits I let the parties choose their own way. I confess I like an oral hearing better than reclaiming petition. If there is a good debate, though one seldom gets it, you come to the points more quickly than by reading a long, rambling reclaiming petition with a number of quotations in it. But I allow parties to take their own course in regard to that.

10,971. Do you find that the expense is much greater when written pleadings are adopted, than oral pleadings?—It is. There is a fixed fee of two guineas for an oral debate; and I believe, though I am speaking without any definite information, that a reclaiming petition is paid according to length.

10,972. The Chairman.—Might it not be practicable to fix some tariff which would make it not more profitable than an oral hearing?—That is perfectly practicable, and I have done it. I have decerned in favour of a pursuer who has given in a reclaiming petition of fifty or sixty pages, and directed the auditor only to allow ten.

10,973. Mr. Webster.—Would the necessity for written pleadings be obviated, and the procedure improved, by the principal Sheriff visiting his county and hearing cases there more frequently than he does at present?—No doubt it would. I think it would be highly expedient that the Sheriffs should go oftener. A number of them cannot, however, do that, from the long distances—the Sheriffs of Ross and Inverness, and others.

10,974. The small amount of business in these counties makes that less necessary?—That is quite true. I am in my county, I think, about once a month, but oftener when occasion requires.

10,975. The Chairman.—There are certain ministerial and magisterial duties performed by the Sheriff. Do you think there is an advantage in having a person who is not constantly resident in the county going down to it to discharge these duties on occasions?—I think it is. I was specially asked the other day to go down and stake off a special water supply district under the Public Health Act. There was a great deal of local prejudice existing, and they wished me to do it. I went over the ground with them; I did it, I think, to their satisfaction. I have found other occasions of the same kind. For example, in Paisley, they wanted to adopt the General Police Act, and they asked me to come down and do that ministerial duty, and I went.

10,976. On occasions of a breach of the peace or disturbance having arisen, or being anticipated, does the arrival of the Sheriff from Edinburgh produce a good effect?—I think it does.

10,977. It inspires confidence?—I think so.

10,978. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Have you repeatedly gone on such occasions to your county?—I have gone two or three times a year—always on the anniversary of the battle of the Boyne, and on other occasions of that sort.

10,979. And your predecessors did the same?—They did. And I have often gone down and had interviews with the Orangemen, against whom I had issued proclamations on account of processions by them tending to disturbance of the peace. I remember one interview I had with them, at which they begged me not to issue the proclamation, as they said it would hurt their feelings. I reasoned with them, and warned them against their processions. They gave me their word of honour that they would not process any more if they were allowed to meet in their hall and have a soiree. I had no objection to that. And since then there have been no processions in the county.

10,980. The Chairman.—In reference to the magisterial duties which you perform, do you find it a matter of convenience to be in Edinburgh, having the opportunity of holding communication with the Lord Advocate and Crown counsel?—I have found that practically a great convenience. At the last Greenock election, I had occasion to arrange about getting out the military, and I was in communication very often with the Lord Advocate here on the subject.

10,981. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—In criminal cases, do you think there is any advantage in the Sheriff going to his county?—It is so; and in these cases I have gone to my county.

10,982. As Sheriff of Renfrew, you belong ex officio to certain boards?—Yes, I am a member of the Board of Supervision, and that gives me almost as much labour as the whole of the rest of my Sheriffship.

10,983. There are very important questions put to the judicial members of the Board, in connection with the law of the cases that come before it?—I write, I think, about 150 opinions upon legal points in the year for that Board; and since the death of Mr. Cook, my labour has been doubled; because, being senior Sheriff, I have to write the first opinion. Almost the whole of the parochial boards and the local authorities now apply to us for legal opinions, and we give them. Where we differ, the opinion of counsel is taken.

10,984. Is there a considerable portion of your time consumed by the business of that Board?—When I had a large junior practice, I always had the Saturday afternoons to myself; but now I never have, in consequence of having to write these opinions for the Board of Supervision.

10,985. And the other members of the Board, who are Sheriffs, devote themselves in the same way to this business?—In the same way.

10,986. The Chairman.—But your labours are a little heavier, as the cases come to you first?—Yes, I have to reduce the mass into something like shape.

10,987. You are in use to attend the meetings of the Board?—Yes.

10,988. And your brother Sheriffs are in use to attend, more constantly perhaps than other members of the Board?—We always attend every meeting of the Board, unless actually speaking in court when the meeting is held, or unless away on official duties in our counties.

10,989. At these meetings of the Board, are there occasionally questions started involving legal matters which you can dispose of offhand from your legal knowledge?—One half of our business consists of legal matters; the other half is disposing of applications complaining of inadequate relief; but all the rest is matter of law arising under the Poor Law or the Public Health Acts, or other matters belonging to our jurisdiction.

10,990. The Lord Justice-General.—How often does the Board meet?—At least once a week. We have extra meetings now and then. We had two meetings last week.

10,991. Mr. Baxter.—I suppose it is the Sheriffs that make up the attendance usually?—Mr. Smythe of Methven is present now and then, and the late Solicitor-General, Mr. Millar, attended the meetings; but it is the chairman and the Sheriffs that generally constitute the Board.

10,992. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—You are ex officio a member of the Board of Commissioners of Northern Lights?—I am.

10,993. The other maritime Sheriffs are so also?—Yes.

10,994. Is the business of that Board substantially carried through by them?—It is done almost entirely by the Sheriffs; and the Provost of Leith and an Edinburgh bailie now and then attend.

10,995. Are there meetings of that Board frequently?—Once a week, except in autumn.

10,996. And the Commissioners are sometimes away on duty?—Yes, we always make a visit of the lighthouses once a year.

10,997. The meetings are held in Edinburgh?—They are. We have committees of that Board too.

10,998. Then substantially the business of the Northern Lights Commissioners is conducted by the Sheriffs?—It is.

10,999. The Lord Justice-General.—And they receive no remuneration for that?—No, I have received no remuneration. I understand that a proposal has been made to confer on the Sheriffs jurisdiction in cases of divorce and of separation. I hope that the Commission will pause before recommending that, for I think that is a very delicate class of actions, in which are mingled very frequently noxious passions, and where the witnesses are relative against relative. These are cases in which I think a judge of the Supreme Court should see the witnesses. In cases of separation especially I would object to the Sheriff having jurisdiction; otherwise the Sheriff Courts would be flooded with that class of cases. A drunken husband comes home and thrashes his wife; and if she had the remedy of separation in the local courts, she would immediately proceed there. I understand that there is a system of getting practically separation, by bringing an action for aliment, and craving interim aliment till the rights of parties shall be settled on a more permanent footing, thereby saying that these persons shall be separated unless the husband comes to the Court of Session, and brings an action of adherence. Now I humbly think that is erroneous, and that the Sheriff has no jurisdiction whatever in cases of aliment founded on sævitia as against husband and wife; at all events, I hope that point will be cleared up, as there is a good deal of diversity of practice on the subject in Sheriff Courts. Aliment might be given to a wife against a husband where the husband has deserted her, but where sævitia is to be proved the consequence is this: The wife comes into court, tells in an exaggerated form all her wrongs, and she and her husband are never reconciled afterwards. Practically every impediment should be put in the way of parties bringing actions like these.

11,000. Mr. Shand.—Divorce is a very expensive proceeding at present in the Court of Session?—No; I have known a divorce carried through for £2, 13s.

11,001. That case occurred in Edinburgh?—Yes.

11,002. And the witnesses were resident in Edinburgh?—Yes.

11,003. Take the case of persons living at a distance from Edinburgh, all the witnesses being on the spot, where the man may be earning small wages, which would exclude him from the Poor's Roll, or the wife may be in a similar position—would not the expense of such an action be very great in the Court of Session?—No. Travelling is cheap, third class. You bring the witnesses here in a day, and the matter is done in a day. There is great danger in making divorces common.

11,004. Is there not the expense of making up a record in the first instance, of instructing counsel, and of bringing the witnesses forward? Can you say that in such a case as that the expense on both sides would be less than £30 or £40?—The defence is generally a simple denial of the statement in the summons. That is not long; and under our present system of shorthand writing the proof is got through in a day, often in half an hour.

11,005. Is not the expense of such a case as I put £30 or £40, including both sides?—Perhaps, including both sides, it would be, in a contested suit.

11,006. That must be paid by the husband?—True.

11,007. Is that not a practical denial of divorce in very many cases?—The law of Scotland is peculiar in allowing divorce to the wife for the simple adultery of her husband. In no other country in the world is that allowed, I believe, except in some of the States of America by recent legislation. Now, in very many cases, adultery is committed by the husband, and the wife never thinks of bringing a divorce though she knows it; she forgives it, and condones it. Unless the fact of adultery be accompanied by cruelty to the children (for the wife overlooks cruelty to herself), or by keeping the mistress in the house, the wife will never raise an action of divorce. All that a husband has to do, in order to put an end to an action of divorce at the instance of the wife, is simply to promise and protest very intensely that he will put away the wicked woman that made him fall,—that he will not ill-use the children any more, and will love his wife in the same affectionate way he did before they were married. But allow her to bring an action in the Sheriff Court, and she rushes into the Sheriff Court at once, and these people, who might otherwise have lived happily together,—the wife forgetting and forgiving the wrong done her,—would, by the facility of obtaining divorce, be sent abroad into society dissevered—in a very painful position for the wife, and a millstone would be hung round the necks of the children.

11,008. If the law be wrong in respect of the ground upon which divorce should be obtained, it may require a remedy; but assuming the law to be right, is not the present expense in such a case as I have put a practical denial of the right of divorce to the poor, while the rich have it?—No doubt it is a hardship, as all litigation is to the poor; but the way to look at it is this, would you not create greater evils by giving greater facilities for divorce?

11,009. Is there not that facility given to the man who has the means of paying the expenses? Why should not the same facility be given to those who have not that means?—I don't think it is a case in which any facility should be given at all. Our law of divorce is too lax; and if there were no facilities given, condonation and forgiveness would follow, and that ought to be legislated for.

11,010. Do you think the present facilities to persons possessing means should be more limited than they are?—I don't know that I would create greater obstructions than exist.

11,011. Then why should there exist a distinction between the case of the man who has means and the man who has not?—For this simple reason, that the crime or sin of adultery is in the higher ranks of life looked upon with more abhorrence, let me say, than it is in the lower ranks.

11,012. The Lord Justice-General.—Does not the inability to enter into litigation, of persons in the lower classes, apply to every species of action as well as divorce?—Yes. I was just going to give that illustration.

11,013. Mr. Harrison.—Perhaps the possession of education, and a certain position in society, is in itself a considerable restriction on people in the higher classes making the application?—Yes.

11,014. Mr. Shand.—The question to be determined in an action of divorce is a simple question of fact. Is not that the very class of actions in which of all others, so far as the subject of inquiry is concerned, that may be very safely entrusted to the Sheriff and his substitutes?—I don't think so. Are you to have an appeal to the Court of Session? If you are to have such an appeal, you double the expense. Suppose a husband brings his action in the Sheriff Court: the whole proof is taken there; the wife carries it to the Court of Session, and she does so at his expense. She is entitled to have the review of the court, and it is only in exceptional cases that she is not entitled to get the review of the Division of the court; so that the unfortunate husband, who has to pay the expense of both sides, must run the gauntlet of the Sheriff Court and the Court of Session before he gets a final decree.

11,015. Would not perfect protection be given against that, if the court disallowed any expense if they thought the judgment had been obtained with sufficient proof to warrant it?—I think that would be oppression. A woman is entitled to have her status ascertained by the Supreme Court, at all events by one judgment.

11,016. The Lord Justice-General.—Is it clear that the court would have power to disallow the expense? Is not the debt of the wife the debt of the husband till final decree is given?—It is so.

11,017. And therefore the husband would be liable to the wife's agent for the expense?—Yes. These are granted on the footing of necessaries to her. The defence of her honour is as much a necessary as food and clothing.

11,018. Mr. Shand.—You are aware that the judges of the Inner House have repeatedly intimated, that where a case is brought before them by a reclaiming note from a judgment of the Lord Ordinary, where it appeared to them clear that the judgment was right, the expense would not be allowed?—On the contrary, the First Division three weeks ago, in the case of Chalmers, laid it down and settled it as law, that except in very peculiar and exceptional cases, the wife was entitled to have the review of the Division; and in that case, in which I was counsel for the wife, they granted the expenses of the reclaiming note to the wife, who had lost.

11,019. Are you aware that there are dicta to another effect?—I know there is an admission by counsel to the court in one case.

11,020. I speak of dicta from the bench in Donald's case?—That was a very peculiar case, and there the expenses were allowed. There is a dictum of Lord Deas in Donald's case to that effect, but the judgment of the court was to an opposite effect.

11,021. Mr. Baxter.—Would you be surprised if I told you that I have known repeated instances of very respectable men in humble life being deprived of the remedy of divorce, because they could not afford the expense?—I would not be surprised at that; but I don't think it is a great evil. When the children grow up, the husband and wife come together again.

11,022. The Chairman.—It has been suggested that jurisdiction might be given to the Sheriff in actions of declarator of marriage and of legitimacy. What is your opinion as to that?—Declarators of marriage are very delicate matters to deal with, and I think that such cases as these ought to originate before the Supreme Court. It involves, no doubt, principally matter of fact, but there also you have relatives as witnesses; and it is desirable that their evidence should be considered by the Supreme Court as from the witnesses themselves, and that it should not be taken down in writing in the imperfect notes of the Sheriff-substitute.

11,023. The Lord Justice-General.—In those cases that you have spoken of, where questions have arisen before the Inner House as to ordering the husband to pay expenses, the question, as I understand it, always is, whether the husband shall be made to advance expenses to the wife's agent?—Yes.

11,024. But the question never has arisen, whether the husband is ultimately responsible to pay the wife's agent's account?—No, it has not.

11,025. Do you see any reason to doubt, that until final decree of divorce is pronounced, the husband is liable to pay the account of the wife's agent for carrying on her defence to the action?—I see no ground in law to doubt it.

11,026. The issue in an action of divorce is a question of pure fact generally, and the time occupied in the trial of that question would probably be the same in one court as in another. Have you any reason to doubt that?—None whatever.

11,027. Then what is the cause of the difference of the expense of trying such a case in the Court of Session and in the Sheriff Court?—There must be a record in both, and the agent must be paid in the inferior court. It is simply the addition of the counsel.

11,028. The fees to counsel?—Yes; that is all.

11,029. Don't you think it very important, that in the trial of a question of such social importance as arises in an action of divorce, the best professional aid should be had on both sides?—I think so. I think the wife is entitled to that, where so much depends upon it.

11,030. Then the advantage of having the action in the Court of Session is, that you have both the best professional aid and presumably the best judges to try the question?—Yes; and you save the unnecessary expense of a litigation in the Sheriff Court.

11,031. And that is purchased at the expense of counsel's fees, that being the sole difference between the expense in the one court and in the other?—That is all.

11,032. Mr. Shand.—Does the bringing witnesses from a great distance not add very materially to the expense?—As I said before, travelling is cheap, and the witnesses get here very easily by third class.

11,033. Have you any notion what a large proportion the expense of bringing witnesses from a distance is?—I don't think it constitutes a large proportion of the expense. In a case like Donald's, where there were 80 or 90 witnesses brought from all quarters of the country—from Aberdeen, Ireland, and elsewhere—the expense of travelling was large. But that is an exceptional case.

11,034. Don't you think it a great hardship that after a husband has succeeded before the Lord Ordinary in a case of divorce, which is as plain as possible, he should be liable for the expense of a reclaiming note and a discussion upon that, if his wife should not acquiesce in the decision?—In the last case which I have referred to, the judges saved themselves by saying that if there was so plain and clear a case on the proof that no two minds could differ about its import, they would not give the expenses; but where there is reasonable ground for doubting the credibility of the witnesses or the sufficiency of the proof, the wife is entitled to have that review, for it affects not merely her own status, but that of the unfortunate issue of the marriage.

11,035. And in cases not of that class you hold the law to be open as to whether there is liability for expenses?—Yes.

11,036. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestion to make?—There is a provision in the Sheriff Court Act of 1853, which has given rise to a great deal of inconvenience—viz. that a process shall stand dismissed unless some proceeding takes place in it within three months. Now I have had occasion to consider that in various ways. You make a remit to an accountant, and the accountant works away at the case for four or five months: has any proceeding been taken in that process, or does it stand dismissed? Then you sist process for some cause, and it remains over for six months, and one of the Sheriff-substitutes of Renfrewshire has held that it stands dismissed. The law creates a great deal of inconvenience, and does no practical good. It is easily evaded; and it is a kind of trap whereby, after a great deal of expense has been incurred, the process sometimes stands dismissed from an inadvertence on the part of the agent. I would humbly recommend that that provision should be repealed, and parties left to themselves to say when they shall go on, and when not, with a process.

11,037. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—I don't know whether, in answering a question which I put to you formerly, you had in view the decision of the court in the case of Wolthekker, on the subject of the arrestment of a ship on the dependence of an action, in which this was found: 'In an action of damages for injury alleged to have been caused by the arrestment of a ship on the dependence of an action, and by her consequent detention for a year in harbour, held that malice and want of probable cause must be put in issue?'—That certainly supports your view of the law. I was thinking of an earlier case than this.

11,038. Is not that a source of very great hardship in the case of a foreign owner? In that case I believe an arrestment was used against a party who had previously been proprietor of the ship, but who had ceased to be so. The ship was detained in Leith for some time, the crew dismissed, and large expense incurred, and it was held that there was no redress unless it could be established that the arrestment was used maliciously?—No doubt that law creates a case of great hardship, and should be altered. I think damages should be given if you arrest a ship and damage follows, even though there should be no malice. The party should do it at his peril. He defeats the voyage altogether, and the merchants who have goods on board the ship may suffer loss. I think that is very hard law.

11,039. Mr. Shand.—The law being so is an additional reason for requiring that the arrestment should not be given as a mere pro forma matter, but that there should be a prima facie case?—That certainly leads me to acquiesce more in your suggestion.

11,040. Mr. Webster.—Should there not be caution, as in an interdict?—That suggestion is well worth consideration. Let the arrester do it simply at his peril. I think he ought to bear the brunt of the strong proceeding, if he is afraid of the debtor running away.

11,041. Mr. Shand.—If it were imposed as an absolute rule, it might deprive seamen of the remedy they have for the recovery of wages. Would it not be better to leave it to the discretion of the judge in the particular case, to say whether caution should be found?—I think it would.

11,042. The Lord Justice-General.—Do you propose to put the arrestment of a ship on the same footing as an application for interdict? Do you mean that the party who proposed to arrest the ship should apply for a special warrant to do it?—I think so.

11,043. Then would the consequences of a wrongous application be the same as in the case of a wrongous application for interdict?—I think the law should be so made, although it does not seem to be so by the decision of the case of Wolthekker.

11,044. The Chairman.—Have you any suggestion to offer as to the constitution or procedure in the Court of Session?—As to the constitution of the court I have very little to suggest, except this, that the Court of Lords Ordinary might be made practically useful, consistent with having an Outer House, by composing it of three judges, viz. one judge from each Division and a Lord Ordinary, which would leave four working Lords Ordinary in the Outer House. The Court of Lords Ordinary took away the whole Outer House for two months last session, and stopped the whole business, which was a great hardship and inconvenience. Three judges would constitute a very good court; and as it would only sit at intervals, the taking of a judge from each Division would not very much interfere with the work of the Divisions. I was one of a very small minority who thought that there should be a Third Division, and that the Outer House should be entirely abolished. There was a draft report drawn up by a committee of the Faculty, and I believe I stood alone in that view, along with another member of the bar. I have since reconsidered the matter, and I have altered my opinion. I think it would be a very hard thing if the only remedy for an erroneous judgment of the Court of Session were an appeal to the House of Lords. A second discussion is always useful in any case. A court will go wrong very often at the first opening of a case, because they don't see it fully; but if it is twice discussed—and most cases, or at all events a great number of cases, ought to bear two discussions—you save the risk of falling into grievous error. Suppose you go to the House of Lords, and succeed in the appeal, showing the clear error of the Court of Session, you don't get the expenses of the appeal. Therefore I have altered my view upon that matter of a third Division, involving as it does the abolition of the Outer House. The next consideration is this, Shall you have a review of the Division here? Now I don't see any good in that at all. By a review I mean a review by the other two Divisions of one Division, or by the Lords Ordinary and one Division. If there was a difference between the two, there would be an immediate appeal to the House of Lords, and it would just increase the expense to the parties. But keeping the Lords Ordinary, and allowing, as at present, a reclaiming note to the Divisions, I think we have the best system. On the other hand, I would keep the Third Division of Lords Ordinary for occasional use, for it has worked most admirably in disposing of the advocations.

11,045. The Lord Justice-General.—The use of that third court is of course only occasional?—Only occasional.

11,046. Nothing more was contemplated in the recent Act of Parliament?—No.

11,047. And the object of having sittings of that third court will be, of course, to aid in preventing arrears in the Inner House?—Yes.

11,048. So that by that means you have an instrument by which you can, as occasion requires, equalize the arrears between the Outer House and Inner House?—That is the use of it.

11,049. You think the best way of doing it would be to make a court of three?—Yes.

11,050. Taking one judge from each Division, and one from the Outer House. That would reduce the Divisions to three judges during the period for which that court sat?—It would.

11,051. Do you not think that a considerable disadvantage?—It is a disadvantage, no doubt; but there is an enormous disadvantage in taking away the whole judges of the Outer House, as they were taken away lately. The whole business of the Outer House was stopped, and there was great clamour in consequence, and I think, very naturally, impatience at the delays that took place.

11,052. But when the occasion arises that the Outer House is going too fast for the Inner House, it would seem a natural remedy to expedite the proceedings of the Inner House at the expense of the Outer House?—But the Outer House have recently done next to nothing in keeping down their rolls. Cases that stood for debate in the month of October have not been heard yet.

11,053. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Is not that to some extent attributable to the preference given to proofs?—No doubt; but the Lords Ordinary were sitting as a Division for two months last session.

11,054. Mr. Shand.—The remedy you propose would expedite both the Inner House and the Outer House work?—Yes.

11,055. The present arrangement expedites the Inner House work at the expense of the Outer House?—Yes; and the result is, that there would be no work for the Inner House, because the Outer House is not working and feeding them.

11,056. A considerable amount of arrears have been worked off from the Inner House in the present session?—Yes.

11,057. Has a corresponding arrear taken place in the Outer House?—Yes. I suppose the Inner House rolls are nearly clear at present.

11,058. Mr. Adam.—The court you suggest is the same as the Registration Appeal Court?—Yes.

11,059. Was that a satisfactory court?—Yes, it was a very satisfactory court. It did its business very well, and it has brought unity into the scattered law of registration.

11,060. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Having regard to contingencies, might it not be necessary to take the judges for the court which you propose either from the Outer House or the Inner House, at the option of the Lord President? One of the judges of the Inner House might be ill, or it might be advisable to leave one of the Divisions with four judges?—I would make it an absolute rule that one judge shall go from each Division, and one from the Outer House; but if one of the judges in the Inner House was ill, his place should be supplied by one of the Lords Ordinary.

11,061. Mr. Webster.—Is it not matter of great importance, that the work of the Lords Ordinary should not be interrupted?—Most certainly.

11,062. That is of far greater practical importance than a little delay in disposing of a Sheriff Court advocation?—No doubt of it, but it is desirable that there should not be delay in doing the work of the Inner House.

11,063. The Chairman.—You think your plan would accomplish both purposes?—I think it would.

11,064. Mr. Shand.—With the disadvantage, however, of having the Divisions only consisting of three judges,—a disadvantage which should last as short as possible?—It should be as short as possible; but we sometimes see it at the present moment, and we submit to that disadvantage.

11,065. The Lord Justice-General.—But when it does occur, it is a very considerable evil, is it not?—No doubt it is an evil.

11,066. The Chairman.—There is one use made of the judges of the Inner House at present, which might make it more difficult to carry through the arrangement you suggest, and that is the detaching one of them to take proofs. That could not be done if one judge from each Division was sitting in the third court?—No.

11,067. If your plan was followed, that proof might be sent to a Lord Ordinary to take?—It could not be sent to him under the existing Act.

11,068. But that could be provided for?—Yes, that proof might be sent to a Lord Ordinary in that special case.

11,069. The Lord Justice-General.—The effect of recent legislation has been, has it not, to increase the work done by the Inner House, and to diminish that done by the Outer House?—Yes.

11,070. For example, all appeals from the inferior court go straight to one of the Divisions?—Yes.

11,071. And the Lords Ordinary have no work to do of that kind at all?—None.

11,072. And the Lords Ordinary now sit for as long a period of the year as the Inner House?—Yes.

11,073. That was not the case formerly; and the Inner House were in the habit of holding extended sittings, which was never done in the Outer House?—That is quite true.

11,074. Proofs ordered by the Inner House are no longer sent to be taken in the Outer House, but are taken by one of the judges of the Divisions. There has also been the introduction of special cases, which come to the Inner House only. All these things have a tendency to increase the work of the Inner House, and to diminish proportionally the work of the Outer House?—That is quite true.

11,075. Do you not see a little difficulty arising from that, in regard to some of the arrangements you propose?—The only difficulty that occurs to my mind is this, that the Lords Ordinary might come not to have work to do; so much has been sent into the Inner House direct, that the Lords Ordinary may not have sufficient to employ them.

11,076. In that way there would be a tendency to repletion in the Inner House rolls, and to the reverse in the Outer House rolls?—That may be so, but experience will show. At the present moment the Lords Ordinary are quite full.

11,077. And you think that is ascribable to the long-continued sitting of the Lords Ordinary's court last winter session?—Very likely.

11,078. Mr. Shand.—Is there not one new feature which has added greatly to the work of the Outer House—viz. the proofs?—No doubt.

11,079. Has not the time occupied by these proofs much more than compensated for any time that might have been occupied by the hearing of advocations or similar work now done in the Divisions? These proofs were all taken by commission before?—Yes.

11,080. The Lord Justice-General.—Before last session?—For two years.

11,081. That has been going on since the last Evidence Act passed?—Yes; since 1866.

11,082. The Chairman.—Would your difficulty be practically obviated, or materially obviated, if there was a better regulated use made of the court of four Ordinaries? Supposing that the Inner House arrear, which is now worked off, were to a great extent kept down, and that they were called on to sit at longer intervals, and not more than two days in any week, so as to allow the work of the Outer House to go on during the other days, would that obviate the inconvenience?—I don't think it. Even when the Court of Lords Ordinary was sitting, their Lordships sat as Ordinaries two days a week, viz. Friday and Saturday; but the effect of that was, that they took up a bit of a debate one of these days, and then it went over to next Friday, by which time the Lord Ordinary had forgot all about it, and the whole case had to be resumed. Unless you make the sittings of any court continuous, the usefulness of it is very much impaired.

11,083. Mr. Shand.—Can you speak as to the feeling of the profession generally as to taking away the Lords Ordinary from their daily duties to sit in that court?—According to all that I heard, it was very unpopular, and created a great deal of grumbling. I heard that from all classes of the profession, and from clients too, who could not understand why their cases were not moving before the Lords Ordinary when they had appeared in the debate roll in the month of October. I believe that the Court of Lords Ordinary sat during this last session two months and two days in all.

11,084. Mr. Webster.—At the commencement of the session there was practically no arrear of work before the Lords Ordinary?—Practically not very much, except in Lord Barcaple's roll.

11,085. Can you state the condition of the rolls at the end of the session?—I cannot from recollection.

11,086. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—The Inner House used to meet before and after the session to dispose of cases in the short roll?—Yes.

11,087. Would it not be a mode of obviating the difficulties of which you have spoken, if the Lord Ordinary's court were to be held at the close of the session, to wipe off the arrears?—I would not be willing to impose on these judges more labour than they do; and I don't see any necessity for resorting to that, because I can get a good Third Division without it, in the way I have suggested; and I don't see any objection to its consisting of three judges, though undoubtedly four are better. But I see three judges sitting in the House of Lords disposing of the most important appeals.

11,088. The Lord Justice-General.—I suppose you have no doubt that four is the best number for a court?—Certainly it is.

11,089. And especially for a court that is to review the judgment of one judge?—Yes; if there was a division of opinion, and one of three agreed with the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, there would be two to two, and such a result would not carry confidence with it.

11,090. The Chairman.—Have you anything to say as to procedure?—In reference to the distribution of business, I should like to make this remark, that all petitions should be Outer House work. Such administrative business is better done by one man than by four, and there is no necessity for taking up with a purely formal proceeding the time of a fully constituted court. In the next place, I think all these petitions should be competent to any Lord Ordinary. It is a great grievance if you get a man who, from timidity or irresolution, or (if I may say so, without irreverence) from crotchets in dealing with these matters, puts you to a great deal of trouble in advertisements, investigations, and so forth. Therefore I think we should be allowed to go to another judge of the Supreme Court, and present our petition to him. I don't see the advantage of confining us six or seven years, it may be, to one judge.

11,091. Mr. Shand.—Do you see any reason why the great bulk of these petitions might not be presented in manuscript, particularly for the appointment of factors and the like?—None; but that would not be any great saving, because when you have to make three copies it is as cheap to print. Printing also preserves the document, and is more convenient for future reference.

11,092. A petition in many cases is like a summons—you don't require copies of it?—Intimation has to be made to the relatives and others.

11,093. The Lord Justice-General.—And a copy for the walls?—Yes. In regard to procedure I have very little to say. I think our forms of procedure are very nearly perfect. In reference to investigations as to facts, we have two systems, viz. jury trial, and the taking of proof. In regard to jury trial, I have only to say that I think it the biggest farce that ever was instituted for the investigation and settlement of civil rights. You put men into the box who are not accustomed to continuity of thought, or to the compressed position in which they are kept for hours, and who are actuated very frequently, in a great many popular causes, with other than just views of the notions of right and wrong. In a number of cases, unless the judge descends into the arena, and takes the thing out of their hands altogether—in a case of road, for example—the verdict is sure to be one way; or where a widow claims damages against a railway company, or in a case of breach of promise of marriage, or seduction, where the pursuer is a pretty woman, the defender has no chance at all.

11,094. Do you think judges are altogether inaccessible to these influences?—I think they ought to be so. In other cases, again, the jury just go along with the charge of the judge, and practically the verdict is the verdict of the single judge. Now, if that is to be sufficient, we could get it without all the formality of a jury trial. But apart altogether from my own opinion as to jury trial, the practical result is this, that we have now tried it for fifty years, and it has entirely failed. You can't bring people to the jury court. Merchants in Glasgow say they would rather resign their rights and interests altogether than submit their case to a jury. You compel them to go to arbitration, or to give up their just and legal rights. It is of no use defending the system, as it occurs to me, upon abstract notions; for you have tried it, and it has been recommended by our wisest and greatest lawyers, but in vain. People won't come to it; and the only cases that you have are simple trash—cases of defamation, and other actions of that sort, which ought to be tried in the Small Debt Court. On the other hand, the new system of taking proof before the Lords Ordinary is working admirably, if the Lords Ordinary would just take kindly to it; but considering themselves (as one of them who is a member of this board told me) to be acting as mere commissioners, they do not take kindly to it. Now I complain of that. They don't give the Act fair play. But it commands the confidence of the profession. People will come to the court, now that they see there, an educated man accustomed to appreciate evidence, and above all those influences to which I have referred. They will have confidence in his judgment; and gradually it will come to this—and I see it already—that people will acquiesce in the Lord Ordinary's judgment, and not go to the Inner House at all. It will be looked upon as the verdict of a jury, and better than the verdict of a jury. We are new to it just now, but I have seen several judgments recently, where great care was taken by the Lord Ordinary in taking the proof and pronouncing judgments, and parties have acquiesced in them.

11,095. Would you think it desirable to make the Lord Ordinary's finding in fact final?—I would not do that. I see that in the United States of America nine States have adopted almost the very words of our Judicature Act in regard to the summons. Our Judicature Act says that the summons shall set forth the nature, extent, and grounds of action; and the State of New York have abolished all former systems of pleading, and have enacted that the statement of facts constituting the cause of action shall be set forth in ordinary and concise language, without repetition, and in such a manner as to enable a person of ordinary understanding to know what is intended. They have trials before juries, and trials before the judge; and the mode in which the distinction is made is this: An issue of fact in an action for the recovery of money only, or of specific real or personal property, or for a divorce from the marriage contract on the ground of adultery, must be tried before a jury, unless the jury trial be waived, or a reference be ordered. Every other issue of fact must be tried by the court, subject, however, to the right of the parties to consent, or of the court to order that the whole issue may be tried by a jury. Now this issue of fact, when tried by the court, is tried before a single judge, and the remedy against error is a new trial; one of the grounds of the new trial being the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict or decision. I see that that legislation has been adopted in the States of New York, Indiana, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, Wisconsin, Ohio, Oregon, and Massachusetts; and therefore it is not a novelty invented in Scotland for a single judge to try issues of fact. I think our course is better; instead of the remedy for error being a new trial, we have a reclaiming note on the evidence taken to a different court. Therefore I trust that this system, which is becoming popular, and which is certainly better than jury trial, will be retained.

11,096. Would you abolish jury trial altogether in civil cases?—I would abolish it altogether, except in cases of slander; but even that class of cases I think would be better tried in the Small Debt Court. I sometimes see, for very weak defamation, large sums of damages given by these juries. One frequently hears, 'Oh, this is a case of damage; it is a proper case for a jury.' Why should that be a proper case for a jury? The measure of damages is one of the most delicate things to determine; and an educated, practised lawyer is certainly a ten thousand times better judge than an ordinary juryman, of the measure of damage. Learned books have been written upon that very subject, and yet the whole thing is handed over to a jury, the judge simply telling them, 'The amount of damage is for you.' I would therefore abolish jury trial in every case, with, perhaps, the exception I have stated. I don't see any good that it serves.

11,097. The Chairman.—You say that cases of slander should be tried before the Small Debt Court. Would you limit damages for slander to the range of the Small Debt Court?—I would. What is the object of an action for slander? It is to make reparation; but its first object is to vindicate the defamed person's honour, and you do that if you get a decree in the Small Debt Court. Take, for example, the case tried before the Lord President some time ago, where a gentleman was accused of calling another a Highland thief; and the defender said he did not call him a Highland thief, but he called him a bad Highland chief; and though these were mere verba volantia passing at a railway station, and heard by nobody, the jury gave £300 of damages.

11,098. Mr. Shand.—If persons knew that they could slander to their heart's content those whom they disliked, at the expense of £12, don't you think that would increase the amount of slander?—I don't think so.

11,099. The Lord Justice-General.—Did you never see a case of slander, either verbal or written, in which you think the injured person should have got more than £12 of damages?—There are such cases—of accusing a lady of unchastity, or the like.

11,100. Or accusing a highly honourable man of dishonesty and embezzlement, and publishing that in the newspapers; would you restrict that to £12?—These are unusual cases, and perhaps the injured person ought to get more than £12; but if jury trial is to be preserved, I think that is the only class of cases in which it should be resorted to.

11,101. What is your opinion, then?—is it that jury trial should be continued in cases of slander, or not?—I think not.

11,102. Then you think that cases of slander should be tried by the Lord Ordinary under the other form?—Yes; and these cases have been tried before the Lord Ordinary, and a reclaiming note has been carried to one of the Divisions upon it. I refer to the case of two surgeons in the north, one of whom accused the other of unskilfulness. The proof was taken by Lord Kinloch.

11,103. Mr. Shand.—Such cases frequently arise in the Sheriff Court, and come to the Court of Session, and damages have to be assessed by the court?—Yes; the court assessed damages in the case to which I refer at £60.

11,104. Do you not think that it should be left to the discretion of the judge to say whether, in the circumstances of each case, jury trial is the best mode of disposing of it, or not?—That is no discretion. From my experience of the judges, they will always send cases for jury trial. To send a case to a jury, is an easy way of getting rid of the case.

11,105. Has it not been found in the working of the system of proofs, that they cause a very great amount of expense?—No.

11,106. I mean particularly in those cases where you have the evidence first taken down in shorthand, and afterwards printed, and made the subject of review in the Inner House?—Of course there must be expense there; but the same or greater expense would take place if there was a jury trial.

11,107. Don't you think that in many cases, if you include the expense of taking these judgments to review, and printing the proof and documents, you exceed the expense of a jury trial?—No; because there are motions for new trials and bills of exception in cases of jury trial, and I anticipate the time when we will acquiesce in the Lord Ordinary's judgment, and there will be very few reclaiming notes. I think the Divisions are acting on the principle, that unless it goes egregiously wrong, they will confirm the judgment on the facts, of the judge who saw the witnesses; and I think that is a very proper feeling.

11,108. Mr. Webster.—And where at present the verdict of a jury is upset on a bill of exceptions, or a motion for a new trial, the whole cost of the first trial is rendered useless, and parties have to begin de novo?—Yes, quite useless, and the same witnesses have to be examined. Your Lordship asked me if I had any further suggestions to offer. I think we cannot further improve our system of pleading. I think it perfect. It has been adopted by the States which I have mentioned—a summons, or plaint as they call it, and a defence. But there are one or two little practical matters that might be attended to: for example, great expense is incurred when a summons is long in requiring a written copy of it to be signeted. A printed summons ought to be sufficient. Then there is no necessity for writing out the formal will. A declaration in an Act of Parliament, that all summonses shall be held to have such and such a will, should be sufficient. Again, actions of reduction are unnecessarily verbose. All that should be necessary should be, 'And the said writ should be reduced,' without two pages of formal words. In multiplepoindings, where there are more than two parties, and where they have the same interest, a common agent should be appointed. The court had power, under the Act of 1850, to pass an Act of Sederunt in reference to that, but they never did it. Then there is no use whatever for pleas in law. Pleas in law are generally drawn by inexperienced counsel, and at a time when he is very tired, his head very hot, and his feet very cold, early in the morning; and he sometimes omits a plea. Now, why should a man not be entitled to plead his case upon the facts stated at the time of the debate, and after consultation between his senior and his junior counsel? These seem to me to have been always traps in the way of getting justice.

11,109. The Chairman.—Then you would not set forth the legal ground of action at all?—No; let the defender find that out. I make my statement of facts, and let him find out before the debate, or during the debate, what are my grounds in law.

Patrick Fraser.

11,110. The Lord Justice-General.—What would you say to such pleas as no jurisdiction, non forum competens, and lis alibi pendens?—What is the use of giving notice of the plea of no jurisdiction? It can be stated at the debate.

11,111. The use of giving notice, I always understood, is to prevent surprise?—Well, if there be surprise, the court have the remedy in their own hands of giving time. But there ought to be no surprise in reference to matters of law.

11,112. That is attended with delay and expense?—It may be. On the other hand, the way in which the court have thrown out cases by reason of the want of a plea that arose upon the facts, has been one cause of the unpopularity of the institution.

11,113. Is not that evil remedied by the large power of amendment in the recent Act?—To a great extent it is. At the same time, there are conditions of expenses attached to it which make one reluctant to resort to it.

11,114. The adding of a plea is not generally attended with a very heavy condition of expenses?—The amount is very variable.

11,115. It is very small?—That depends on circumstances. I have seen ten guineas imposed.

11,116. If I understand rightly, it did not require the recent statute to allow parties under the sanction of the court to add new pleas at any time?—No.

11,117. That power was competent under the Judicature Act?—Yes.

11,118. And was allowed upon very small and lenient conditions as to expenses?—I have seen ten guineas imposed by the First Division of the court.

11,119. Have you not seen one guinea also?—Never.

11,120. Did you ever see none at all?—I have seen the matter of expenses reserved.

11,121. Mr. Shand.—You don't contemplate, I suppose, in the suggestions you have made, that pleadings should be drawn otherwise than by counsel?—No.

11,122. Then if pleadings are drawn by counsel, and if it is found to be very convenient, and to save adjournments of cases, that pleas in law should be inserted as matter of notice, what is the benefit to be derived from omitting them?—The benefit is this, that you avoid miscarriage consequent on the omission of a plea.

11,123. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Is there a discretion to refuse the plea?—Not under the recent Act.

11,124. Mr. Shand.—If there were no pleas in law, would there not be great risk that when the case was called, a point of law might be started which had not been observed on the other side, and the result would either be an adjournment of the case, or if it must go on, a very great hardship would result to one of the litigants, from his counsel not having anticipated that point?—No. When counsel have studied the case and come to the debate, all the pleas arising out of it will occur, or ought to occur, to themselves. Surprise seems to me inapplicable to matters of law. Counsel should be able to plead law on the spot in reference to the state of facts disclosed.

11,125. Why should they not have notice, if that notice can be given in the pleadings framed by a lawyer?—I see no use for it. There is a risk of missing the plea; and if you do miss it, you are amanded in expenses on the spot, which may be two guineas, or which may be ten.

11,126. The risk is the risk of an award of expenses against the risk of an adjournment or injustice. Don't you think the latter is the much more serious risk?—No.

11,127. The Chairman.—Do you think that the circumstance of a counsel having to frame the pleas in law on which he is to rest his case, has or ought to have the effect of making him consider the case very carefully before he proceeds further?—It ought to have, but it very often has not.

11,128. But if he is compelled to put on paper, pleas in law applicable to the case, will that not have the effect of making him consider more carefully the law that is applicable to the case, at the time of framing his record, so as to suit his facts to that legal result?—It might or might not. The way in which it is usually done is this,—one thinks what kind of pleas should be put on record, whether they are very good pleas or not, and they are all put in.

11,129. There are perhaps various ways of framing a record, but I should think one would be disposed to select the facts that were pertinent to the case, as relative to the grounds of action on which he was to maintain his case, and to put both these down would compel him to consider carefully; but if he reserves the legal consideration of the case till he comes to argue it, is it likely that his record will be as pure and perfect as if he had carefully considered them at first?—I see no necessity for delaying their consideration till the argument, and that would not be done by a counsel who did his duty. Always remember, however, that these pleas are drawn by juniors.

11,130. But I speak of the inclination to consider more carefully when you are obliged to deal with it at that time?—The same idea appears to have occurred to the author of the recent Act, when he requires every pursuer to come, at the closing of the record, with an issue. He thought that would concentrate the attention of parties on the true point to be settled; I don't think it does so.

11,131. That is going a step further, because, after you have got your pleas in law, it might be a very nice question what is the issue in fact that should be sent to trial?—I may add that Lord Justice-Clerk Hope, before a committee of the House of Commons, gave the same opinion that I have given as to dispensing with pleas.

11,132. The Lord Justice-General.—When was that?—In 1840.

11,133. The section of the Act of 1850, to which you were referring, gives power to the Court of Session, in processes of competition, to regulate the mode of making up the record—section 10. That has never been done?—No.

11,134. What would you suggest should be done in carrying out that provision?—There should be a common agent, where all parties have the same interest, who should state the case in one paper instead of twenty papers, as occurred lately in a case before the First Division. That would simplify procedure very much.

11,135. Mr. Webster.—Hitherto the election of a common agent has been by the votes of those who had previously lodged claims?—Yes.

11,136. So that you would require some costly operation before you got into shape?—That might be simplified too.

11,137. Mr. Shand.—By leaving it to the judge?—Let the judge settle which parties have the same interests, and let one counsel or two counsel for all the parties be retained by the common agent.

11,138. Lord Justice-General.—How would it do to allow in multiplepoindings that mere claims should be lodged in the first instance, without any statements of fact or pleas in law? Would that enable the judge to see whether it was a proper case for the appointment of a common agent?—No; it would not show the uniformity of interests.

11,139. The expense in multiplepoindings is very great?—Very great.

11,140. And it is very frequently all charged upon the fund?—Yes.

11,141. Don't you think that many questions upon the construction of settlements and the like, which have been tried under multiplepoindings, might very well be tried in the form of special cases?—Yes; and every one of these will now be tried in that way.

11,142. The number of multiplepoindings therefore will be a good deal diminished?—Yes; very largely diminished. I have settled three special cases lately for the Divisions, arising upon the construction of settlements, where parties are agreed, and there are no facts there to make them differ.

11,143. The direction to the court in section 10 of the Act of 1850 is to regulate the making up of records in such processes, in such way and manner as to assimilate, in so far as convenient, the procedure in such actions, with respect to the making up of the record, to the procedure by this Act provided. Do you think that is a wise direction? Would you assimilate it to records in ordinary actions, or would you not?—I don't see how you could very well assimilate a multiplepoinding to a record in an ordinary action.

11,144. Only by making every claimant answer every other claimant. You don't propose that?—No; but that was the law until recently altered.

11,145. Mr. Shand.—You expressed yourself satisfied with the system of pleading in the Court of Session? Do you not think that the pleadings might be abbreviated by adopting such a system as you are aware exists in England, where the cause or grounds of action and grounds of defence are stated very much more shortly than they are with us?—I am not aware that they are. Look at the Chancery bills that we sometimes see; they are longer than our own records. The greater part of the business of the Court of Session is equity business, and you require a long record there.

11,146. Confining attention to ordinary common law cases, as distinguished from the cases you are now mentioning, do you not think that some improvement might be introduced in our system of pleading?—What can be shorter than a well-drawn summons, simply setting forth that a contract of sale was entered into on such a date, and that the price is not paid? Two articles do it. And the defence is 'denied.' In England you have the declaration, which cannot set forth the thing more shortly.

11,147. Is there not detail frequently given in the pleadings?—Frequently, but very wrongly. The pursuer sets forth that he met the defender at such a market, on such a day; and having entered into conversation with him about certain horses, they came to a bargain. All that is very unnecessary, and bad pleading.

11,148. But the expense of it never has been disallowed?—I am not aware that it has.

11,149. Where such detail is given, and the party succeeds, he is allowed the full expenses?—It is the duty of the Lord Ordinary at the closing of the record to score that out, and formerly the Lords Ordinary did so. The Judicature Act imposed that duty on them.

11,150. The Lord Justice-General.—Such improper pleading is the fault not of the system, but of the counsel?—Of the counsel entirely.

11,151. Mr. Shand.—What remedy do you propose to correct that?—Simply a little exercise of vigilant attention on the part of the judge.

11,152. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Or power to the auditor to strike off that expense?—It ought not to be allowed as legitimate expenses.

11,153. Mr. Shand.—It is an evil that could be corrected by a careful revision of the record, or by disallowing the expenses. Have you not seen many cases in which that is so?—I have seen very many cases of bad records which it was the duty of the judge to have corrected.

11,154. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Is there not a great improvement in the style of our records of late?—Yes; but I think the court was to blame for our bad records: first, from not taking care, when the record was closed, to see that no irrelevant matter was put in; but next, and above all, by the sustaining of the plea of want of specification. There are judgments under the head of 'form of process' that are perfectly unjustifiable in my estimation; and it was the fear that the court would hold that a record was defective in point of statement, and that all the details were not set forth, that made counsel timorsome, and induced them to set forth evidence instead of the grounds of action.

11,155. The Chairman.—Before the committee of 1840, of which you have spoken, I think there was some evidence as to the prolixity of pleadings?—I think there was.

11,156. The Lord Justice-General.—Don't you think that the Judicature Act is to a certain extent answerable for the details that are set out on records?—We are required to set forth the nature, extent, and grounds of action, and the nature, extent, and grounds of the defence. That is all. Now, if that clause had been liberally interpreted—if the court had trampled down all frivolous and absurd objections to the record, and allowed justice to be done, sending parties out of court not on a technicality, but on the merits of the case—they would have gone away in a good humour. A man will manfully bear the loss of his case on the merits, if it is fairly heard; but the general public don't understand being kicked out of court on a mere piece of special pleading.

11,157. The Chairman.—And the profession are dissatisfied with that?—Yes; it is a most miserable thing for a man of business to have to tell his client that he has been turned out upon mispleading.

11,158. The Lord Justice-General.—The object, as I understand it, of the Judicature Act, in the regulations as to the preparation of records, was to have all the material facts in the case set out, so that parties might be brought by admission as near to one another as possible upon matter of fact. The eighth section provides that the condescendence shall set forth the facts which they aver and offer to prove in support of the summons and defence, which means a detailed statement of every fact that they consider it important to prove; at least so it used to be interpreted. And then there is a stringent provision, that when the record is closed, parties are foreclosed upon the matter of fact, and cannot be allowed to prove anything that has not been averred. Now, don't you think that that system, introduced by the 6 Geo. IV., has tended a good deal to lengthen our records beyond what is necessary?—The construction given to that clause has certainly done so; but it was competent for the court to have interpreted it to mean this,—shall set forth simply the grounds of action, without detailing evidence.

11,159. Do you think that provision of the Judicature Act an expedient one?—Certainly not. I think that provision of the Judicature Act has done no good.

11,160. Then you think the advantage that was proposed to be gained by the Act in that respect is more than counterbalanced by the evils that it introduced?—I think so. It was intended to get admissions, and admissions are not given. If there had been a penalty upon a man for denying a fact within his own knowledge, as ultimately proved, that might have been a judicious regulation; or if he had been compelled to swear to the truth of his averments or denials, he might not deny so readily as he now does. But it has entirely failed of its purpose; and I think that the better system now in existence, of confining it to the nature and grounds of action, ought to be continued.

11,161. Then you would prefer that there should be just a statement of the ground of action and of the ground of defence, such as the Judicature Act, 6 Geo. IV. required in the summons and defences?—Just so.

11,162. And no more?—And no more; and then we could close the case always on summons and defences.

11,163. Mr. Shand.—Would you give the judge power in special cases, if he thought it desirable, before a proof takes place, to appoint the party to give particulars? For example, in a question of damage, special damage might be alleged. Would you have the party appointed to give notice, such as is now necessary in cases of breach of patent?—There might be special cases requiring notice of that kind.

11,164. I believe there is such a power in England?—In patent cases there is. That is by statute.

11,165. But in cases generally, the judge has a power of that kind?—I am not aware.

11,166. The Lord Justice-General.—You are aware that there were great complaints in England, at one time at least, that the want of some such paper as our condescendence and answers led very often to surprise at the trial?—I am aware of that. Lord Campbell specially mentioned that.

11,167. Lord Campbell in one case mentioned it in very strong terms indeed. Is it not to be feared that if the record was as simple as you suggest, containing merely the ground of action and the ground of defence stated in a short form, surprise would arise at the trial of the case?—Not in the majority of cases. Both parties know the ground of action and the ground of defence very well before they meet at the trial.

11,168. For example, in patent cases, if you were carrying out your present proposal, you would find it necessary to adopt the remedy of Lord Brougham's Act, and require a note of particulars before the trial?—Yes.

11,169. Specifying, for example, the cases of prior use intended to be proved, and the like?—Yes.

11,170. Then there must be a class of cases, at all events, in which something equivalent to a condescendence is required?—There may be.

11,171. Would you leave it to the discretion of the court to order that?—I think so. I think that would be the mode of doing it, instead of spoiling every record by requiring the whole minute facts to be set forth. I would treat these as exceptional cases. In America, it is provided that the cause of action and matters of defence shall be set forth; and I see that an American judge states that that system is not working very smoothly, from the want of detail as to what is to be proved at the trial.

11,172. Mr. Webster.—In such cases as actions against bank directors or others, for mismanaging the affairs of a bank, I presume it would be requisite that particulars should be given in some form?—And yet, in the case of Cullen v. Johnston, the House of Lords complained of the too great detail of all the frauds charged against the Directors of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Bank.

11,173. The Lord Justice-General.—It is quite possible to be in excess; but you must in such a case have very considerable detail in order to make the charge against directors intelligible?—True. It won't do to make a mere general charge of fraud, without telling how it was done.

11,174. Mr. Shand.—Was not the complaint there, that there was too much detail mixed up with the ground of action, while there might have been a distinct statement of the ground of action separate from the note of particulars?—I forget the exact words; but the record was complained of as being very detailed, and I abuse it, because it was drawn by myself. I put in all that detail, because I was afraid of the plea of want of specification. I should like to mention one thing that creates considerable dissatisfaction, and that is a practice which I am sorry to see is extending, of stopping discussions upon the opening speech. That opening speech is not delivered here, as it is in England, by the senior counsel. Sometimes it is imperfect; and a judge does not know the weakness of the conclusion to which his mind has come, unless he sees the weakness of the arguments in support of it. Now, if the judges are to go on stopping discussions at the outset upon the opening speech, you must introduce the system of making the senior counsel begin, and a client will acquiesce in the loss of his cause when he has got his best talent shown to the court.

11,175. The Lord Justice-General.—Then you would suggest that the senior counsel should open the reclaiming note?—Yes. The practice of making junior counsel in the cause commence the debate in the Inner House, is of comparatively recent origin. It seems to have begun, so far as I can trace, in the year 1836; but of course there are persons who can give information on this subject from their own personal knowledge, which I cannot do, as since I came to the bar the junior counsel has opened. The earliest indication of this having been sanctioned by the court, is in a note at vol. xiv. Shaw, p. 488, in the case of Clark v. Newmarsh, in the following terms: 'In the course of discussing this cause, a conversation took place between the Lord President and the Dean of Faculty relative to the duty of the junior counsel to be always prepared to open, on each side, when called on, and the disposition of the court to afford them every opportunity of doing so. In the result, his Lordship intimated that the court in future would not delay any case on account of the absence of senior counsel, unless in very special circumstances, but would call on the junior to proceed; and the Dean of Faculty observed that he had no doubt the course of proceeding would be equally satisfactory to the bar and to the country.' The matter does not seem to have been considered settled by this statement of Lord President Hope, for in the same volume, in another case of Ramsay v. Anderson, p. 574, there is a note to this effect: 'When this cause was called, the junior counsel for Dr. Anderson and Miss Ramsay stated that, although he was prepared to go on, if called upon by the court, yet, as the case was one of some difficulty, he felt it to be his duty to move the court to delay the advising till his senior, who was engaged in the other Division, might be able to attend. The Lord President observed, that after what had passed on this subject, he conceived it best to adhere to the rule already intimated, and to call on the junior counsel to proceed. There might be exceptions from this general rule, in particular circumstances, but this case did not appear to be one of these. The junior counsel accordingly pleaded the case.'

11,176. Mr. Shand.—Are there not many cases in which, before you have proceeded to open, you have remarked, 'I expect that we shall be thrown out on my own showing in this case?'—That is quite true. I admit that. But I have seen other cases which, in my judgment, ought to have gone on.

11,177. In the class of cases to which I have referred, would it not be a pity that the time of the court should be taken up by hearing three or four counsel; because if you hear two speeches, you must have replies?—Of course; but the remedy I suggest is, that senior counsel should open.

11,178. The Lord Justice-General.—The discussions to which you are referring are discussions upon reclaiming notes, I presume?—Yes.

11,179. Well, there is the judgment of the Lord Ordinary generally accompanied by an explanatory note of the grounds of his opinion; and if the opening counsel can suggest no good reason for differing from the Lord Ordinary, is it not a waste of judicial time to hear any more about it?—That is very true, but sometimes a miscarriage takes place, and then there is an appeal to the House of Lords.

11,180. Does that ever arise from the imperfection of the opening speech?—I think it often does.

11,181. That would be fully remedied by the suggestion you have made, that the senior counsel should open?—Yes.

11,182. Mr. Shand.—Are not appeals to the House of Lords much more frequent in cases which have been very fully argued?—I cannot give the numbers.

11,183. Do you remember any instance of cases thrown out on the opening speech, and appealed in consequence of want of full discussion?—I cannot name any particular case at the present moment, but I am under the impression that there are such cases.

11,184. The Chairman.—In such a case, when the junior counsel has made his speech, and the court are not satisfied that he has made out a case against the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, if the senior counsel offers to supplement the opening statement, is it ever refused?—No; it is never refused. It is very seldom offered. It is hopeless then, because the court have intimated their opinion.

11,185. Mr. Shand.—In practice, is it not the case that the senior counsel's observations don't carry the same weight in such circumstances?—Of course. The supplement is not well received, and it is not well given.

11,186. The Chairman.—Would you have the senior counsel, in opening the case, to go into full detail?—Certainly.

11,187. Then very little would be left to the junior to do?—No doubt; but the junior is there to assist—to get references, and to make suggestions.

11,188. The Lord Justice-General.—Do you contemplate that the junior counsel is not to speak?—No.

11,189. Then what is his function to be? Is he to follow the senior on the same side before the opposite side is heard?—No. Let there be an answer given to the senior's speech first. There may be very little then to do.

11,190. Then you would leave the reply to the junior?—Yes.

11,191. Do you think that would be satisfactory? How does it work in England?—The senior counsel there replies on the whole. There are five speeches.

11,192. Don't you think there are a great many cases that come by reclaiming notes before the Divisions, where a speech by the junior following the senior would be a very superfluous and a very wearisome proceeding?—Very; and very often it would not take place at all. It would practically come to this, that you would just have three speeches.

11,193. The Chairman.—Have you any further suggestions?—Yes. One great cause of dissatisfaction with the Court of Session arises from the intervention of the summar roll in the middle of a case. A case is called at half-past three o'clock, and you have half an hour of it; then next day there is a summar roll, and that extends down to half-past three again, and you have another half-hour of the case; and very remarkable and, let me say, not creditable results are derived from it. For example, I know of a little case from Dundee—Jaffrey v. Ritchie, 21 Dec. 1860—in which there were no less than eight days' hearings,—little bits of hearings of half an hour each day consumed with a case relative to the rejection of goods as not being conform to order; and there are fees for each day's hearing to counsel and agents on both sides,—in a case that might, if it had gone continuously on, have been disposed of in two hours. Now I humbly think that when a case has begun, and the people have come from the country to hear it, and are staying in town all night, it should be called first next morning, and disposed of before you begin with the summar roll, however summary. You would thereby save expense, and enable those parties who have come from a distance to be present at the hearing.

11,194. Would you make any difference in a case that is likely of itself to occupy several days?—These are very rare cases.

11,195. There have been such cases, and there was one in which you spoke a considerable length of time, but I thought with remarkable brevity,—a case of Muirhead—the Bredisholm coal case?—No doubt such cases do occur, and they ought to be exceptionally treated by putting them aside, and taking the summar roll. But any ordinary case like that of Jaffrey v. Ritchie should be disposed of at once.

11,196. The Lord Justice-General.—Is that an evil of present existence, or is it matter of history?—It is an evil of present existence still.

11,197. Can you give any example during the last year?—I have not the names of cases in my mind.

11,198. Mr. Shand.—It is still the rule, is it not, that the summar roll takes precedence of the short roll, even where there are partly heard cases?—Yes; I understand that to be the rule.

11,199. I understand your view to be, that in ordinary cases, and unless there be something exceptional, if a case is once begun, the parties being in possession of the court, the case should be continued without interruption by other cases?—Yes.

11,200. Do you think that would cause a saving of considerable expense?—It would be a saving of expense.

11,201. And it would give a much more satisfactory discussion than any other system?—Yes. If counsel were allowed to state their whole argument without interruption, that would shorten the proceedings too; but there can be no earthly doubt that discussions take up a great deal more time than they ought to do, in consequence of the judges interrupting the counsel. A man, if he is allowed to go on continuously, cannot say the same thing more than two or three times over; whereas, if he is interrupted by four judges now and then, he says it seven or eight times. The first qualification of a judge is the faculty of silence within the limits of human patience.

11,202. Have you any suggestion to make about advisings?—I would make this suggestion, viz. that one speech, and one only, should be delivered from the bench; let the other judges concur. There is no need of four judges repeating the same thing over and over again, and in striving for novelty to give some fresh idea of the case. The result is, that sometimes bad law is laid down; and when the case goes to the House of Lords, that is fixed on, though the judgment may be very sound.

11,203. The Chairman.—But if the judgment had been pronounced by the judge who laid down the bad law—?—Yes; but he would not have laid down the bad law, except by reason of the fact that he was obliged to say something new.

11,204. Mr. Shand.—Is there no evil in respect of the time occupied?—There must be. After the President of either Division has pronounced judgment, what is the use of listening to three more speeches of the same sort?

11,205. The Lord Justice-General.—Of course you mean if the judges are all of one mind?—Yes.

11,206. And all arrive at the same conclusion upon the same media?—Yes, and in the majority of cases it is so.

11,207. The Chairman.—Do you think that that is a matter which ought to be the subject of any fixed rule?—No.

11,208. But you think that in most cases, and where there is no particular reason for more than one judge announcing the judgment, it should be left to one judge to do so; as I believe is the custom now very much in disposing of cases upon matter of fact. But if judges were in use simply to concur, the public might not have confidence in their having studied the case?—If it were once understood that it was the practice for one judge to deliver the judgment of the court, I don't think the public would think that the other judges had not studied the case. They have listened to it, and they have expressed their public concurrence in the judgment.

11,209. The Lord Justice-General.—Probably your view would be most applicable and most expedient in cases which have been taken to avizandum, and formed the subject of consultation, and where the judges all concur in the ground of judgment?—Yes.

11,210. You would think that the most fitting occasion for delivering one judgment?—Yes.

11,211. Mr. Adam.—In a case where a record was closed, and probation renounced, do you see any objection to allowing the parties to go straight to the Inner House, without taking the Lord Ordinary's judgment?—Yes, I would object to that altogether. That is practically abolishing the Outer House, and having only one judgment, viz. the judgment of the Inner House, though we are no doubt doing that at the present moment in reference to matters of pure law arising under special cases.

11,212. I was putting the case of a record closed and probation renounced. That would just be assimilating it to a special case?—Yes.

11,213. Mr. Shand.—Do you think it would be expedient that the court should have the power, in cases of a character in which they thought it desirable, to order a reference; for example, in cases where disputed questions arise about remuneration for contractors' or engineers' work, or work of that kind, so as to save the parties the expense of each bringing up witnesses of skill to give conflicting evidence?—I observe that there is such a provision in the American code. The court have power to order a reference to be made. But that is a point which I have not considered.

11,214. Have you not found in many cases that the expense is very unnecessarily increased by each party bringing up two or three men of skill to speak to a matter which a man of skill as judge could decide for himself?—True; and the court there exercise the discretion of remitting to a man of skill.

11,215. Do you think the court have power to do that, and to hold the parties bound by his report?—I don't know the state of the decisions on that point. They are somewhat conflicting, but I think the court have power to do it. In the Paisley Abbey Yard case, the First Division laid it down that the court had the power to make an absolute remit. In that case there was an enormous proof of 200 or 300 printed pages as to the desecration of a churchyard, and it was laid down, I think, in that case, that a remit was the proper thing.

Patrick Fraser.

11,216. That was in the Sheriff Court?—Yes. It was upon an advocation.

11,217. Mr. Adam.—Was it not said that the remit should have been earlier?—The court said the remit should have been made at the outset, and no proof ordered.

11,218. Mr. Shand.—Does it occur to you, that in any cases expensive proofs might be saved by the court having power to order or allow the use of affidavits, or that a system of affidavits would be of any use with reference to questions of interim interdict?—No; I would not like to see the system of affidavits introduced into the Scotch courts. They have even been abolished in Exchequer cases now. They do no good. They might now and then prevent a man from making an untrue denial of a statement, but that is all.

11,219. Are they not often useful where a question of interim possession or interdict is to turn on the prima facie state of the facts?—A man who makes up his mind to apply for an interdict, or to oppose it, will make affidavit without fail.

11,220. Have you any suggestion to make about the Bill Chamber?—It seems to me that the Bill Chamber is now an utterly useless institution, because after a note of suspension and interdict is passed, you enrol it in the hand-roll of the Lord Ordinary at once. It does not need calling. It does not need the ordinary enrolling in the large roll. Then for what purpose does the Bill Chamber exist? To pass the note? What is a note of suspension and interdict but a petition for interdict? And the judge either refuses the interim interdict or grants it, and then the case should just go on like an ordinary petition for interdict in the Sheriff Court. Suppose he refuses to grant the interim interdict, why should he require to say, 'Pass the note, but refuse to grant interim interdict?' If interim interdict is refused, let the party go on or not as he pleases, without passing or no passing. We might come to the court in another shape, by an ordinary summons, claiming interdict in the conclusions, and we require no leave of the judge to come into court with such a summons. Now it seems to me that there is no use for the Bill Chamber at all, and that you ought to be allowed to present your application for interdict to any Lord Ordinary. One judge would no doubt be appointed in rotation to sit in Edinburgh during vacation. His clerk of court will be in town, and he will be the clerk to all petitions for interdict presented to him. The office of that clerk will be open. We would in this way get rid of a useless institution. Further, in regard to the Bill Chamber, I object to the limited hours that the office is open. It is only open for two hours a day. It ought to be open all day, and in the evening, for it is the most urgent court in the country. There might be a reason for keeping it up when formerly, after the passing of the note, as it was called, you required to call the case in the Court of Session, and to enrol it, and so forth, taking the two as different institutions; but all that being now done away with, I think it is simply an obstruction, and a useless expense.

11,221. The theory of the Bill Chamber has been, that it was a sort of outer court or threshold to the Court of Session. You think there is no substantial advantage to be got from that?—None at all. Formerly you came with advocations in that way, and until recently you required to come with all advocations of interlocutory judgments to the Bill Chamber, until these were abolished, and the judge judged of the propriety of allowing the advocation to go on at all. Now the whole of that jurisdiction is gone.

11,222. The Lord Justice-General.—The judge in the Bill Chamber in cases of interdict, and also in cases of suspension of diligence, judges whether the thing is to be allowed to go on at all?—Yes.

11,223. To whom would you transfer that power?—To any judge of the Court of Session during session.

11,224. That is to say, the judge to whom the note is presented will have the power of refusing the note de plano, as the Bill Chamber judge had before?—Yes.

11,225. That is hardly an exercise of the same kind of jurisdiction as the Lord Ordinary and Court of Session exercised—to refuse an application de plano, without even calling for an answer?—I would like to know why the judge should be entitled to refuse. He may refuse interim interdict on the prima facie statement of the case, but why should he refuse to allow a party to go on to prove the merits of his case upon a closed record?

11,226. Because it has no merits?—At the present moment he could come in another form into the Court of Session claiming interdict—viz. by a summons, with conclusions for interdict—and you cannot throw him out at the outset. In like manner, in the Sheriff Court, a petition for interdict is presented to the Sheriff: he refuses the interim interdict, but he cannot prevent the party going on with closing a record and proving his case on the merits, and demanding final interdict at the end of the day.

11,227. Then you think it desirable that the judge, whether he be Bill Chamber judge or not, should not have the power of refusing a note of suspension and interdict at once?—I think he should not have that power.

11,228. What do you say to the suspension of diligence?—There he should have simply a power of refusing the note.

11,229. That power must exist, because if he had not that power, the diligence would be suspended?—He refuses to suspend it in the meantime on this statement until the grounds of suspension are proved.

11,230. But a man against whom a caption is taken, who is going to jail, presents a note of suspension to have the diligence stopped: what is to happen there? If the judge is of opinion that there is no good reason why the man should not be incarcerated, what is he to do?—He refuses to suspend ad interim.

11,231. That is to say, he refuses the note?—Yes.

11,232. Would you alter that?—No, I don't propose to do so.

11,233. Mr. Shand.—Do I rightly understand your suggestion to be, that each Lord Ordinary should take up suspensions and interdicts just as the Sheriff-substitute would take up a suspension and interdict, deal with the question of interim possession, and leave the process to take its ordinary course?—Yes.

11,234. The Lord Justice-General.—But the effect of that would be, that the question whether a diligence is regular and ought to have effect would not be determined at once, but would remain to be determined, although the man was in the meantime in prison, or his goods poinded?—Yes.

11,235. Now is it not much more desirable that there should be a means of determining that at once, by the Lord Ordinary refusing the note, if he is satisfied that there is no ground of suspension, leaving the suspender to reclaim to the Inner House? Is it not very desirable that a question about the regularity or propriety of a diligence should be determined summarily and at once?—I don't propose to take away that power from the Lord Ordinary. I propose to give that power to the Lord Ordinary; but at the same time I want to take away from him the power of throwing it entirely out of court at once, on the mere statement in the suspension. Let the suspender prove his case if he can.

11,236. If he is to be allowed still an opportunity of proving his case, the matter will not be determined in that summary way?—The interim suspension will be determined. It is refused ad interim.

11,237. But in the question whether diligence has been regularly used, or whether there is sufficient ground for using diligence, and where it is desirable to have an immediate decision, is there any reason why the present system, under which you get that immediate decision, should be altered in favour of another, which would allow the case to go on to make up a record, and lead evidence, when the court can at once pronounce without hesitation that the suspender has no ground for suspending the diligence at all?—Well, I would give the Lord Ordinary power, if he saw an irrelevant note of suspension, to throw it out at once; but in cases of interdict, what is the necessity for passing the note, when you are merely refusing interim interdict?

11,238. Mr. Shand.—If a party presents a note of suspension, and he is refused ad interim such relief as he asks, it is in his own choice whether he shall accept that as final, or go on with his case; but is there any hardship to anybody, that if he chooses to go on, he should be allowed to do so?—I don't see any.

11,239. Do you see any reason why that case should not take the usual course of closing the record, if the party who has not got the interim remedy desires that?—If the interim remedy is refused him, at the present moment he can get, without leave of the court, an attack made upon this diligence by reduction. He can get the same remedy, reducing it and setting it aside.

11,240. The Chairman.—But meantime the creditor has his diligence?—True.

11,241. And gets payment of his money?—So he would, if the interim interdict were refused.

11,242. The Lord Justice-General.—Do you mean that you would convert that into a process of reduction?—Practically it would be so.

11,243. Mr. Webster.—Suppose the interim interdict were granted on the condition of caution, how would you deal with that matter of caution?—Do you mean what clerk should take it?

11,244. Yes?—The clerk of the Lord Ordinary to whom the application is made.

11,245. Mr. Shand.—That is a case that occurs every day in the Sheriff Court?—Yes.

11,246. There is no peculiarity in suspensions in the Court of Session that does not apply to every case of suspension and interdict in the Sheriff Court?—Not one.

11,247. And there is nothing analogous to a Bill Chamber, or the passing of a note there?—No.

11,248. And it works satisfactorily?—Yes. The Bill Chamber seems to me to be an antiquated institution altogether. It is a mere name.

11,249. Mr. Webster.—How would you deal with sequestrations?—I would allow any Lord Ordinary to grant sequestration.

11,250. The Chairman.—You would hold the Lord Ordinary for the time in vacation to have the same power that the Bill Chamber judge has now?—Yes.

11,251. Mr. Shand.—Is it not found to be a considerable evil at present, that the junior Lord Ordinary's time is almost exclusively occupied for days during session with Bill Chamber work?—It is so.

11,252. What is the result of that on his ordinary business?—He can do nothing.

11,253. His debates lie over for months?—Yes.

11,254. Do you not think it would be very much better, both on that account, and in order to have important questions distributed among the Lords Ordinary, that applications for interdict should be presented to any Lord Ordinary?—I think so. No special business should be appropriated to one judge. His mind gradually gets a twist, and he gets into a particular groove. All business should be distributed over the whole court. One is sometimes afflicted with the peculiar notions of a particular judge, and it impedes business.

11,255. Mr. Campbell.—A practical difficulty has been suggested in the event of the abolition of the Bill Chamber Office, that assuming a man to present his suspension and interdict to one Lord Ordinary, and it was refused, he might repeat the processs and try another Lord Ordinary?—And why not? I see no great difficulty in that. He gets his remedy from one of the judges of the Supreme Court.

11,256. The Lord Justice-General.—You would require to have some special arrangement about caveats?—Yes; there might be a special arrangement that they should all be put up at a particular place. I suppose the same difficulty which Mr. Campbell has suggested occurs in England, where there are three or four Vice-Chancellors, and you see every day an application for an injunction made to one court, and it is refused, and the party tries another.

11,257. The Chairman.—But here, a party might try the whole of the five Lords Ordinary in that way. Would it not be right to limit the number of applications?—It might be limited, and a roll might be made up, from which it would appear whether a prior application had been made.

11,258. Or you might require that when a second application is made, it should be stated to be a second application?—Yes.

11,259. The Lord Justice-General.—What is the great advantage you expect from abolishing the Bill Chamber?—You distribute the work among the five judges. I think that a great advantage. You don't overwhelm one man with special business; you get rid of a useless form, and that is always an advantage.

11,260. Mr. Webster.—Would you also distribute the summary petitions, which at present go all to the junior Lord Ordinary?—I said so. I have nothing to suggest as to costs; that must be always a matter in the discretion of the court.

11,261. The Lord Justice-General.—I rather think that under that head is intended to be embraced any suggestion you may have to offer with a view of diminishing the expense of litigation. Have you anything to say about that?—I don't see how the business of a Supreme Court can be carried on more cheaply than it is at the present moment. I have been reading about the courts in other countries, and I see that the expense there is about the same as in our own, if not greater. Even in New York it is so, where persons are both counsel and agents at the same time. I cannot suggest any practical remedy to diminish the expense.

11,262. Have you ever considered the details of accounts of expenses, in order to see where the great expense lies?—The great expense lies chiefly in the continued hearings. If a case could be decided in one day, without being taken to avizandum, there would be little expense, comparatively speaking. That, of course, cannot be done in difficult cases; but where, as in the case of Jaffrey, which I referred to, you have eight different refreshers to counsel, and fees to agents for attendance, and that on both sides, it becomes very heavy.

11,263. The Chairman.—That is an exceptional case?—Well, I cannot say. For example, I don't think the calling of a case at half-past three, and giving half an hour or twenty minutes to it, is an advantage.

11,264. You would rather the court should rise?—Yes. The court are tired, and counsel are tired, and the half-hour counts in the matter of expenses as a day's hearing.

11,265. The Lord Justice-General.—Do you think it is indispensable, for the continuation of that discussion on the next day, that counsel should receive an additional fee?—I think that counsel must be paid according to the extent of his labour; and if he requires two days to debate the cause, he must be paid for it.

11,266. The counsel is in attendance at court all day, and every day; the amount of time occupied in preparing himself for the hearing, and the amount of time consumed in the hearing, is the same, although the hearing may be upon two days instead of one: why should he be paid more?—All I have to say to that is, that it is the rule.

11,267. Is it the rule, and therefore ought it to continue, or is it the rule, and a bad rule, and therefore ought it to be abolished? That is the alternative?—Why should cases be called at a quarter to four? It is the court that is to blame here, and not the counsel.

11,268. Mr. Baxter.—Suppose you are fee'd to state the case, should you be fee'd twice?—Certainly not; but it is the rule here, and I believe the rule in the House of Lords too, that for every day a paper is in the cause-list, fees are due to agents and to counsel.

Patrick Fraser.

11,269. The Chairman.—There is some little difference there, because counsel taken to the House of Lords have not the same means of being occupied in other courts on that day. In the Court of Session, counsel don't give themselves for the day to a particular Division?—I refer to English counsel when I speak of the House of Lords. They have bar fees for every day the case is on the roll.

11,270. Mr. Campbell.—In the Sheriff Court the payment is regulated by the number of hours occupied. Would such a rule not apply to counsel, viz. if he gave a number of hours to the discussion of a case, equivalent to the average length of one or more days, that he should be paid for that one or more days' work according to the number of hours occupied?—In the Sheriff Court they are paid by the hour in proofs, but not for speeches.

11,271. The Lord Justice-General.—Suppose a counsel to have sent with his papers originally a fee quite sufficient to remunerate him for his study of the case, and for his debating the case, is there any reason in principle why that fee should be supplemented because the discussion of the case is begun one afternoon and finished next morning, instead of having begun in the morning and finished in the afternoon?—I admit there is none. It is a modern practice. Lord Cowan told me that it was not in use in his time; and it is not in use in the Outer House.

11,272. Is it the case that the scale of fees to counsel has been increased very much in the last ten years?—No; I don't think it has increased very much; but the scale of fees here is lower than it is in the English courts.

11,273. But in the Scotch courts has it or has it not increased within the last ten years?—Large fees have been given, no doubt, to counsel, which the court have disallowed and cut down; but there has not been an increase to any very great extent.

11,274. Mr. Campbell.—Has not the rate of professional remuneration in all learned professions, and professions of skill, been largely enhanced within the last ten years?—Very much.

11,275. The Lord Justice-General.—Has the rate of remuneration of agents in the Court of Session increased at the same time?—Yes; they have got an increase.

11,276. When was that?—By the last table of fees.

11,277. Mr. Webster.—I think the rate of fees, as fixed in 1806, remains unchanged?—Oh, no; it is a great deal later than that.

11,278. Mr. Adam.—Are you not thinking of fees for conveyancing?—I daresay I am.

11,279. The Chairman.—Do you think there is any propriety or any practicability in fixing absolute limits to counsel's fees?—I think it would be utterly impossible, because of the varying nature of cases.

11,280. You cannot tell beforehand how long a case will occupy?—If you attempt to fix any rule of that kind, it would come to be a matter of special bargain in every case.

11,281. It would cease to be a honorarium?—Yes; and no member of a learned profession is bound to work for less than his talent is worth; and he won't do it, fix it as you please. Further, it would degrade the profession altogether. I don't know any place where it is done.

11,282. The Lord Justice-General.—Bargaining for fees would probably not lead to their being smaller?—No; a counsel is necessary, or thought to be necessary, for a particular case.

11,283. It would seem, then, that the only point in which counsel's fees can be very well meddled with is the matter of continuation fees?—Yes.

11,284. Not with a view to abolishing additional fees altogether, because causes may last much longer than was anticipated when the first fee was sent?—Yes.

11,285. That you would of course except from the answer you formerly gave?—I would.

11,286. Mr. Webster.—A suggestion has been made, that a good deal of the formal work in which at present counsel is required, might be done by direct communication between the agent and the judge at chambers. Would you favour us with your views upon that matter?—Would you give an example of the kind of formal work to which you refer?

11,287. Applications for diligences, or for commissions to examine witnesses?—I see no objection to that being done by the agents going to the judge direct.

11,288. The signing of any note or minute about a mere matter of procedure or form?—There you come upon more difficult ground,—putting papers into process signed by any other than the counsel in the cause. But as to applying for diligences, that can be done at present by applying to the clerk, and counsel are excluded.

11,289. You can only at present apply to the clerk with effect if your opponent consents, which is practically never done; but is there any reason why the agent might not do that kind of work in direct communication with the judge?—None whatever. I see no reason why he should not do it.

11,290. As to reclaiming notes, which are now mere matter of form, is there any necessity for keeping up the system of having these signed by counsel?—It is a prayer to the court to get a judgment altered. It must be signed by some one; and unless it is signed by counsel it will be signed by agents, who will get their fee for it instead of it going to counsel; so that it is no saving to the client.

11,291. The agent never gets fees for signing. He would get his fee of six shillings for drawing the reclaiming note, which is matter of form, without a prayer?—He does not sign it at present; but he would soon claim and get his fee for signing.

11,292. The Lord Justice-General.—Suppose it were to be provided that the additional labour undergone by the agent in attaching his name to the reclaiming note which he has written, should not entitle him to any additional remuneration, then the counsel's fee would be saved?—Well, it would only be a guinea. The counsel is generally asked the question, Shall we reclaim against this interlocutor? and his opinion is delivered upon that, and he is paid for his opinion by the guinea which he gets for signing the reclaiming note.

11,293. Mr. Webster.—For that he also attends the moving of it?—Yes. As regards the privileges of agents, there are sometimes very anomalous matters connected with that. For example, I have two bodies of procurators in Renfrewshire, totally separate and independent of each other. The Paisley procurators cannot plead in Greenock, and the Greenock procurators cannot plead in Paisley. I have very frequently found great inconvenience arising from that. The Paisley ones have got a charter, and the Greenock ones have not; they come under the Procurators Act. Now I would propose that all agents throughout Scotland should be eligible to practise in every Sheriff Court. It would be very little taken advantage of. Sometimes a Glasgow writer might come out to Paisley, or to Pollokshaws. They do come out there already, and I am obliged to hear them there, because Pollokshaws is six miles from Paisley, and only two from Glasgow. I would therefore allow all the procurators throughout Scotland to practise in any Sheriff Court; and I think that would very frequently conduce to convenience. In like manner, I would abolish the law established in 1823 by a decision of the court, to the effect that it is pactum illicitum for a country agent and a town agent to bargain about the division of their accounts. That system exists in England, and works very well; and it gives the country agent an interest in the cause, and is the only way of remunerating him.

11,294. The Lord Justice-General.—Would you carry that extension of the privileges of agents any further?—So as to enable them to practise in the Court of Session?

11,295. Yes?—I would. That would be very little taken advantage of either, I think. There must be some person in Edinburgh to go to the clerks' offices, and to borrow processes. It would take away a kind of privilege which is supposed to belong to the Edinburgh agents. It would, I think, increase the affection, if there be any, for the Court of Session in the minds of country agents, who would then know that they were members of that court as well as the Edinburgh agents.

11,296. The Chairman.—Would you have any control of the court as to admitting them as agents to practise before the court, or would it be a right which they would have by reason of their admission anywhere?—No, I don't think so. I think all these procurators, if they have the privilege of practising in the Supreme Court and throughout the country, should be admitted by one central authority, as they are by the Court of Queen's Bench in England. Every Sheriff is at present entitled to admit, and does admit, procurators. I would take away that power from the Sheriffs, and confer it either on the Court of Session, or upon representatives of various bodies—such as the advocates, the writers to the signet, and the solicitors themselves throughout the country.

11,297. The Lord Justice-General.—The admission to practise before courts is rather a judicial act, is it not?—It is. Well, give it to either of the Divisions of the court.

11,298. The Chairman.—It would be difficult for the court to make trial of the qualifications of all the procurators in Scotland. But how would it do that such country practitioners as desired to have the privilege of practising in the Court of Session should have themselves admitted, the court satisfying itself as to their qualifications?—I would make all the procurators at present in existence members of the Court of Session without any examination at all. They have been admitted, and they have passed. But in future I would say the procurators must be admitted by the court; and make them all be admitted procurators of court, without reference to application at all. A great many people won't take the trouble of making application, and yet would like to be considered members of the Court of Session.

11,299. Do you think they ought to have some person in Edinburgh who would be responsible for the borrowing of the papers, and so forth?—Yes; there should be the same rule here as in the House of Lords. Any agent here, for example, may practise in the House of Lords; but he must have an office in London. He may put his own name on the back of the appeal case, and not employ an English attorney at all; but he must have an office in London, where papers can be served on him. Now, if a country agent is to borrow processes, he must have some person in Edinburgh responsible for the borrowing of them.

11,300. A suggestion was made before this Commission, that country agents should have the privilege of communicating from the country direct with counsel, and that the counsel by his clerk should borrow the process, and transmit it to the agents in the country. Do you think that would work?—No, it would not work at all. Some counsel would do it, and some would not, and could not be expected to do it.

11,301. I understand from what you have said, that you think the court should consist of Lords Ordinary and two Divisions, with an occasional Division when required?—Yes.

11,302. Do you think that the number of judges in the Court of Session is too great for the work they have to do?—No; I think it should be added to; and I humbly think that the salaries of the judges of the Court of Session should be increased. The salaries of the judges of the Court of Session are lower than those of the supreme judges in England and Ireland. At present I think the staff of the court is insufficient for the work. Some of the judges in the Outer House are overwhelmed with work; and in all probability one or two of them will have no vacation. Now a judge requires some rest; otherwise he becomes unfit for duty.

11,303. Have you anything to say as to the Court of Justiciary?—The Court of Justiciary exercises a jurisdiction of review in notes of suspension and liberation; and the applications to it on that ground are generally made by poor people, so that it may be considered as the poor man's court. Now the fees in that court are the highest of any court in the country. Before a hearing can be got in the Court of Justiciary, each of the parties—the suspender and the respondent—must pay a guinea to the clerk, and half a guinea to the macer; that is three guineas. If the case is continued till next day, other three guineas must be paid to these officials; and if there is avizandum made to a third day, other three guineas must be paid.

11,304. Mr. Baxter.—What for?—Just for nothing at all. I have here a note of clerk's dues in causa 'Caledonian Railway v. Fleming, payable by respondent, Feb. 20: diet of court, £1, 1s.; copy interlocutor, 2s.;' and the copy was taken by the clerk of the agent. That is £1, 3s. for that diet paid to the clerks. And then the macer's account is: 'To diet of court in advocation and suspension, Caledonian Railway, 10s. 6d.' Now that ought to be abolished. If it is necessary that these clerks should be remunerated, they ought to be remunerated in another way than by exacting these heavy fees, which are a practical obstruction to the review by the Court of Justiciary.

11,305. The Lord Justice-General.—Do these fees go into the pockets of these officials?—I am so informed.

11,306. In addition to their salaries?—I suppose so. They go into the pockets of these officials.

11,307. Are you sure that they don't account for them to the Exchequer?—That would make it still worse. I was informed that they get them themselves. Now it is the more necessary that this matter should be regulated, seeing that the jurisdiction of the Court of Justiciary in these suspensions has been very largely increased by the Summary Procedure Act of 1864. Cases which were formerly considered civil cases, and were brought before the Court of Session, are now relegated to that court. While speaking of the Summary Procedure Act, allow me to say this, that that Act contains very stringent provisions, very large powers to Justices of the Peace, and cutting off the review which formerly was competent to the Court of Justiciary. For example, it is no longer necessary that proofs should be written down in any of these cases; whereas the law formerly was, that unless the writing down of the proof was dispensed with, it must be written down, and the court saw where there was any error or flaw. But all that is now required to be done is to present the complaint, to state the plea, and then the sentence. Now it was proposed that the Justice of the Peace should be obliged to state a case for the opinion of the Court of Justiciary upon the application of the defender; and clauses were drawn and inserted in the bill, and it passed the House of Commons in that form. But an outcry got up, stimulated by a number of the Procurators-fiscal in the west, to the effect that it would trouble them very much to prepare these special cases, and the whole of these clauses were struck out of the bill in the House of Lords. These were the clauses in the English Act 11 and 12 Vict. c. 43. In England any party is entitled to demand from the Justice convicting him a case setting forth the facts as he found them to be proved, and then the law as he applied it, and that is put before the Court of Queen's Bench. Now I say that that power ought to exist in this country also, for very frequently a Justice himself feels difficulty in construing the statute; he convicts with hesitation, it may be, and is anxious that his judgment should be set right, but there is no means of doing it. I would therefore propose that the whole of these eleven or twelve clauses giving that power of stating a special case should be passed into law.

11,308. Mr. Baxter.—Does it apply to Justices of the Peace only?—No; it applies to Sheriffs also.

11,309. Mr. Campbell.—In general, the Sheriffs have thought the Summary Procedure Act so inexpedient, that they have proceeded under the old form, and have not availed themselves of the provisions of that Act?—They have. In a number of counties Sheriffs have directed the Fiscals not to bring prosecutions under the Act at all, but to bring them under the old form, and to take down the proof, where it is not dispensed with by the special statute. I may state, in reference to the matter of costs in the Court of Justiciary, that the Faculty of Advocates made a report on the subject to the late Lord Advocate, and gave him a table of fees, but he did not attend to it—I don't know through what influence. The Faculty reported: 'The attention of the committee has been drawn to the fees taken from suitors before the High Court of Justiciary, in the office of the Clerk of Justiciary, and by the macers. These appear to the committee to be excessive. The committee recommend that a provision be inserted in the present Bill to the following effect: "The following and no other or higher fees shall be allowed to be taken for any matters due in or under any bill or process of suspension, suspension and liberation, or advocation, by clerks or macers of court."' That report was approved of by the Faculty.

11,310. Mr. Baxter.—Are the fees suggested very much less?—Very much less.

11,311. The Chairman.—What is the date of that report?—26th May 1868.

11,312. Mr. Adam.—It is a report upon the Court of Justiciary (Scotland) Bill?—Yes.

11,313. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestion to make?—I have no further suggestion.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD COLONSAY IN THE CHAIR.

The Hon. Lord Ormidale.

THE HON. LORD ORMIDALE, examined.

11,314. The Chairman.—You are one of the Senators of the College of Justice?—I am. But will you allow me, before the examination proceeds, to mention that I have been till to-day engaged constantly in the discharge of my official duties in court or otherwise, and therefore I fear that I have not been able to bestow that attention on what I understand are to be the matters of inquiry, to enable me to give my answers so fully or so satisfactorily as I should wish; but so far as I can, I shall be most happy to give every information and aid in my power to the Commissioners.

11,315. How long have you been on the bench?—Seven years in February last.

11,316. In what year did you come to the bar?—In 1838; I think I was twenty-three years at the bar.

11,317. Previous to coming to the bar, you had an opportunity of seeing a good deal of practice in the department of preparing cases?—Yes; previous to being called to the bar I practised as a writer to the signet for several years, and for eight years while at the bar I was Sheriff of Renfrewshire.

11,318. I believe you have directed your attention a good deal to the forms of procedure, to the evils of delay, and to the expense attending litigation in the Court of Session?—I could hardly avoid doing so, from the long experience I have had in various departments of the legal profession.

11,319. Have you any suggestions to offer to the Commission in regard to obviating these evils, or improving the constitution and procedure of the court?—I would prefer if questions were put to me on the various points on which my opinion may be desired. I may mention, however, that I have to some extent directed my attention to what appears to me to be the causes of the great delay and expense which have attended litigation in the Supreme Court; and I have also had some experience, although not as yet a year's experience, of the recent statute, which has to a considerable extent, I think, remedied those evils. It has already done a great deal of good, and I expect it will be found to effect a great deal more. I should add, however, that I may perhaps be somewhat partial to that measure, because it embodied and gave effect to a very great extent to many of the views and suggestions which I had given public expression to, shortly before it was introduced into Parliament.

11,320. And given expression to after full consideration?—I think I may say so.

11,321. Have any further changes occurred to you which you think it would be desirable to make?—In regard to the mere regulations of the court, for the purpose of carrying on litigations, from any experience I have had of the working of the recent statute, I don't feel myself in a situation to suggest any material changes or alterations, except such as I think the court under the statute have power themselves by rules or Acts of Sederunt to carry into effect. But we have scarcely as yet had sufficient experience to enable us to frame such rules or Acts of Sederunt. I, for one, think—and I believe my brother judges may probably be of the same opinion—that we should not be hasty in making these rules, till we have had more experience of the working of the statute.

11,322. I infer from what you say, that nothing has presented itself to your mind that would require the intervention of the Legislature to correct?—I think not, in regard to the mere regulation of the proceedings in court. Probably the Commissioners may be aware that I have entertained for a long time an opinion in regard to the constitution of the court itself, which has not been given effect to in the recent Act, and I may say that I still continue to entertain that opinion.

11,323. What is that opinion?—It relates to the doing away with the Lords Ordinary in the Outer House. According to my view, the same number of judges, however, would require to be continued, to carry on the work on the footing that I have now to suggest to the Commissioners, of three Divisions being formed; because then there would only be one judge left, supposing that each of the Divisions consisted of four judges. Assuming, then, that there were three Divisions, with four judges attached to each, there would be only one judge left for the Bill Chamber work; which, with those other proceedings that at present are carried on before the junior Lord Ordinary, would probably engage the most of his time; and if it did not, there would be jury trials and proofs, and other matters which I need not enumerate, quite sufficient to occupy the whole time that he would have at his disposal.

11,324. Have you considered how you would regulate the procedure in the event of there being three Divisions? I suppose that causes would have to originate in the Divisions?—That does not occur to me as probably the best course. I think that there being always one judge in the Outer House, as I have suggested, all causes should be called before him in the first instance; and if it were found necessary, there might be another judge in turn from one or other of the three Divisions, before whom the causes in the first instance would be prepared to the extent of having the record closed and probation renounced; and that being done, the causes would take their places in the Divisions, to be then proceeded with. And it might possibly happen, even after that was done, that a remit for certain purposes would require to be made to the judge officiating in the Outer House, for the purpose, for example, of taking an incidental proof; or if the number of trials and proofs were to increase, so that it was impossible for the single judge in the Outer House to overtake them, they might occasionally require the services of one of the judges of the Inner House.

11,325. You would not contemplate, then, that in the Outer House any judgment should be pronounced?—No judgment on the merits of the suit. There might be many subordinate questions occurring in the course of the preparation of causes, as to which it would be quite right and proper that the judge before whom the making up of the record was going on should at once decide. Many matters of that description, I think, might be fairly left to his judgment, without giving any right of reclaiming to the Inner House. At the same time, his judgment on these points, or some of them, might be left open for reconsideration in the Inner House, when the case went there, although not reviewable in the first instance. There are a great many of such details which could only be well dealt with in the course of preparing a measure upon the general basis I have suggested; and therefore any suggestion which I now make about them, must be on the understanding that I have not matured my mind in regard to them.

11,326. The case being prepared for judgment in the way you describe, it would go to the Division and be heard by counsel?—Yes.

11,327. And then the Division would pronounce judgment upon it. Would you have that judgment to be final?—No; I think that in certain circumstances, and subject to certain conditions, there ought to be a right in the unsuccessful party to have the judgment reviewed in a court of review or court of error, whatever it might be called, consisting of 5 or 7 judges of the other two Divisions—I mean the Divisions other than the one in which the judgment was pronounced. But it has occurred to me that it might be advisable to have always one judge of the Division in which the judgment was pronounced present in the court of review, that he might give such explanations as might be thought right to the court of review. But that, again, is a matter of detail which could only be well considered in the preparation of a measure in conformity with the general principles I have explained.

11,328. Do you mean that the composition of the court of review is a matter of detail?—The composition of the court of review, and the question whether any of the judges of the court by whom the judgment was in the first instance pronounced should be present in that court, may, not inaccurately, I think, be called matter of detail, although of the greatest importance. Then, as a check to unnecessary litigation by parties asking a review in all cases, it has occurred to me that such review should not be allowed at all, except in those cases where there has been a difference of opinion among the judges in the first instance, in which case I think the right of the unsuccessful party to have a review should be absolute, but that where the judgment of the court in the first instance is unanimous, there should be no review, unless with the leave of the court obtained at the time the judgment is pronounced, or very soon afterwards. It has occurred to me that that would give sufficient protection to litigants against the risk of a hasty or erroneous judgment in the first instance; and it rather occurs to me, that a judgment pronounced in the circumstances and subject to the right of review I have explained, would probably turn out to be more satisfactory to the country, and in reality to be sounder and better, than a judgment pronounced under the present system. I think that, according to the plan I have suggested, there would be a very great saving of time, and also in the general case, where there has been no review of the judgment of the Division, an immense saving of expense. Any one who has had experience or been conversant with litigation as it goes on in the Court of Session, and probably in all courts—the superior courts in England as well as in Scotland—must be aware that there are many questions litigated, and very keenly litigated, which neither involve much difficulty, nor much patrimonial or pecuniary interest. In a great many of these cases, I think that one judgment of the court is quite sufficient, more especially if that court consists of four judges, each of whom, it may be presumed, has had large experience in different departments of the law. One may have had great experience in the conveyancing department, or construction of deeds; he may have been very much engaged while at the bar as a chamber counsel, giving opinions on deeds and conveyancing questions; another, again, may have had very large experience in the jury court, and be familiar with questions of evidence; another may have been, from circumstances, much engaged in commercial questions, and so on. One judgment by a court so constituted, would, I cannot doubt, be found, in by far the greater number of causes, to be quite sufficient, and satisfactory to the country.

11,329. That is, when it is unanimous?—When it is unanimous; and the review being a right absolute in the party where there is a difference of opinion, would probably completely clear up the difficulty; and at all events there would be obtained as sound and satisfactory a judgment as could in any circumstances be expected.

11,330. When the judgment was unanimous, it would not be competent to the party without leave to go to the court of review?—That is my opinion.

11,331. Would you make it competent to the party to appeal to the House of Lords?—I would leave that open. I think that should not be denied to a party. It might be a consideration with the House of Lords, when the cause went there, that the court below were so satisfied as to the soundness of their judgment, that they saw no sufficient reason for a review. But I would leave the right of appeal to the House of Lords open.

11,332. Would you have the Division to take the evidence in the case themselves?—If the single judge, who would always be officiating in the Outer House according to my suggestion, had time at his disposal, I think that to the extent of the time which he so had at his disposal, remits for proofs might be very well made to him. But there would be this disadvantage, that he could only report the proof; while if one of the judges of the Division took the proof, he would then form one of the court giving judgment upon it, and be able to give his views to the court, and to give them very valuable assistance as to the judgment that ought to be pronounced, having had the advantage, which the other judges forming the Division would not, of having seen and heard the witnesses.

11,333. You would not contemplate that evidence should be taken before the four judges, but only by one of them?—I cannot contemplate its being taken before four judges. That would require I don't know how many judges to overtake the proofs; but I have some observations to make at another stage of the inquiry on the subject of proofs before a judge, because I have thought for a long time—indeed, I never had any other opinion—that the proofs which are now so much gone into ought to a large extent to be superseded altogether, and that in questions of disputed fact a jury is the proper tribunal.

11,334. Have you considered whether the judge that sits in the Outer House to prepare records should be always the same judge until a vacancy occurs in one of the Divisions, or whether there should be a change?—That is a point which has not occurred to me for consideration. It is a matter of detail.

11,335. Have you not formed any opinion on that subject?—I have really formed no particular opinion on it. The only thing which had caused some little consideration of it in my own mind was a suggestion I saw lately made, to the effect that the Inner House judges should take their turn in the Outer House, and that the

The Hon. Lord Ormidale.

Outer House judges should take their turn in the Inner House. Now, in regard to that proposal, which involves to some extent the point which you are now inquiring about, I cannot see the propriety of it at all. In the first place, I don't see what object it would serve; and in the second place, I can quite understand, and am fully convinced, that it would give rise to a great disarrangement of business, and to loss of time. A Lord Ordinary sitting in the Outer House for a month, and then transferred to another tribunal, would leave a number of cases in a transition state; and the time that he had been engaged with them would probably be entirely lost, because a new judge would require to begin them again. Therefore I cannot see any advantage arising from that proposal, and I see a great many disadvantages.

11,336. You are aware that that system at one time existed, and that it was abolished?—I am aware that it did exist, and I am not in the least surprised that it should have been put an end to. It was abolished in 1810. I have had a little experience recently as to what would be the working of such a plan—I allude to the Court of the Lords Ordinary. There I felt, as I have no doubt all the Lords Ordinary who formed that court must have felt, that even the attending it led to very great embarrassment in the proper discharge of their other duties as Lords Ordinary, and to the loss of a great deal of time, and a great deal of unnecessary trouble to the litigants and their representatives.

11,337. I believe a considerable portion of the time of the Lords Ordinary at the commencement of last winter session was so occupied?—According to the best of my recollection, there were two periods of four weeks each, during which that court sat for three days out of five in each week.

11,338. And all the Lords Ordinary except one were engaged in that court?—Yes; four out of the five Lords Ordinary were so engaged.

11,339. Have you anything to state with reference to the jurisdiction of the court?—I should like, before doing so, to make one or two additional suggestions with reference to the subject of the three Divisions. It has occurred to me, in regard to that matter, that the practice has by no means been consistent, and it is difficult to reconcile it with the idea that there ought to be an independent judgment, in the first place, by a Lord Ordinary, and then a review by a Division of the court. For according to any little investigation I have had time to make on the point, I find that in many of the most important, complicated, and difficult cases, the Lord Ordinary, in place of deciding the case himself, reported it to the Inner House; and not only so, but very eminent judges have stated as a reason for their doing so, that the difficulty of the case, and the greater expedition in obtaining a judgment, recommended that course to them. I find that that course was frequently followed in entail cases. In the Auchindoir case, for example, 20th November 1840, 3 Dunlop 136, Lord Jeffrey did not decide the case. He ordered written argument for the purpose of reporting, and then he reported without a decision, 'merely that the parties might,' as he said, 'have the benefit of a final judgment with the least possible expense and delay.' Lord Cuninghame, in the Strathbrock entail, on 23d June 1842, 4 Dunlop 1430, followed the same course; assigning as his reason, that both parties expressed a desire to obtain a judgment with as little delay as possible. Again, in the Rannieston entail case, 26th February 1842, 4 Dunlop 816, Lord Jeffrey reported the case to one of the Divisions without any judgment of his own, assigning as his reason, that the parties 'may have the benefit of a final judgment with as little delay as possible, and because it appears to him that some of the points that are raised in it are attended with considerable difficulty;' and in the Aboyne entail case, 4 Dunlop 843, Lord Jeffrey followed the same course, assigning as his reason, that it was necessary that it should be decided with the least possible delay. In the case of Stevenson and Others v. Hamilton and Others, 3d December 1838, 1 Dunlop 181, involving difficult questions of the rights of a husband and wife in a question with creditors, Lord Moncreiff adopted that course, stating that, 'although the Lord Ordinary has formed a decided opinion on some points in the case, he thinks that the most important question involved is one of difficulty; and as the decision of it one way would supersede altogether several of the other points which it would be necessary to determine if an opposite judgment were pronounced, he thinks that it would be most convenient for saving expense to the party that the cause should be reported without a judgment.' And we are all aware that some of the most important causes, and just because they were held to be very important, were appropriated exclusively to the Inner House, and not allowed to go to the Lord Ordinary at all.

11,340. Lord Barcaple.—Perhaps you would explain how that course of reporting came to save time?—That is another affair; but I can understand that it would save time in this way, that if decided by the Lord Ordinary, there must be a full consideration by him in the first instance; and some of the more important cases might remain on his table a considerable time before he gave judgment.

11,341. Did the Lord Ordinary not, in every one of the cases you have mentioned, give a very detailed and elaborate note?—It is one thing to decide a case, and it is another to report the pros and cons—the argument of the one party and the other—and even to indicate the judge's own view. The Lords Ordinary did so in all these cases, I presume, or at all events in most of them; for they gave very elaborate opinions,—opinions that must have been of great use to the judges of the Inner House; but I have yet to learn that it is the proper function of a judge to report cases, and not to decide them. I think it is an anomalous position to put judges in, to make them mere reporters to another tribunal.

11,342. I suppose the case got precedence in the rolls of the Inner House by being reported?—I am not aware; I don't think so.

11,343. The system of reporting in that way from the Outer House is now in abeyance, is it not?—So far as my experience has gone, I report few cases; I decide them.

11,344. The Lord Justice-General.—I think the cases you have referred to as examples of reporting all occurred before the year 1850?—Probably they occurred mostly before that; but I don't think all of them did.

11,345. I think all you have mentioned did so?—Yes.

11,346. You are aware, I daresay, that since that date there have been very few cases reported?—Probably very few; and the practice has gone into desuetude lately.

11,347. To what do you ascribe that?—It is difficult to tell. I got no direction one way or other when I was appointed a judge. But I thought it was my proper duty to decide each cause, and I have accordingly done so.

11,348. You are aware of the section of the Act 1850, prohibiting the ordering of cases or minutes of debate in the Outer House?—That may have been partly the cause.

11,349. Previous to that Act it was not competent to report cases without ordering cases or minutes of debate. The same section rendered it competent to report them without cases or minutes of debate; but still, notwithstanding the facility thus given for reporting cases, as soon as that statute passed, the custom came to an end?—I cannot say that.

11,350. Is it not to be explained in this way, that ordering cases or minutes of debate saved the Lord Ordinary the oral hearing before himself, and saved him also the labour of pronouncing a judgment?—I doubt that very much, because, according to any recollection I have on the subject, there was generally a full oral hearing before cases were ordered. That is my recollection; but I speak under correction, and especially in the presence of one whose greater experience would enable him to correct me if I am wrong.

But according to my recollection, we had ample discussion in the first instance, and it was not shortened or limited in the least. And I don't see how it could well be otherwise, because the parties by the oral discussion were enabled to understand the views that were to be advanced on one side and the other, and to prepare their cases much more satisfactorily.

11,351. Was it not very common, when the Lord Ordinary contemplated ordering cases, to hear only one counsel on each side—merely to hear juniors open?—That may have occurred, but I rather think that the full discussion usually took place.

11,352. Lord Barcaple.—In one or two of the cases you have mentioned, the Lord Ordinary notices that, after hearing junior counsel, it came to be suggested that there should be a case; but my experience is that there was generally a full debate?—That is my experience also. While I was at the bar, I prepared a good many cases, and my recollection is that the full oral discussion had taken place. I should rather be inclined to go even this length, that in the greater number of those causes in which written cases were ordered, and ultimately a report made to the Inner House, the idea of reporting to the Inner House only occurred to the Lord Ordinary after he had made avizandum, and that it had not been alluded to at all in the course of the discussion.

11,353. The Lord Justice-General.—You are not able to give any explanation of the immediate alteration which took place on the practice after the passing of the Act of 1850?—Unless it is what you have suggested, no other explanation has occurred to me; but there may be some reason which does not occur to me at present.

11,354. Mr. Webster.—Have you not seen the practice disapproved of by the judges in the Inner House?—I am not sure of that. It may have been so. I know there has been a great difference of opinion among the judges on the point, and that some of the judges were remarkably fond of, and clung to the last with great tenacity to written in place of oral pleading. I myself have all along been against that, and I was glad when it was substantially put an end to.

11,355. Mr. Shand.—If there was a full discussion in the Outer House, what was the saving of expense or time attending that arrangement?—None that I can perceive, except that the Lord Ordinary would probably have taken some time longer to decide the case. I don't know any other.

11,356. The Lord Justice-General.—There might perhaps be this saving, that the case coming upon written argument to the Inner House, superseded the necessity of a long oral discussion there. Do you think that was a desirable result?—I don't think it was at all, for this reason, that I don't think there was any saving of time in that respect. The time that was consumed in the preparation of these written cases by prorogations and otherwise, was in many instances immense, and far beyond anything that an oral discussion would have taken up.

11,357. Was it not your experience, that judgments pronounced in the Inner House on written argument without a hearing were, generally speaking, not so good as those that were pronounced upon a full hearing?—I have always been of that opinion, very strongly.

11,358. Was it not the prevalence of that opinion that led to the enactment of the Act of 1850?—It is possible, but I really don't know, though I was probably aware of it at the time. That is Lord Rutherfurd's Act, and I was one of the committee who gave their views on the subject. I think it is very likely that I may have suggested that as a reason, because it has always operated on my own mind. I thought that written pleadings were always a most unsatisfactory mode of discussing a case, and I think so still.

11,359. Then the departure which you spoke of from the practice of having two judgments in every cause—one in the Outer House and one in the Inner House—is a departure that you entirely disapprove of?—No.

11,360. The reporting of them?—I disapprove of reporting and written cases. But if they had at once sent causes to the Inner House, and the discussion had taken place there only, I would have approved of that.

11,361. My question was, whether that particular mode of departure from the rule of having two judgments was not in your opinion objectionable?—As long as Lords Ordinary continue, I think that they ought to pronounce judgments, and not to act as mere reporters. Following up the same matter, the inconsistency I have alluded to continues, irrespective of the practice of reporting cases. In Mr. Gordon's recent Act, which is now in operation, there is a provision entitling parties to adjust and settle the facts, and then to go to the Inner House to have the law, however important, disposed of by one judgment; and not only so, but we know very well that in various recent legislative enactments,—I think in some railway proceedings, as to consigned money and other matters, though I have not had time to look into it so carefully as to give the instances,—but I have a general impression that there are many instances in which the litigation and the judgment are confined to the Inner House, without coming before the Lord Ordinary at all.

11,362. Mr. Webster.—All cases under the Lands Clauses Act are sent to the junior Lord Ordinary?—That may be so; but I am sure there are some proceedings which are not sent to the Lord Ordinary.

11,363. The Lord Justice-General.—In the form of petitions, do you mean?—Yes.

11,364. I am not aware of any?—I rather think there are. Are there not petitions, for example, under the Poor Law Amendment Act, that go to the Inner House, and are disposed of there, and there alone?

11,365. For what purpose?—Complaints, for example, against a parochial inspector, and other officials engaged in the administration of the Poor Law, for refusal to discharge their duties, or for malpractice. I am quite sure there are cases of that kind.

11,366. Petitions and complaints against officials for malpractice always came to the Inner House?—Yes; and they go at once there because it is supposed that they are very important.

11,367. Actions of proving the tenor go to the Inner House?—They are peculiar to the Inner House.

11,368. But actions of aliment, which were at one time confined to the Inner House, are now commenced in the Outer House?—Yes.

11,369. That is a change in the other direction?—Yes. The appointment of factors on lapsed trusts was till a very recent period confined to the Inner House. Indeed, where the nobile officium of the court was called into exercise, the applications were usually confined to the Inner House. There has been a tendency in the opposite direction, and many of such applications now go on in the Outer House, before the junior Lord Ordinary. I believe that change was made to relieve the Inner House of work.

11,370. Has not the tendency of legislation on that subject recently been to send every petition or application to the Outer House that is not an appeal to the nobile officium of the court?—I am not prepared to say that at present.

11,371. You are aware of the provisions of the Act of 1856 in regard to petitions?—Yes.

11,372. That was a very large and sweeping measure in that direction?—Yes; I have alluded to that.

11,373. Mr. Shand.—Practically, has not the course of legislation in that direction been to relieve the single bills of the Divisions, and to save a great deal of time that used to be occupied by having four judges engaged about matters which are better disposed of by one?—No doubt; and I think that should be all done yet under the system which I have suggested by the judge officiating in the Outer House, for they are generally merely formal matters.

11,374. Lord Barcaple.—Very few of them leading to any reclaiming note or double judgment in any form?—They are ex parte generally.

11,375. Mr. Shand.—Taking the exceptional case of a proving of the tenor, do you not think it would be very advisable that that should go on as other actions do?—I entertain the impression very strongly, that there should be no distinction of cases, and arrangement of them into classes. I think there should be no distinction at all, even of Teind and Exchequer cases. I think they should all come before the court as other causes. Unless there is some reason in the arrangement of clerks, I know of none, so far as the judges are concerned, for keeping up any distinction in regard to these cases. Take the teinds as an illustration. It cannot be in respect of the difficulty attending the disposal of teind cases that they are kept before a particular judge in the Outer House; for it generally happens that that judge, when he comes to administer teind cases, has only been a few months on the bench. I was myself not six months on the bench when I became Lord Ordinary in teind causes; and I was not one month on the bench when I became the Exchequer judge, which I am still. So that there is nothing in connection with the peculiarity or difficulty of these causes which can be the reason why they are so classed and kept before a particular judge. It humbly appears to me—and I allude to it merely as illustrative of my general principle—that all that kind of classification should be done away with, for it gives rise to embarrassment, trouble, and delay in the administration of justice.

11,376. The Lord Justice-General.—Will you allow me to inquire what exactly you contemplate as being the work of the single Lord Ordinary whom you propose to leave in the Outer House? He must do all the Bill Chamber work?—Yes.

11,377. Would you leave the petitions with him as they are now?—I rather think so, leaving it to him, as at present, to exercise a discretion of coming to the Inner House for assistance in those ex parte cases where that is necessary, because a judgment pronounced ex parte may form a precedent, and should not be rashly pronounced.

11,378. Would you leave the motion roll in teind causes to the Lord Ordinary?—The preparation of teind causes, up to pronouncing judgment on the merits, I think should go on before the judge in the Outer House, in the same way as all other causes. I don't know any reason for a distinction.

11,379. Is there much business of that kind in Exchequer causes?—No, there is not a great deal; and for some reason or other—I suppose it is because there are fewer attempts to defraud the revenue—the Exchequer business has been becoming gradually less and less, and the reports show that there have been recently very few disputed cases.

11,380. The preparation of records in all causes you would still leave in the Outer House?—I think so.

11,381. With all that variety of business, are you satisfied that a single Lord Ordinary could overtake it?—I am not at all satisfied that he could overtake it; but I think that, without infringing upon the efficiency of the three Divisions, they might in the general case, and for such purposes, be able to spare one of their number to assist in that, and so regulate their business as to have their full number of four when any very important or difficult case or cases were to be heard and disposed of. There are a great many cases that don't require four judges to adjudicate upon them.

11,382. You contemplate then, only occasionally detaching one of the judges of the Division?—Yes; and it is to provide for such contingencies, and for the event of sickness, that, in my opinion, it would not be safe to diminish the number of judges. I am anxious to make myself clear upon that point. I think it would be exceedingly perilous to diminish the number.

11,383. Mr. Webster.—Would not the occasional assistance which you have suggested be liable to all the objections which you have stated against changes of Lords Ordinary?—No; it is a different kind of work that they would have to do. It is not pronouncing judgments in causes. It is a kind of incidental work, and the greater portion of it only requires a few minutes for the disposal of each case, or of each point. We cannot get everything perfect, but it does not occur to me that it would give rise to the objection which I take to such a court as the court of the Lords Ordinary.

11,384. The Lord Justice-General.—You do think it desirable to have a review within the court itself?—I think so, to the extent and in the way I have explained. The principle of review within the court itself is desirable and right, I think, but at the same time I don't think it is the least necessary in every case; and not being necessary, I think it is wrong to have it in every case. It might be used for the purpose of oppression, for creating expense and delay, and for no other object.

11,385. The arrangement which you contemplate resembles a good deal the constitution of the Exchequer Chamber in England?—Probably it does; but I have not made such minute inquiry on that subject as to enable me to say how far it resembles, or does not resemble, the constitution of the Exchequer Chamber.

11,386. Are you aware how that system has worked in England?—I am not aware, except as one of the public.

11,387. As one of the public, are you not aware that it has worked ill?—I am not aware of that. I saw within the last two or three years a discussion on the subject in the House of Commons or the House of Lords, and, according to my recollection, it did not affect the views that I have explained at all. My recollection is, that it was the constitution of the court, and not the court of review itself, that was objected to. However, I don't know how that may turn out upon more minute inquiry and consideration of how it works in England. I am happy to think that you have among your number some very eminent English lawyers, who must know well how it works; and I am glad it is so, in order that any views which I entertain on the subject may be checked and corrected, and thrown aside if they are found not to be right in themselves.

11,388. Where the first judgment is not unanimous, would you allow an appeal direct to the House of Lords?—My inclination would be not, because I don't think that the system of allowing parties to pass over a tribunal is consistent with principle at all. Either the court of review which I have suggested is a good thing in itself, and calculated to do good, or it is not. If it is calculated to do good, then the parties ought to avail themselves of it, and ought not to be permitted in their option, and to serve some sinister object possibly, to pass it over.

11,389. A judgment may be pronounced where the four judges are quite unanimous in the result they arrive at, but they arrive at that result on different grounds. Would it not be expedient that such a cause should be reviewed within the court itself?—I think it would not be expedient to make the right of review absolute even in that case. I think it would be sufficiently provided for by the court having it in its power to give leave; and I cannot doubt that if they found that, although unanimous in the result, they arrived at that result on different considerations, they would give leave; and therefore a review would be had.

11,390. Suppose that the party against whom the judgment is pronounced wishes to go direct to the House of Lords, but the court are very strongly of opinion that it would be desirable that he should go to the court of review?—Well, that is a matter of detail; and I think it is well worthy of consideration whether the judges might not have it in their power themselves, when they find that they arrive at the same result, but upon different grounds, to say that if the parties are not satisfied, they must go to the court of review first. That is matter of detail, to which I had not applied my mind; but I think it is well worthy of consideration.

11,391. Mr. Clark.—Do you think it an advantage that the court of review should consist almost exclusively of new judges?—I have suggested that one of the court that pronounces judgment in the first instance should always be in the court of review.

11,392. And therefore I said almost exclusively of new judges?—I think, with that one present, it would work quite well; but that is also matter for consideration.

11,393. Might not the result be, that the decision was ultimately given according to the opinion of a minority of judges who had heard the case?—That should, I think, be prevented by the constitution of the court of review.

11,394. Suppose the number is seven, and the difference of opinion in the original court is three to one, you appeal to a court of seven, and the difference of opinion there is four to three against the judgment, you would have seven judges on the one side, and four on the other?—Well, that might be, and it is an anomaly which I should think might be provided against.

11,395. Mr. Webster.—Would you send in one of the majority or one of the minority into the court of review?—I don't know. If it could well be done, I think the President of the court would be the best party to be present in the court of review, but perhaps that could not well be arranged with reference to the proper despatch of business in his own court.

11,396. Mr. Clark.—What is your objection to the present mode of calling in a certain number of additional judges?—That is a mode of review which might do very well.

11,397. Mr. Shand.—By the present mode you secure that where the judges have differed, both sets of opinions are represented on the bench. Don't you think that is better than taking one judge out of the court of first instance, where there has been a difference of opinion?—The constitution of the court of review is matter for serious consideration, and it involves a great many details, and, it may be, a great many difficulties. My object is to have a court of review. How that court of review is to be constituted is a matter that I have not gone into, except suggesting generally what has occurred to myself. But all the considerations that have been adverted to would require to be carefully considered, and objections avoided as much as possible.

11,398. With a Lord Ordinary so fully engaged as we presume he must be, it would be necessary, would it not, for the purpose of inquiries into fact, whether by means of proofs as at present, or in any other way, frequently to detach a judge from each of the Divisions?—It might be.

11,399. Judging from the experience we have had of the extent of time occupied in inquiring into questions of fact, would that not be a matter of almost daily occurrence in the course of the session?—One cannot tell yet, because we have not had experience as to how far it would occupy time. I don't know whether the system of proofs is to continue, but it has been growing very much, and will, I fear, if continued as now, come to absorb time altogether. But if the system is to continue, I can see no reason why one of the judges should take the proof with a shorthand writer sitting beside him, or any reason why an experienced advocate might not do it equally well, reporting it to the court for judgment.

11,400. The Lord Justice-General.—How would you provide for the remuneration of the experienced counsel?—That is a matter which, not being Chancellor of the Exchequer, I don't say anything about.

11,401. Do you contemplate that he should be paid by the public?—Decidedly; because I think the payment by the public would be comparatively little, and I am very anxious to remove all clogs of that nature from the public administration of justice.

11,402. Mr. Shand.—In the absence of such a system of commissioners, would there not be a judge detached very frequently from each of the Divisions?—I think that is very likely, but you can judge of that as well as I can.

11,403. On that assumption, you would be left to a Division of three instead of a Division of four?—Well, I think that might do very well, and the President of the Division would, I have no doubt, manage without much difficulty to secure that the court was full at the hearing and disposal of what might be held to be the more important and difficult cases. If I mistake not, though the courts at Westminster Hall, the Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer have five judges attached to each of them, there is always one or more absent at chambers, or on other duty.

11,404. Mr. Clark.—The number is six now?—But there are never more than four present, and that is held to be the complement for the discussion of cases; but we know very well, and latterly I think it has been very much the case, that not more than two or three have been present. I notice from the newspapers that the cases are so arranged, that very important ones are taken before what they call a full bench. I don't see why we should not follow the same system. A great many cases don't require four judges to dispose of them.

11,405. Where parties do not renounce probation, do you contemplate that the Lord Ordinary should take up the question of proof, or that the case should then go to the Division?—That is a very important question, and I have not given it the full consideration which it probably deserves. It is very much one of those questions of detail which could only well be judged of in drawing up a measure upon the general principles I have stated. The more that is done by the judge in the Outer House, I think the better, prior to the merits being taken up and actual judgment pronounced.

11,406. Mr. Webster.—Is not the taking of proof generally attended with very great expense?—At present?

11,407. At all times?—There is a great difference between the mode of taking proof formerly, and the mode of taking it now before one of the judges. It is only fair to say that one of the favourable features of the present system is, that the diets go on very peremptorily. Once a diet is fixed, my own experience enables me to say that the witnesses are generally in attendance, and that there is not much delay caused in that way. I have also found, more especially latterly, that the counsel are always quite ready to go on with the argument on the conclusion of the evidence, and a great deal of expense is saved in that way.

11,408. The Chairman.—Does it appear to you that the disposition to adopt that mode of investigating facts is increasing?—I suppose it is. My experience enables me to say that at the bar the tendency is very much to ask a proof, and to avoid a trial by jury.

11,409. What do you ascribe that to?—I have thought of it again and again, not only recently, but for years, in order to discover, if I could, what are the causes that appear to have influenced the public mind on that subject. I have been thoroughly satisfied that a jury is the best tribunal for disposing of questions of disputed facts; but I find that parties are not sensible of that, and that they avoid juries. I have therefore tried in my own mind, by deliberate consideration, to ascertain what it is that has influenced the public against jury trial. If experience had shown that the verdicts of juries were generally erroneous, uncertain, and capricious, or perverse, one could understand the reason at once; but that is not my experience at all, and I am happy to have the opportunity of stating what perhaps may not be generally known, that out of the fifty-eight jury trials at which I have presided since I have had a place on the bench—I am sorry to say that that is the whole number of jury trials I have presided at, and my clerk informs me that I have tried more than any other Lord Ordinary during the same period—out of these fifty-eight there have been only two new trials. One of these was the well-known case of Wilson v. Merry and Cuninghame. It came before me for trial the second time, and the second jury gave the same verdict as the first, awarding £100 of damages. The case then went by bill of exceptions to the Inner House, and the exceptions to my ruling were sustained. It then went to the House of Lords, where the judgment of the Inner House was affirmed, finding that the law I had laid down to the jury was erroneous.

11,410. That was a point of law upon which there was rather unsettled opinion?—No doubt about it. In this court the law had not been matured, and there had been a great difference of opinion on the bench on the subject. I may not have put it well to the jury, but I had very much adopted what I understood to be the law laid down by one of the Divisions of the court.

The Hon. Lord Ormidale.

That is one of the two cases in which the verdict of the jury did not stand. And undoubtedly it was not the fault of the jury. If there was a fault—and we must hold there was—it was the fault of the judge, and not of the jury. The verdict of the jury was in perfect accordance with the direction of the judge on the law, and I think in accordance with the facts. Therefore I have nothing to complain of the jury in respect of the case of Merry and Cuninghame. The only other case in which the verdict of the jury was disturbed, and a new trial granted, was the case of Jenkins v. Murray—involving a right of way through the policy of Polmaise. There was a great deal of evidence, and the case lasted for three or four days. I was not much surprised that the jury should have taken the view they did. I thought, however, at the time, and I so expressed it to the Lord President, who asked me about it when the application for a new trial was made, that, looking to the very important interests involved, and the serious nature of the question, viz. a right of way through a gentleman's policies, the surrounding country being full of villages, it was quite right that the case should be re-tried; and accordingly there was a new trial granted, but the case never went further. Now, with the exception of these two, every verdict in the fifty-eight cases which I have mentioned has stood untouched; and in my humble opinion, the verdicts were right, with the single exception to be immediately noticed. I generally avoid as much as possible giving very strong directions on questions of evidence to the juries, but all of the verdicts were in accordance with my own views of the evidence, except perhaps in one case. In that one, however, I suppose the parties were satisfied with the verdict, for there was no attempt to disturb it; and on further consideration afterwards, I came to entertain very considerable misgivings as to whether I was not wrong and the jury right. I may add that in not above half-a-dozen cases was any attempt made to disturb the verdict, and, as I have stated, only in two was the attempt successful. Such has been my experience of jury trial; and if that is a fair example of it, I cannot understand what is the objection to it at all. There is finality at once, the facts are settled, and there is no more litigation. Contrast that with the system of proofs. A proof is taken before the Lord Ordinary; he pronounces judgment; his judgment is brought under review of the Inner House, and reversed by three out of four judges—for that has happened; the case goes to the House of Lords, the House of Lords takes a different view, and returns to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary—that has happened. There is in this way years of litigation, and the expense is enormous, the worry is unspeakable. And yet that is the course of litigation which may occur, and which has occurred, in cases where juries are avoided.

11,411. The Lord Justice-General.—And that upon mere questions of fact?—Yes. I have heard it suggested, that the expense of jury trial is so great that it frightens people. Now, I am not able to appreciate that objection, because I don't think there can be any great difference, if any at all, of legitimate expenses: of course, I cannot tell what people choose to incur unnecessarily. Take, for example, a proof before one of the judges; the expense of the witnesses, I presume, is precisely the same as if they were before a jury, for I don't understand how there can be any difference. Then where is the difference? It can't be the expense of the jurymen, which under the recent statute is only £6 a day; for there is an expense in taking a proof which is not incurred before a jury, and which, I think, almost meets the expense of the jurymen,—I mean the expense of the shorthand writer. He has his two guineas a day for a day's proof, and perhaps three or four more for extending it; so that the expense of the shorthand writer is equivalent to the expense of the jury. So stands the matter in point of expense; and when we keep in view that the verdict of a jury is final as to the facts, and puts an end to all expense and litigation, while, on the other hand, the House of Lords alone will put an end to the litigation in a case where the evidence has been taken before the judge, I think there is no comparison between the one tribunal and the other. The advantages of the one are out of comparison superior to those of the other.

11,412. The Chairman.—There may be some little saving of expense in this respect, that parties may be more anxious to multiply witnesses before a jury than before a judge?—My impression is just the opposite; but I should be very glad that the other Lords Ordinary expressed their opinion on that point. My impression is, that there is a heaping of evidence and of witnesses before the judge, in a way that would not be tolerated or thought of if there was a jury present. A jury operates insensibly as a check on the parties, and perhaps also to some extent on the judge, and tends to keep all right.

11,413. Lord Barcaple.—I suppose that sometimes, when a judge sees that there is a tendency to great prolixity of evidence in a jury trial, he can, without undue interference, obtain the view of the jury on that subject?—He can; and my experience of jury trial, which has been considerable, has always taught me this, that the merest hint from the court to a party as to how he is conducting his case,—for example, that he is going too far in one direction, or heaping up evidence unnecessarily,—will be more readily given effect to where a jury is present, than where a jury is not present, for the obvious reason that the object of the party must be to keep well both with the court and jury, because any adverse observation from the court, in presence of the jury, may operate very seriously against him.

11,414. My question pointed to this, whether the slightest manifestation of a feeling of that sort on the part of the jury itself was not very conclusive?—Very conclusive.

11,415. Have you found, in taking proofs, that a moderate manifestation of a feeling of that sort by the judge is equally effective?—I don't think so. The parties probably think, and think rightly, that however a judge may feel about an unnecessary proof, either parole or written, it will not affect his judgment, and therefore they take their own way as far as they possibly can.

11,416. The Chairman.—Then can you account for what you say is the fact—the unwillingness of parties to go to a jury, and their preference for proofs?—I have been unable on any grounds satisfactory to myself to account for it. I have heard it suggested, and it is probably the case, that they make a great parade and fuss about jury trial: it is treated as a grand dramatic performance, and great performers are thought to be necessary for such a proceeding; and some are not very far from my observation at the present moment who have had their day on such a stage. It is thought necessary to obtain the services of certain individuals at the bar, and probably for the purpose of securing these individuals large and most unnecessary fees are given. That leads to very great expense; and the losing party especially, though he may have authorized it in the first instance, grumbles very much afterwards, when he finds that it has not produced the desired result.

11,417. Do you think that the same performers don't appear before you in the proof, or that if they do, they don't appear on the same conditions?—In the first place, they don't usually appear before us. There is no dramatic effect desired there. They do appear occasionally, but not so often or so uniformly as they do before juries.

11,418. The Lord Justice-General.—Do you find, as matter of experience, that when great stars are retained, the trial is better conducted, or that it is better conducted when minor performers alone are engaged?—That is a difficult question to answer. Perhaps the necessity of being prompt and thoroughly prepared before a jury, from the nature of the tribunal, requires a counsel of larger experience than before a judge, where the whole proceeding is quieter, and where the judge has the opportunity, and probably takes advantage of it more frequently, of aiding both parties in conducting the case so as to arrive at the truth. Before a jury it is difficult for the judge, and indeed not very advisable, to step much out of his way to assist either party.

11,419. Mr. Harrison.—Were many of the 58 cases which you have mentioned actions of damages against railway companies and similar cases, claiming compensation for injuries?—There have been many such cases before me.

11,420. Has it not been your experience, that the most varied amounts of damages have been given in very similar cases?—It so happens that during the last two years I have had a good many of these cases before me—more than I recollect, perhaps, for the whole of the rest of the time that I have been a judge; and I cannot say that such has been the result of my experience. I do not at the present moment recollect any instance of the jury having gone far wrong. There are no two cases the circumstances of which don't vary, and without knowing the whole circumstances one is not in a situation to say that the one jury has been extravagant, or the other too moderate. The result of my experience in that class of cases has latterly been very much to the effect that the juries have been remarkably sound in their verdicts. And I may say, in regard to jury trial in Scotland, that I regret exceedingly there should be a feeling against it just now, when I think it has come to be matured, and when juries understand their functions better, and are generally giving much more satisfaction in their verdicts. At one time there was a very strong feeling prevalent—and probably I thought it justified so far—that there was a certain class of cases in which it was difficult or impossible to get a sound verdict from a jury. Take, for example, one of a class of cases which Mr. Harrison has adverted to—coal-pit accidents in which there has been loss of life: the sympathies of the jury were apt to be so much affected by the nature of the cause, that it was thought very often that they went wrong in their verdicts. But I think that has been very much corrected in later times, and I am not the least afraid of a jury going wrong in that class of cases now. We had a very good illustration of what I am now pointing at in a trial that took place before me within the last ten days, in which Mr. Shand was counsel for the defender, a well-known and extensive shipbuilder in Greenock, founded on an accident which took place, resulting in the loss of life. I was not afraid of the jury, and the result showed me that I had no cause for being so; for though it was a case calculated to excite their sympathies, they returned a verdict for the defender, in accordance with what I thought to be the law and justice of the case. In short, I have found that juries have of late years been very easily directed, and that they are quite sensible of what their true duty is.

11,421. Lord Barcaple.—It seems to result from what you have said, that if you, as an individual judge, had disposed of these cases upon a proof, if there has been any feeling that the damages given have been unduly assessed by juries, in all probability the very same dissatisfaction would have existed with your judgment?—I have not the least doubt of that; and I beg to say on the matter of assessing damages, that I don't know anything more difficult for a judge than to assess damages. I don't know a more difficult task. For my own part, though urged to it repeatedly—with one or two exceptions, which I am sorry I ever made—I have declined to undertake to assess damages. I don't think I am so nearly competent to do so as Mr. Harrison and the gentlemen who usually compose juries.

11,422. Have you made any observation during the last two years as to whether the practice of jury trial was tending to diminish or to increase,—I mean before the recent introduction of proofs?—I have not adverted to that.

11,423. Have you made any observation as to whether a proof goes more rapidly on than a jury trial?—With the assistance of a shorthand writer, we get through a great deal of evidence.

11,424. Is it your observation, that you get through the evidence more rapidly?—I am not at all prepared to say that; but I am prepared to say this, and I am happy to be able to say so, that within the last year or two, I think I have observed a tendency on the part of all who are concerned in the conduct of jury trial, to get over the case with less unnecessary evidence and less elaboration than formerly. I have observed that latterly we have got over cases involving difficulty, involving a great many disputed facts, and a great deal of evidence, within a comparatively short time.

11,425. Mr. Shand.—Are you satisfied with the class of jurors as they now exist, or do you think the public might fairly require a greater proportion of men of higher education?—There has been a very great improvement recently. I have observed in recent trials since the passing of the last Act, some gentlemen on the juries who would not have been on them formerly. I think it is a great object to have some men of all classes on the juries, because they assist each other in coming to a sound result. A single judge may have his mind in a particular groove, or may have peculiar biases; but if twelve gentlemen come together to consider facts, if one is inclined to go wrong, he is put right by another; and if they are reasonable, they will in the end come to a fair conclusion. But when a question of disputed fact is left to one individual, he may take an erroneous impression, and he has nobody to correct him, or to assist him in keeping him right. I have observed lately, that all the common law judges in England who have been engaged in the trial of election petitions, men who have had immense experience in the conduct of jury trials in England, have expressed their regret that they had not the aid of a jury, and their inability to deal with evidence without the aid of a jury. They have experienced the difficulty of settling disputed facts without that aid.

11,426. Mr. Clark.—Did not the public express their great satisfaction that they had not the aid of juries?—I don't know that.

11,427. The Chairman.—There is no doubt that in the trial of facts, it is a great relief to the judge to have the aid of a jury?—No doubt about it.

11,428. And I daresay the English judges regretted that they had not that relief and assistance?—My view is, that the court and the jury assist each other.

11,429. Mr. Campbell.—In the Sheriff Court it is the habitual practice of the Sheriff to dispose of questions of damages. Do you think that the decisions pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute, as reviewed by the Sheriff on questions of damages, are less satisfactory than the verdicts of juries in similar cases?—As a general rule, questions of damages occurring before the Sheriff are comparatively trifling questions. Cases involving character very seriously, or other cases leading to large damages, come before the Supreme Court, and are tried with the aid of a jury. But I am glad you have given me an opportunity by your question of mentioning an instance of how cases of that nature are managed without the aid of a jury. I allude to the case of Hallowell v. Niven, 1st March 1843, 5 Dunlop 759. There, according to the rubric of the report, a woman was found not entitled to damages for an alleged assault, in respect she was the aggressor, and that there had been no greater degree of violence on the other side than was necessary for self-protection. That case occurred at Greenock, and the Sheriff-substitute, Mr. Marshall, who was one of my substitutes for some time, and a most excellent man, assoilzied. The case then came by appeal to the Sheriff-depute, now Lord Benholme, who altered the substitute's judgment, and found £1 of damages due. It was brought by advocation to this court, and was heard before Lord Ivory, in presence of the Lord Probationer, afterwards Lord Wood. I argued the case on the one side,—for the lady, I think; Lord Wood, according to usage, reported his opinion to the Inner House, to the effect that he thought the Sheriff-depute was wrong, and the Sheriff-substitute right. The case was further argued before Lord Ivory, by whom it had to be decided, and he thought that the Lord Probationer was wrong, and the Sheriff-depute right, and accordingly he dismissed the advocation. The case then went by reclaiming note to the Inner House, and they unanimously held that the Sheriff-substitute was right, and that Lord Ivory and the Sheriff-depute were wrong. Now there was only a small sum involved there, and the case was of a trifling nature, but it was an action of damages, and it is an illustration of such a case as disposed of by judges and not by a jury. I may explain, in case you should think of looking into the report, that you will find it to be exactly as I have stated, except that Lord Probationer Wood's opinion is not mentioned; but I recollect it because I was counsel in the case, and I have often spoken about the case since. It is a very remarkable illustration of what I think would be the fate of such cases if they are to be determined by judges. I think that judges are by no means well qualified to dispose of questions of damages.

11,430. The Lord Justice-General.—I suppose nobody suggested that the lady should get more than £1?—I don't know. The defender was ultimately assoilzied.

11,431. Mr. Campbell.—It has struck me that of late years, in Glasgow more particularly, there have been large sums of damages awarded by the decision of the Sheriffs, in cases of collision on the river, and in the various other incidents of social life. Now do you think there is such an advantage in the system of jury trial, for the ascertainment of facts, that it would be desirable to introduce that system into the Sheriff Court?—I doubt that very much; I am not inclined to think that it would be an advantage to introduce it into the Sheriff Court, because I think the trial can be had in the Supreme Court at just as little expense, presided over by one of the judges, having experience in that mode of trial, with probably a more satisfactory result.

11,432. Don't the advantages to which you have referred as arising from jury trial—advantages in point of economy, for example—arise merely from the fact that practically there is no appeal from their decision?—I am of opinion that juries in cases, at all events, where damages are to be assessed, and generally in cases of disputed fact, are calculated to arrive at a sounder result than a judge, and will generally do so.

11,433. Mr. Webster.—Would you explain what it is that incapacitates a judge from deciding upon evidence, and qualifies the common run of jurors for doing so?—A judge is like jurymen; he has, it may be, his prejudices, or at all events he has his biases; from his education and his training he has certain modes of thinking which lead him to adopt certain views; and if he is an honest man, he will probably, just because he is an honest man, give effect to his peculiar views, for he ought not to give effect to views that he does not entertain. If he thinks they are views which beset him, and he is not sure of their soundness, he may deliberate as well as he can, so as not to be unduly influenced by them; but he will necessarily be so far influenced by his peculiar views. The result of a decision of a single individual may therefore be quite erroneous. But if you select twelve men as jurymen, you have various individuals, with various biases and views. I assume that they are fairly reasonable and intelligent; I have generally found them so; and I have generally told them how to proceed when they retire. They, it must be presumed, confer with each other, and after ascertaining that they differ in their views and opinions, they argue the matter among themselves to some extent. The one yields and concedes to the other, and the result is generally a sound one.

11,434. Mr. Clark.—A sort of average opinion?—No, it is not taking an average.

11,435. But an average opinion?—That may be.

11,436. Mr. Webster.—Would your Lordship ascribe the standing of so many of the verdicts in cases that you have tried to the soundness of the verdict, or to any extent to the difficulty of review, and the enormous cost of a new trial?—I cannot, in the particular cases to which I have referred, ascribe it to anything but the soundness of the verdict, because these verdicts were sound, according to my opinion,—in accordance not only with the directions which I gave in law, but quite in accordance with any leaning that I may have shown in my addresses to the jury.

11,437. Mr. Clark.—A verdict may be upset on the ground of its being contrary to evidence, but that is a very difficult thing to make out?—Yes, and it ought to be.

11,438. So that the person who has lost the verdict has very little chance of getting it upset unless it is very wrong?—Quite true.

11,439. Mr. Webster.—Would your Lordship apply the same test to the standing of these verdicts that you apply to your judgments on the merits of causes?—Precisely the same.

11,440. The Chairman.—Why should a judge be supposed to have leanings and propensities to lead him wrong, when in all the cases that you have tried, your propensities led you to what you consider to have been the right verdict?—That is a matter which would require considerable explanation.

11,441. The Lord Justice-General.—Don't you think that in a jury trial the judge and the jury influence one another reciprocally?—I think so; and that may be an answer so far to the question which Lord Colonsay has now put.

11,442. They control one another?—Not the least doubt of it. I feel that strongly. As I said before, the one is a check on the other.

11,443. Is it not matter of experience with you that after you have expounded the evidence in the cause to a jury in your charge, you have a much more satisfactory and complete view of the evidence, and of the true result of the question of fact, than you would have had if you had been studying it without a jury?—That is certainly the result of my experience. There is an insensible acting and reacting on the minds of the court and the jury in the course of a jury trial that leads the one to the same result as the other, assuming it to be the desire of both to arrive at the truth.

11,444. Mr. Webster.—Your Lordship alluded to the necessity that was felt of keeping on good terms, or on a good footing with the jury, in the conduct of the case, and in regard to the extent of evidence to be led. Is a tribunal which may be actuated by feelings of that kind, a suitable tribunal for the trial of a case?—I think all tribunals ought to exercise a certain degree of firmness in checking undue evidence, and the improper conduct of a cause.

11,445. Your Lordship alluded to indications of feeling on the part of the jury?—What I alluded to was this, that any indication on the part of the court, in presence of the jury, as to what was right, would probably be more readily adopted and given effect to by the parties, than if the jury were not there. My experience is, that juries show very little indication of what their opinion is till the end. I have found them to be always very decorous in their conduct.

11,446. The Lord Justice-General.—Don't you find, however, that juries are, generally speaking, very impatient of needless repetition of evidence?—Probably they are. Most men are, and properly so.

11,447. Which of course has a tendency to prevent an accumulation of evidence?—I have often admired the exemplary patience of our Scotch juries.

11,448. Mr. Shand.—Is it according to your experience that reclaiming notes are frequent against decisions in cases in which you have had proofs, and have decided the facts as well as the law?—I don't know how that may exactly stand. It is matter for statistical inquiry; but I cannot doubt, from my general impression, that reclaiming notes are very frequent against judgments upon proofs.

11,449. In that case, the proof which has hitherto been in manuscript requires to be all printed, and there is a renewed discussion of the whole facts of the case before the Inner House?—Yes; and great expense incurred.

11,450. Does that add materially to the expense beyond what would be necessary in a jury trial, as a rule?—I think it must add very considerably to the expense. I am glad to think that a considerable improvement has been made, under the provisions of the recent Act, in regard to challenging verdicts of juries. During last session, motions for new trials and discussions on bills of exceptions, have been taken up very promptly by the Inner House, and finally disposed of at very little expense.

11,451. Besides the additional expense to the parties, of such review on questions of fact, the time of four judges is occupied with them, which would be avoided under the system of jury trial?—No doubt. One who has arrived at my time of life must have some recollection of the strong animadversions which have from time to time been made in regard to questions of disputed fact depending entirely on evidence going through all the courts up to the House of Lords. There have been very strong animadversions made in the highest quarter, and by the most eminent men, on that kind of system, and it has been denounced very much.

11,452. Is the finality of the verdict of a jury, as a rule, one of the great advantages which you have in view in the opinion you have expressed?—Yes. It is a very great advantage with that safeguard which always exists, that if the verdict on evidence is egregiously or plainly wrong, the court have it in their power to correct it, and to order a new trial.

11,453. Mr. Webster.—Would there be any material difference of cost of getting the verdict of a jury upset, and getting the judgment of a Lord Ordinary on evidence reviewed?—I think there would be a very considerable difference in favour of the review of the verdict of a jury. I can give a very remarkable instance of a trial which occurred before me in a case which only came into court, if I am not mistaken, in October last. An issue was prepared and sent to a jury, and £10 of damages were awarded. Application was made to the Second Division for a new trial, and I was asked to attend with my notes of evidence. The new trial was unanimously refused, so that there was an end to the whole matter within a few months, and the application for the new trial must have given rise to hardly any expense.

11,454. The Lord Justice-General.—Were the notes of evidence printed?—No. There was also a case of Laurent v. The Crown for damage to premises. That case came into court, I think, last summer; a record was made up, and an issue settled and sent to a jury; and after the verdict, application was made for a new trial to the First Division upon a bill of exceptions. The bill of exceptions was adjusted by me without any loss of time. It did not set out the evidence as was formerly done; but it consisted, I think, of three pages of print altogether, including what was necessary of the charge, and the exceptions and other formal matter; and that was heard before the Inner House, and disposed of at no great expense.

11,455. Mr. Webster.—These are two cases in which the verdict was allowed to stand; but suppose the case of the verdict being upset, would there not have been an entirely new trial and inquiry?—Yes.

11,456. Suppose it had been the review of a decision by the Lord Ordinary upon evidence taken before him, would not a final decision have been given upon the evidence so taken?—No; I don't think it follows that there would be a final decision. If the Lord Ordinary decides one way and the Inner House another way, the case sometimes goes to the House of Lords.

11,457. It may go to the House of Lords?—And has gone. But in the case of the verdict of a jury, there is no such thing as to the facts.

11,458. Would your Lordship approve of a change in regard to the way of dealing with matters of fact, where the evidence is taken before the Lord Ordinary, so as to allow the Inner House finally to ascertain the facts, in the same way as is done in cases coming from the Sheriff Court?—I think that is well worthy of consideration; but the Lord Ordinary has heard and seen the witnesses, and he has been influenced, and properly influenced, in some degree by their deportment, and the manner in which they have given their evidence. The Inner House have no opportunity of seeing or hearing the witnesses; and yet three out of four of the judges there may recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and they cannot help themselves according to their impressions of what is right. The result, therefore, of making the decision of the Inner House final on questions of fact may be, that judgment is given by three judges who have not seen the witnesses, while the judge who did hear and see them took a different view, and one of the judges of the Inner House concurred with him. The decision may therefore be given by a majority of one judge. Now, that is not a satisfactory result.

11,459. The Lord Justice-General.—Would you approve of making the finding of the Lord Ordinary who hears the evidence final?—I am not prepared to say so. I think that would be very hazardous, and would probably not prove satisfactory. Whether he was right or wrong, there might not unnaturally be great dissatisfaction on one side, or, it might be, sometimes on both. Those who dislike juries would probably prefer to have finality by three judges, who should hear and see the witnesses; but that is a thing which is so extravagant in itself, and would give rise to such consequences in the way of appointment of judges and otherwise, that I suppose it is not to be thought of.

11,460. That would be a very costly tribunal?—Yes, it would be very costly to the country. I don't know how many judges would be required.

11,461. The Chairman.—Would it not be hazardous to make the Lord Ordinary's judgment final on fact in such a case as the Breadalbane case?—Yes; I am against that entirely. I think it would be too hazardous.

11,462. Mr. Shand.—Are you content with the provision in the recent Court of Session Act, which leaves it to the court to determine what shall be the mode of inquiry, so that it shall be in the hands of the court to say whether the case is one for proof or for a jury? Would you desire to make any legislative change upon that, making it imperative to try any class of cases, either in the one way or in the other? Or are you satisfied with the enactment as it stands?—I think there was a power more limited formerly in the court to direct cases to be tried differently than by a jury, and yet not so absolute as that provision makes it. I am inclined to think there is too great a discretion now; and if we could be restored to where we were before, viz. that generally cases of disputed facts shall go to a jury, I would prefer it.

11,463. But if both parties desire that the case shall be determined by the judge?—I am not quite sure that the desire of parties should be submitted to in all cases. I could quite understand that if both parties desire that there should be a proof before the judge, their desire should be acceded to at once, on the condition that his judgment should be final; but the idea of their desiring, in the first place, to have the proof led before the judge, and then to go through the whole courts up to the House of Lords, is a thing that I don't think should be agreed to in all cases.

11,464. Lord Barcaple.—Have you found that, in a great many cases, both parties desire to have a remit to a commissioner?—In some cases it has been so; and I don't see why there should not be a remit to a commissioner much more frequently than there is at present, if the existing system of taking proofs is continued. Prorogations were the great evil of proofs taken before commissioners; but I cannot understand why the diets should not be made peremptory before commissioners as before one of the judges; and if that were so, the proof might be perfectly well taken in Glasgow, Dundee, or Aberdeen, and many other places, at a considerable saving of expense, because the witnesses being in the locality, it would be unnecessary to bring them here.

11,465. Mr. Shand.—Giving the power to have the evidence taken by a shorthand writer in that case also, would, I presume, be a great advantage?—Surely. If it is of advantage in the Superior Court, it should be an equal advantage before a commissioner.

11,466. The Lord Justice-General.—You are merely proposing to substitute the commissioner for the judge?—Yes; as to taking the proof, but not to decide the cause.

11,467. But allowing the mode of taking the evidence to be in other respects the same?—Yes.

11,468. Lord Barcaple.—In what respect is the assistance of a shorthand writer a great advantage?—It saves time.

11,469. Is it your experience that it saves time?—I think it does.

The Hon. Lord Ormidale.

11,470. Mr. Shand.—Was it not found to be a very serious consumption of time, under the old system of commissions, that the evidence had to be taken down without the advantage of shorthand writing?—Oh yes.

11,471. Mr. Webster.—In regard to your Lordship's proposal as to commissions, would you require the attendance of counsel in taking the evidence, in the same way as is done before the Lord Ordinary?—That is a point I have not thought of.

11,472. Does it not affect the expense very much?—I would leave it to the parties. I don't think it should be made indispensable. There is a reason for counsel being present before a judge of the Supreme Court; not so much perhaps that many agents might not be as competent and able as any counsel to do all that is necessary in the mere leading of the evidence; but it is necessary, with reference to the position and dignity of the court, that those who practise before it should alone appear before the judge sitting in court.

11,473. To what length does your Lordship carry your view that only counsel should appear before the judges of the Supreme Court?—Neither further nor less in length than the existing practice.

11,474. Is your Lordship aware, that in the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords, agents alone are received to discuss questions of competency and procedure?—I don't know; but the Appeal Committee is not the House of Lords.

11,475. It consists of the Lord Chancellor and others?—That may be; and in the Bill Chamber here, or in chambers during vacation, we are always very glad to see agents and to receive assistance from them. So in England, I believe, the agents, or agents' clerks, attend the common law judges in chambers. But it is a different thing in public court, when a case comes to be disposed of on its more important branches.

11,476. The Chairman.—Have you any further suggestions to make?—I am not in favour of the Court of Lords Ordinary. I think it disarranges business very much; but it is perhaps unnecessary to say more about it now, because any arrears that could well be complained of in the Inner House having been worked off, and not being likely again to arise, there will be no necessity for the Court of Lords Ordinary, and it may never in my time sit again.

11,477. At all events, it is not likely to sit two months in one session?—No; and therefore perhaps it is hardly worth adverting to; but I doubt very much whether any fluctuating court of that kind will ever carry with it the weight and authority in the minds of the public which is desirable.

11,478. Lord Barcaple.—I think it results from something which you formerly said, that you would disapprove of a court for one special class of cases?—Yes; it decides only a certain class of cases sent to it, and that takes away from the authority which it might otherwise be supposed to possess; and it may also cause dissatisfaction to the parties to these cases, from the feeling that they have been singled out as cases of a subordinate or inferior description.

11,479. The Lord Justice-General.—I understand your feeling to be that all the judges should be engaged in all kinds of causes?—I have a very strong impression to that effect. I would even adopt the English rule, that there should be no distinction between the criminal and civil judges—between the judges who go circuit in criminal matters, and those who remain at home to dispose of civil causes. It is a great advantage to the judge that he should have some experience in all departments.

11,480. In connection with that, is there not something very anomalous in the position of the single Lord Ordinary whom you are proposing to leave in the Outer House? As far as I can see, he is not to pronounce judgments at all. Now a judge who does not pronounce judgments is somewhat of an anomaly, is he not?—He pronounces judgments in all cases of ex parte petitions and applications.

11,481. But I mean judgments in foro?—He pronounces judgments in the Bill Chamber.

11,482. Lord Barcaple.—And some of these questions are not ex parte?—No; they are not necessarily so.

11,483. The Lord Justice-General.—But at all events this judge will be very far from being in the position of dealing with all classes of cases by judgment?—That gives rise to this suggestion, that it might be worthy of consideration whether that Outer House judge should be always the same judge.

11,484. If he is not to be so, then it comes back to the old system of sending a judge to the Outer House from the Inner House?—It would to some extent. There are a great many considerations connected with that matter which I don't think affect the principle of the scheme which I have suggested.

11,485. Mr. Shand.—Assuming the constitution of the court to remain as at present, it has been suggested that if the Inner House gets into arrear, a better course of overcoming arrears than by taking up all the time of the whole of the Lords Ordinary would be, that one judge from each Division and one Lord Ordinary should be appointed as an aiding Division. Does it occur to you that that would be a better course than to take up the time of four Lords Ordinary, and to stop the Outer House work, as was done last session?—I doubt very much whether it would be better. I am rather inclined to think that it would be a worse expedient. I don't think that the judgments of that court would be found to be satisfactory to the country. If two of these judges reversed the judgment appealed against, that would not be satisfactory, because then the judges would be two to two. That of itself appears to me to be an insuperable objection to the expedient which you suggest.

11,486. Don't you think that that evil as a temporary evil would be less than was experienced last session, in the almost total stoppage of the Outer House work for a good many weeks?—I don't think it, and for this reason, that even supposing the Court of Lords Ordinary were to continue to be called into operation occasionally, it is not in the least likely that any necessity will arise for their sitting so long as they did last session. But even as it was, although they were away three days out of five for eight weeks, it is astonishing how little arrear is left in the Outer House. There is some arrear, I have no doubt, but not a very great deal.

11,487. Are there not a good many debates which came out at a very early period of the session in the Outer House rolls that still stand there?—I am not aware of it. I know that in the earlier part of the session, I could not get parties to fix a diet of proof. If they had done so, there would have been judgment given in many cases before the end of last year. The result was, that previous to the commencement of the year I had not my blank day occupied, as I was quite willing to have it occupied, by proofs. Since the beginning of the new year, my blank days have been all occupied, except one, when a proof went off after it was fixed, and that one was made up by my sitting a whole Monday to a late hour. That suggests to me, that under the recent statute our blank days are practically gone; and I think the sooner they are gone nominally, as well as in reality, the better. There is no use in keeping up the semblance of a thing when the reality does not exist.

11,488. Lord Barcaple.—Do you think nothing has been lost by the loss of the blank day?—In what respect?

11,489. Were there not very important uses to which the blank day was applied?—In the way of consideration of cases?

11,490. The consideration of cases and the preparation of judgments?—No doubt.

11,491. Have you found difficulty in consequence?—I have managed to keep up my work pretty well hitherto.

11,492. Mr. Shand.—Have you any suggestion to make about pleadings?—No; I have no suggestion at present. I stated before that we require a little more experience than we have yet had of the recent statute, to enable one with safety to suggest much alteration on the pleadings as they exist. I think that latterly the pleadings and the records have greatly improved; that parties have come to understand that the less they put upon the record the better, provided there is sufficient; and my impression is that the setting out of evidence is not so much indulged in as it was at one time.

11,493. The Chairman.—Have you any further suggestion to make?—I have one suggestion to make about the Sheriff Court, and it is the result of the experience I have had in the Court of the Lords Ordinary. I have heard a great deal said about the expedition of litigation in the Sheriff Court, and the little expense at which it is carried on, and an unfavourable contrast has frequently been drawn with reference to the Supreme Court. Having that in view, I paid considerable attention to the cases that came up for review in the Lords Ordinary's court. There were only twenty-five cases disposed of by that court, and I asked my clerk to make an examination, the result of which, as given to me by him, I shall state. In the twenty-five cases there were fifty-seven appeals from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff, and the average duration of the litigation was two years and some days. There was one case from Wigtown—Macdouall v. Brown—in which the litigation continued for four years and eight days, and there were six appeals.

11,494. The Lord Justice-General.—What was that case about?—I think it was about taking delivery of farm-stocking.

11,495. Lord Barcaple.—It was a dispute between Mr. Macdouall of Logan and his sub-factor—a matter of accounting?—Yes, it was.

11,496. The Chairman.—Were any of these appeals upon evidence?—I don't know.

11,497. Mr. Clark.—I think there were not?—I believe not.

11,498. Mr. Baxter.—Do you know how the delay of four years arose?—No; I cannot give the particulars. Then there was an advocation from Aberdeenshire—Cruickshank v. Davidson & Co.—the litigation in which continued in the Sheriff Court for four years, eight months, and nineteen days. The action was at the instance of Davidson & Co., a firm in Norway, and the sum concluded for was £25, 1s. 7d. In that case there were eight appeals; and I think it was stated to us in the course of the discussion, that the reclaiming petition in support of one of these appeals extended to nearly 300 pages.

11,499. Can you state the delay occasioned by the appeals?—No. Then there was a case from Renfrewshire, Aitkenhead v. Aitkenhead, in which the duration of the litigation was five years, one month, and eight days, and there were two appeals in that case. I believe the ultimate decision here was in accordance with an early judgment pronounced by my friend Mr. Campbell.

11,500. Mr. Campbell.—The delay there resulted from a remit to an accountant, before whom a great deal of procedure took place?—Yes. Then we had two cases from Lanarkshire—one at the instance of Sir Charles Ross v. Hamilton, a weaver in Lanark, the duration of the litigation in which was five years, six months, and twenty-eight days, and there were six appeals; and the remaining case was Strickland & Co. v. Nelson & Mackintosh, the litigation in which lasted for four years and twenty-five days, and there were two appeals. Now these are five out of twenty-five cases.

11,501. The Lord Justice-General.—Were they all cases upon proof?—They were.

11,502. Mr. Clark.—And were they causes always going on in the Sheriff Court, or had there been any sists?—I don't know. I rather think they were going on. There were consents to prorogations, and things of that kind, which I am happy to think is put an end to in this court under the recent statute, and which was a fertile source of delay and vexation.

11,503. Mr. Campbell.—You have said that all these cases were on proof. I think the case of Aitkenhead was a question of construction of a deed of settlement. I don't think there was any proof there, except so far as the accountant's report may be regarded as proof. But the decision arrived at by me was exclusive altogether of any such remit, and the remit turned out to be quite fruitless. There certainly was no parole proof there?—Well, we had an enormous print in the case.

11,504. The Lord Justice-General.—Did you notice in any of these cases how long the proof lasted?—No; but in some of them, according to my recollection, it lasted a very long period, owing to prorogations and adjournments of diets. In the case of the foreign house from Aberdeenshire, there was a great deal of prorogation.

11,505. Lord Barcaple.—In that case there was a proof taken in Norway which had to be translated?—That should not have created any great delay.

11,506. Mr. Shand.—Was there a good deal of delay in these cases, or in most of them, arising either from consent of parties, or from parties allowing the case to lie over, and reviving it under the statute from time to time?—No; I think it was from adjournments of diets, and consents, and reclaiming petitions, and things of that kind. I don't think much of it arose from parties allowing the case to become dormant, and then reviving it.

11,507. Mr. Baxter.—Has your Lordship any suggestion to make about the constitution of the Sheriff Courts, as consisting of the Sheriff and his substitutes?—That raises a very important question indeed. It has only been recently agitated in public, and it is but right to say that I have not given it that consideration which would enable me to offer such an opinion as would be likely to be of much service to the Commissioners. But for the sake of preventing delay, and also to some extent preventing expense, and obtaining at once the best judgment that can be obtained, the inclination of my opinion is, that there should be just one Sheriff, and a direct appeal, with as little expense as possible, to the Supreme Court. My belief is, that that would be found to be quite satisfactory to the country.

11,508. The Chairman.—You would not substitute any other kind of review within the Sheriff Court itself for that which now exists?—No, I don't think so.

11,509. Mr. Shand.—If it should be found that the review of the Supreme Court cannot be obtained in ordinary cases at a less expense than £10 or £15 a side, would that affect your opinion?—No, I think not. I think, if the review of the Supreme Court is obtained for £10 or £15 a side, it is a moderate expense; and my expectation is, that under our improved system it could be obtained with very little delay, and then there would be a final and conclusive judgment of the Supreme Court, which would be likely in most instances to be satisfactory to the parties.

11,510. Don't you think that an expense of £20 or £30 as the minimum would be a practical denial of any review in the great majority of Sheriff Court cases?—I am not prepared to say that. If there are fair and reasonable grounds for a review, all my experience has taught me that there is no such thing as a denial of justice in this country. There are various ways in which that is accomplished, and will always continue to be accomplished, without much difficulty. It is said that the review of the Sheriff can be obtained at an expense of £1 or £2; but if there is a reversal, that leads to farther review. It is all very well to say that a poor man may go at once for a trifle to the Sheriff-principal, but it does not in the least follow that the other party will rest content with that. You may have as many tribunals as you please, but they may be, and often are, made engines of oppression. In most—I would be disposed to say in all—cases that originate and are carried on in the inferior court, where it is desirable that there should be a review of the Sheriff-substitute's judgment, that may be obtained very simply, within a short time, and at very little expense, in the Supreme Court. At the same time, from having been for eight years a Sheriff, I must say that I have a partiality for the double Sheriffship.

11,511. The Chairman.—It has been suggested that a better system of review than that of the Sheriff-principal, would be to divide Scotland into five or six districts, and to appoint two gentlemen of the bar to perambulate each district, to hear appeals from the Sheriff-substitutes, and that their decision should be subject to review in the Court of Session. Do you see any advantage in that system?—I must say that I can see no advantage in it, but a great many disadvantages. I think it would be very speedily found to work very ill.

11,512. Do you think that when a judgment of the Sheriff-principal confirms that of the Sheriff-substitute, that review being cheaply obtained satisfies the parties that they ought not to incur the expense of an appeal to the Supreme Court?—That assumes the existence of the double Sheriffship, and I can quite understand that in many instances that may be found satisfactory by the parties. I have no very strong opinion against the double Sheriffship, because I think that there are considerable advantages connected with it in many ways, independent of the exercise of the judicial functions, in the Sheriff going to his county occasionally, and assisting, by his advice and otherwise, in the administration of affairs. It is attended with considerable advantage, and it is not a very expensive institution to the country.

11,513. Mr. Clark.—Would you increase the sum up to which the Sheriff's judgment is final?—I am against finality of judgments as a general rule altogether, and I would not increase that. I think it is a mistaken idea, that justice is to be obtained by declaring judgments final. It may be a mode of perpetrating injustice.

11,514. Don't you think that by permitting litigation in regard to sums not much above £25, you allow of a cost which is quite disproportioned to the stake?—In many cases that will be so; but there are other cases which, though involving only £25 of pecuniary interest, involve considerations of a much higher kind, and it would be very grievous to prevent parties from getting the judgment of the Supreme Court upon them.

11,515. In actions for the recovery of money, would you increase the sum up to which the judgment of the Sheriff is final?—I have such a repugnance to finality of judgments, that I am against that. I think we are all—judges of the Supreme Court as well as of the inferior court—the better of the checks which exist in the way of review of our judgments.

11,516. Does not that allow a rich man to cause great expense to a poor man?—That may happen occasionally; but a judgment of the Supreme Court, even in cases of small amount, can be obtained at such little expense, and with so little delay, that it would not, I think, be right to declare the judgments of the Sheriffs final, beyond the finality which now exists.

11,517. The Chairman.—Do you think it would be expedient to extend the jurisdiction of the Sheriff to questions of status, such as divorce, declarator of marriage, and declarator of legitimacy?—I am against that entirely; and I think that the greater portion of the intelligent and thinking community would be against it also; and for this most obvious reason, that the interests of the whole of society are involved in these questions of status,—for example, as to whether a man is to be divorced from his wife; and the consequences are so serious, that I think judgment in such cases should only be pronounced by the superior court.

11,518. Mr. Baxter.—Is it not a very serious matter to poor people, who are not able to come to the Supreme Court?—No doubt litigation is a hardship in one view to all concerned; but we cannot but recollect that, till very recently, a divorce could only be obtained in England through an Act of Parliament, and here only at an immense expense. It is not upon light grounds that man and wife are to be separated; and I think I speak correctly, when I say that the expense of obtaining a divorce in the Supreme Court is now very small, and it is got very quickly. The proof is appointed to take place at once; it goes on under the superintendence of the judge; and a judgment is obtained without delay, and at very small expense, while you have all the precautions that are likely to be attended to in the Supreme Court.

11,519. Lord Barcaple.—The witnesses must be brought to Edinburgh?—Yes.

11,520. Assuming it to be the case of a poor man in a remote county, is not the remedy of divorce practically excluded by the present state of the law?—I am not prepared to say that.

11,521. Do you recollect to have had divorces of that class of poor persons from remote counties?—I cannot at present say.

11,522. Has not the whole of society a great interest, according to our Scotch notions, in the remedy of divorce, where there are grounds for it, being easily attainable? Is there not a very strong moral reason for it?—Quite so, but I am afraid of too much facility.

11,523. In what way would you expect the facility to act badly, the jurisdiction being extended to the Sheriff of Caithness, we shall say?—Just upon the same principle, that from various considerations, which I need hardly enter into, there are not committed to an inferior court all those great questions which are held to be more appropriate to a supreme tribunal. You might as well say that all important cases should begin and be determined, in the first instance, by a bench of Justices of the Peace.

11,524. Is it not a simple issue in point of fact, and is not the question as to evidence generally a very simple one in these divorce cases?—I would be a little afraid that if divorces were made competent in the inferior court, they would be got up, and the check of having them in the Supreme Court would be entirely removed, so that divorces might be obtained which never ought to have been obtained. I should be afraid of that; and other considerations also lead me to form an opinion against it.

11,525. Mr. Shand.—At present there is every facility given to a man of means to obtain divorce by coming to the Court of Session?—And every facility is given to the poor man, consistently with his finding a very small amount of money.

11,526. If he has not the means, and resides at a distance from Edinburgh, is not the door of the court shut to him?—A very poor man can get on the poors-roll, and have the aid of counsel and agents. We cannot put money in every man's pocket.

11,527. Can any man who is earning day's wages get on the poor's roll?—That is another question, whether the right of getting on the poor's roll is too limited. I am not prepared to say whether there is not sufficient facility given.

11,528. Mr. Campbell.—You are aware that, under the existing Sheriff Court Act, an appeal is contemplated to the Sheriff without either oral or written argument, unless the parties insist on it. Do you see any objection to a similar appeal being granted direct to the Lord Ordinary from the Sheriff, assuming that there is but one Sheriff in each district, instead of a double Sheriff?—I have not thought of that mode of appeal, but it strikes me at the moment as being not a judicious or right course at all. I am against all private and secret judgments or proceedings in judicial matters; and to send up an appeal in that way, by writing to the Supreme Court, and deciding it in chambers (for that would be the result of it), instead of before the public, is a thing that I don't think would operate well, and would give rise to great dissatisfaction. The kind of appeal to which you allude was very seldom resorted to when I was Sheriff, though it did sometimes occur, but I am not surprised that it occurred so seldom.

11,529. Such an appeal taken to the Lord Ordinary would be as cheap as an appeal taken to the Sheriff?—But how can it be maintained that a satisfactory judgment would be pronounced in such circumstances?

11,530. There might be a confirmation of the judgment?—And that might be very erroneous.

11,531. The Lord Justice-General.—You are aware that under the existing law, for a very considerable time, a litigant in the Sheriff Court has had a right of appeal from the Sheriff-substitute to the Court of Session, passing over the Sheriff?—Yes.

11,532. And he has in that way a choice either to appeal in the first instance to the Sheriff, or direct to the Court of Session. You are probably aware also that the percentage of cases appealed direct to the Court of Session from the Sheriff-substitute is very small indeed?—Very small.

11,533. Do you draw any inference from that, favourable or otherwise, to the existing system?—I am not prepared to draw any inference from that at all. Certainly the appeal to the Sheriff-principal can be obtained very easily, and at very little expense; and very likely the kind of conclusion that the parties or their advisers come to in the first instance, is to try that before going to the Supreme Court.

11,534. You are probably aware also that the number of cases brought for review to the Court of Session, where the appeal is taken to the Sheriff in the first instance, is also very small?—Compared with the number of cases in the inferior court, it is very small indeed.

11,535. Does not that indicate that when a litigant in the Sheriff Court has had the opinion of two judges in the Sheriff Court, he is upon the whole satisfied without going any further?—I have my doubts as to whether that is the reason.

11,536. Then how do you account for the state of the fact?—The agents in charge, by whom the parties are naturally, and perhaps quite rightly advised, have no interest in the Court of Session, or in bringing a case to the Court of Session, but the contrary. They are not permitted to practise here, and they have no right to do so. Not only so, but it is held to be contrary to law for them to participate directly or indirectly in the remuneration awarded to the agent in the Supreme Court; and the result is, that while they may give very efficient assistance towards the prosecution of the appeal in the Supreme Court, and thereby incur a large account to themselves, they cannot recover it from the other side, and it is all disallowed. That, I rather think, very often operates, and not unnaturally, against the prosecution of appeals that might otherwise be brought to the Supreme Court from the inferior court.

11,537. Would you be prepared to make any alteration of the law in that respect?—I am told, and I believe it is the fact, that in England no such law as that to which I have alluded exists, and that practitioners in all parts of the country may follow their appeals to the superior courts; and they form connections—which would be the practical result here also, if the law were altered—with the agents in London, through whom appeals are prosecuted in the superior courts, which enable them to participate to a fair and reasonable extent in the fees. If that has been found to operate well in England, and no real disadvantage arising from it, I don't see why the same rule should not exist in Scotland; and I am the more inclined to say so, because I am entirely in favour of the assimilation of the laws and practice in both ends of the island, so far as that can be carried judiciously into effect.

11,538. Then you would be disposed to allow the practitioners in the inferior courts to follow their appeals to the Court of Session?—I would. The practical result would be, that they would form connections here.

11,539. Would you carry that further, and give them a general right of practising in the Supreme Court?—That is a matter I have not thought of. I doubt that. It would give rise to a great many considerations with reference to corporations which have privileges at present. I think it would be very rash to make any definite answer to that question.

11,540. I am sorry to press you with the question?—I have not considered it so as to enable me to answer it.

11,541. There is a rule of law at present existing, standing upon a decision of the court, which prevents the country practitioner and the Edinburgh agent from making any arrangement as to the distribution of their profits. Would you abolish that?—It is a principle of law given effect to by a decision of the court. If the country agent is to be entitled to follow his case to the Supreme Court, and to participate in the emoluments, that law would require to be abrogated as a matter of course. And as I have said—and that very much influences me in the opinion I have given expression to on this point—I understand that such a state of things exists, and has long existed in England, without any objection in practice being found to result from it. If it is so in England, I don't see why it should not be so in Scotland.

11,542. The Chairman.—If that law was abrogated, then although the country agent did not participate in the profits of a suit which had not originated in the Sheriff Court, it would still be competent for him to make arrangements with an agent in Edinburgh as to causes that were advised by him to be brought by his country clients?—I don't know if there would be any serious evil resulting from that. I am quite aware of the law, and I think I have read the case giving effect to the law as it exists.

11,543. The Lord Justice-General.—There is only one case, I think?—There is only one, I daresay; but my impression is that the principles there expressed are not very formidable, and do not recommend themselves very strongly to one's mind. I don't see why there should not be partnerships among legal practitioners as well as other persons, everywhere and anywhere.

11,544. The Chairman.—I suppose you would have a person who has been admitted by the court to represent them?—Yes, that is quite right; but I don't see why we should go into their private relations with one another.

11,545. Mr. Campbell.—You said that there are very few instances of advocation direct from the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute?—Very few, I should imagine, from the mass of cases decided in the inferior court.

11,546. Are you aware whether, when such advocations have been brought into court, the court have expressed any opinion as to the conduct of the parties in passing over the Sheriff without taking his opinion? Was that not reprobated by the court?—I rather think some indication to that effect may have been given.

11,547. The Lord Justice-General.—That must have been a reflection on the statute that permitted it?—I suppose so.

11,548. The Chairman.—Can you suggest any mode by which the expense of accountings in the Court of Session could be diminished?—I am not fond of accountings in any shape.

11,549. They are necessary evils?—They are. I interfere with them as little as possible.

11,550. A suggestion has been made that there might be one or two official persons paid by the public, to whom accountings should be referred, the parties paying their own agents and expenses attending it, and a tariff for these official persons?—If that could be accomplished, I would have no objection.

11,551. At present the accountant is paid by the parties, and he acts as a quasi-judge; and there is no very good way of limiting the amount of charge?—I don't know whether there are official accountants in England paid by the country.

11,552. There are, I believe, officials before whom cases of accounting are prepared and adjusted?—Then it should be so here also. I am in favour, as far as possible, of the principle of all the proper expenses of courts of justice being sustained by the country, and not by the litigants. And it is so very much now in Scotland. Clerks are so paid, and judges are so paid, and other parties are so paid. There is a remnant yet, in the opposite direction, in the shape of the fee fund, which I think might very well be done away with.

11,553. The Lord Justice-General.—I suppose you are of opinion that the present practice in matters of accounting is very objectionable?—In what respect?

11,554. Is it not very expensive?—I presume it is very expensive, and may operate as a denial of justice sometimes.

11,555. Mr. Clark.—And it is very tedious?—Very tedious. Official accountants would probably give rise to a much improved mode of reporting for the information of the court. I think there has been a great improvement in late years made in accountants' reports. We are not now treated to a statement amounting almost to a volume sometimes, as to what the parties have pleaded and not pleaded, and all they have said and not said. That has very much gone into disuse, I am happy to say; but even yet there is far too much statement by accountants. If there were official accountants, I have no doubt they would say as little as they possibly could.

The Hon. Lord Ormidale.

11,556. The Chairman.—And being officers of court, there would be greater facility in the court communicating with them, if they wished to remove any doubt existing?—That would be a great advantage.

11,557. Mr. Clark.—And they would get more into the habit of disposing of that kind of business?—Yes; and the expense, after all, would perhaps not be very great.

11,558. The Lord Justice-General.—Have you any suggestion to make with a view to the diminution of the costs of litigation generally?—No, I have not, because I rather think, from what I have heard complained of as the great cost which has been incurred in many litigations, that it is beyond the remedy of legislative enactment. It is owing to the parties themselves, and it is impossible to restrain them from doing as they like in that matter. There is one suggestion which I may make, viz. that the court has it in its power to check the expenses of ligitation frequently; and I cannot help thinking that in some respects, though not so much recently, they have been a little unobservant in that matter. They have allowed charges for more than two counsel, where perhaps it might have been just as well that they had not.

11,559. Do you mean too many counsel a side?—Yes; I am told that a distinction is allowed at present between the expense of counsel in jury trials and in proofs.

11,560. Where has that distinction been taken?—I have been told that the auditor makes that distinction. I was told so in answer to a question that I put in the course of a discussion before myself recently.

11,561. Mr. Baxter.—What is the distinction?—I was told that the auditor makes such a distinction,—that he allows as against the unsuccessful party larger fees to counsel for attending a jury trial than for attending a proof, assuming it to be of the same duration.

11,562. The Lord Justice-General.—Do you disapprove of that?—I do.

11,563. You think there ought to be no higher fees for attending a jury trial than for attending a proof?—I think not. The one is far more disagreeable and irksome than the other. I would myself take a smaller fee to attend a jury trial.

11,564. The Chairman.—Do you find that in the proofs you have the same constant attendance of senior counsel throughout the investigation that you have in a jury trial?—Very possibly not; but it is not the way to secure their attendance, to give a higher fee in jury trials, and less in proofs. That is an evil which should not be encouraged if it can be avoided. I don't say it can. I hope we always do make indulgences in that way, but the attendance of counsel should be as constant as possible.

11,565. Mr. Baxter.—Do you get much assistance from senior counsel in taking proofs?—Yes; all the ordinary assistance.

11,566. They come in for ten minutes possibly, and go away again, without knowing what is doing; is not that so?—In the conduct of a proof before the judge, things go on very quietly, and the judge can and does lend his assistance to both sides, for the purpose of getting at the truth, in a manner that he could not well be expected to do at a jury trial.

11,567. The Chairman.—If the proof does not monopolize the attention and time of counsel so much as a jury trial does, but allows him to multiply himself so to speak, should the fees be the same as when he is compelled, as counsel who attend jury trials generally feel themselves compelled, to be nowhere else?—I don't like to recognise the principle of a counsel attending only as he pleases in the place at which he is engaged to attend. I ignore that principle altogether, and I desire to have it ignored, in place of having it recognised by allowing smaller fees for a proof. The result of encouraging the practice would be, that we would have the name of counsel's attendance, but not the reality.

11,568. Lord Barcaple.—By the recent statute, the debate must go on immediately at the end of the proof?—Yes.

11,569. Is it at all tolerable as regards the interests of the client, that the counsel who are immediately to address the court upon a proof shall not have been pretty continuously present during the proof?—The more continuous he is in his attendance the better, though we all know from experience that it is quite amazing how a man who has reached the position of senior counsel, from great experience, and probably from higher gifts, makes his assistance available, even when he has only been present occasionally.

11,570. But is it a fair thing to the court, or the parties, that the case shall be instantaneously argued by him without his being told what has taken place, or without the possibility of seeing it recorded?—The provision of the recent statute puts it always in the power of the judge who takes the proof to postpone the hearing, and I think that is a sufficient safeguard.

11,571. Is there such a provision?—Yes. You may send it to the ordinary debate roll. It is not peremptory to hear the debate at the end of the proof.

11,572. The reason of my question is, that my own experience is that, since the passing of the late Act, senior and junior counsel attend well at the taking of the proof. Before that, the debate probably went on after a considerable interval of time, and after the parties had been furnished with the proof?—That was a vicious thing.

11,573. The Lord Justice-General.—The thirty-second section of the Act of 1868 directs, 'that in all proofs before the Lord Ordinary, no adjournment shall be allowed, except on special cause stated in an interlocutor; and the evidence shall be summed up by one counsel on each side at the conclusion of the examination of the witnesses, as in the case of jury trial.' Now, is that not in observance?—Oh yes, it is quite in observance; and in the general case the argument takes place at the end of the proof. We try to enforce that as much as we can. But in a case involving considerable difficulty—involving questions of law as well as evidence—it is not always done. The advantage of a senior over a junior counsel in addressing the court on evidence is not great, if anything at all; but when there is an important legal principle mixed up with the evidence, and it is found at the conclusion of the proof that leading and experienced counsel have not been able to give that close attention which might be desirable in some views, but which is sometimes impracticable (for business could not be carried on if you were to enforce it), then I would hold that to be perfectly sufficient cause for an adjournment; and I would state in the interlocutor—that the case involves legal principles of great importance and difficulty, and the leading counsel had not been able to give close attendance, so as to proceed at once with advantage.

11,574. In such a case, what adjournment do you make?—I have endeavoured to make the adjournment as short as possible.

11,575. How long do you ever make it?—I send it to the ordinary debate roll in some instances.

11,576. How long may it stand there?—According to circumstances, a considerable time. There can be no objection to that, in many instances, because the proof that has been taken may be in itself a comparatively unimportant part of the case. The real difficulties of the case may depend on the construction of a number of deeds or documents; but at the same time there may be some matters requiring to be cleared up by evidence, which the parties could not adjust, and without which they were not in a state to renounce probation; but in reality and substance, the case may not depend on the oral evidence. In such a case as that I would have little hesitation in making the statement of the cause in the interlocutor; and if the parties consent, or, as more often happens, concur in moving the court to send it to the debate roll, I would not have any hesitation in doing so.

11,577. But, in a case depending entirely or mainly on evidence, do you ever take that course?—Never if I can avoid it. But the proof has sometimes been concluded at so late an hour that it is unavoidable. But whenever it is possible, it is put out for next day. It is always put for hearing with as little delay as possible.

11,578. Mr. Shand.—You have not adjourned many proofs in that way?—I have adjourned some; but sometimes, when I insisted on going on, I could see from the look of the parties that it was very much to their annoyance. I think I may say for myself, that ever since I had a place on the bench, I have struggled hard against delays of every sort.

11,579. The Lord Justice-General.—But do you think it desirable that the counsel who is to sum up the evidence at the conclusion, should be present throughout the whole taking of the proof, as much as if you had a jury sitting with you?—I don't know that it is so necessary; I think it is very likely not.

11,580. Why?—In the taking of a proof before the Lord Ordinary, they can always get a little delay if they desire it, which cannot well be given, and ought not to be given, where there are twelve gentlemen sitting as a jury. But in taking proofs we always try to accommodate each other, and give little delays, that the senior counsel may confer with their juniors, or postpone a witness, and take him up out of his place, and so on; these little things don't affect the judgment on the case, but are inadmissible at a jury trial, which must go on more exactly than proofs. I endeavour to be as peremptory as I can in the conduct of these proofs, and of business generally in the Outer House; but I cannot forget that there are probably six or seven courts sitting at once, and it cannot be expected that counsel who are in large practice will tie themselves down to a particular bar. Such a thing is impracticable.

11,581. The Chairman.—And it would add to the expense?—I have no doubt it would.

11,582. The Lord Justice-General.—We have had the subject of refreshing fees brought under our notice. Have you anything to say as to that?—I did not know that that system existed. It is a matter I have not turned my attention to, and I would therefore be reluctant to say anything about it. It is very much a question for the parties. I suppose it is in consequence of the present auditor, as well as his predecessor, having understood their business remarkably well, and discharged their duties remarkably well, that objections to auditors' reports are very uncommon now before me, and I believe before the court; so that really we know less now of the nature of accounts and charges that are made than we did some time ago.

11,583. The Chairman.—In regard to distributing the business among all the judges, as you formerly suggested, would there be no difficulty in doing that with Teind cases, with reference to the Teind clerk?—I am afraid there may be a difficulty there, and I am not prepared to say how it could be obviated; but I cannot allow myself to suppose that it could not be got over in some way. The Hon. Lord Ormidale.

11,584. How would you deal with questions of augmentation? Would you leave them to one of the Divisions?—I think that might be quite sufficient, if it was necessary to begin in the Divisions at all. Probably it would be better to begin there, so as to save the necessity for review; otherwise I don't see why such cases should not be judged of by the Lord Ordinary.

11,585. It is a discretionary matter a good deal, and it is also imposing or transferring a burden?—I am inclined to think that it should go before one of the Divisions at once, and should not be disposed of by a Lord Ordinary in the first instance, because very likely some heritor might bring it under review, and lead to a good deal of expense and litigation. I don't know that there is any good ground why an augmentation should not be granted by one of the Divisions.

11,586. The Lord Justice-General.—You are aware there is no appeal in these cases?—Well, let it be so. I have no objection to that at all.

11,587. The Chairman.—In regard to procedure in localities, would you deal with them in the Division?—If the Lords Ordinary continue as they are, I suppose there would be a remit to one of them. I don't think that such procedure could be well dealt with in a Division. It would be taking up the time of the court with a good deal of detail which had better be done by a single judge.

11,588. In regard to Bill Chamber matters, how would you prevent the same application running the gauntlet of the five Lords Ordinary?—I think there must be one judge there. It might be worth considering whether the Lords Ordinary, if they continue, should not take it in turn; but if the Lords Ordinary continue, I don't see any reason for disturbing the present arrangement.

11,589. In either view you would retain the Bill Chamber?—Yes.

11,590. Mr. Shand.—Have you turned your attention to the question whether the Bill Chamber might be conveniently done away with, and all applications for suspension and interdict, and the like, brought before any judge?—No, I have not directed my attention to that.

11,591. Do you think there is any necessity or propriety in continuing the practice of judges' trials, by which every one who has received an appointment of judge from Her Majesty must proceed to hear certain cases, and give a quasi-judicial opinion on them before beginning to administer justice?—I think it is an antiquated ceremony that might very well be done away with. It serves no good purpose now, though it may at one time have done so. My own impression is that it does neither harm nor good.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD COLONSAY IN THE CHAIR.

GEORGE HUME, Esq., examined. George Hume.

11,592. The Chairman.—You hold an official situation?—Yes. I was chief clerk to the Master of the Rolls for 13 years, from 1852 till 1865, and since that time I have been one of the taxing masters of the Court of Chancery.

11,593. You have seen a note of points on which the Commissioners are desirous to get information?—Yes. The first of them was as to the nature of the proceedings in chambers; and with regard to that, the best thing I can do is to refer you to a return prepared when I was a chief clerk, in November 1862, and sent to the English and Irish Law and Chancery Commission, and which is embodied in their second report, pp. 126 to 131. That return gives a detailed account of the proceedings in chambers before the chief clerks and assistant clerks; it requires a little alteration, owing to subsequent changes made by Act of Parliament, and I hand in a copy corrected in that respect. (See No. 1 infra, page 455.) Another document, which I think would be very useful to this Commission, is Mr. Chapman Barber's statement of the proceedings in the Court of Chancery in England, appended to the first report of the same Commission. The next question in the note of points was, what duties of a judicial character are performed by the chief clerks, and what by the judges personally? The Masters in Chancery Abolition Act (15 and 16 Vict. c. 80), which established the system of conducting business in the chambers of the equity judges, enacts, by section 29, that each judge shall have the sole power to order what matters and things shall be investigated by and before his chief clerks, either with or without his direction, during their progress, and what by himself. The business of the judge's chambers is conducted under the immediate control and direction of the judge; and the great safeguard of the system is the ready access to the judge, on the part both of the chief clerk and of the suitor, whenever necessary. The judge personally hears and decides all questions which he may direct to be brought before him, or which are adjourned to him by the chief clerk for his consideration; and for that purpose the judge sits in chambers once or twice in every week during the sittings of the court, from three or half-past three o'clock in the afternoon until five or six o'clock, as may be required; as well as at other times on any urgent occasion. Where the parties desire to have the assistance of counsel on each side, cases adjourned by the chief clerk are usually heard by the judge in open court during the ordinary sittings of the court. The judge is also at all times accessible to the chief clerk for advice and assistance in any proceedings pending in chambers; and in all cases, any party interested in the proceedings has the right to have any question brought formally before the judge, for his personal opinion or decision. The chief clerks must by statute (15 and 16 Vict. c. 80, s. 17) have the qualification of ten years' practice as solicitors immediately preceding their appointment. They are therefore, from their practical knowledge and experience, fully competent to discharge the important duties of their office. It is obvious that every inquiry, account, investigation of a pedigree, allowance of debts, etc., requires the exercise of what may be called 'judicial discretion;' and even decisions upon applications for time to answer may be called 'judicial.' These cases necessarily involve mixed questions of law and fact, and the principle upon which the business in chambers is conducted is, that the chief clerk investigates all these matters; and then, if a question either of law or fact arises, which the chief clerk for his own guidance considers proper, or any of the parties desire, to refer to the judge, this is done as a matter of course, not in the nature of appeal or review, but for the decision of the judge himself in lieu of that of his chief clerk. In such cases the question may be adjourned for the judge in chambers or in court, or be reserved by the chief clerk's certificate for the decision of the court on hearing the cause on further consideration, according to the nature of the question and the convenience and wishes of the parties; and in these cases it is the duty of the chief clerk to see that all the evidence is complete, and the question ripe for the court or judge. The whole principle is, that the chief clerk should transact such business as from the nature and importance of the question involved may safely be entrusted to a solicitor of experience; and that whenever during the proceedings a question of any kind arises which ought to be disposed of by the judge, this may be done in a ready and inexpensive manner. Counsel are not heard before the chief clerks in proceedings in chambers.

11,594. Do you take evidence at these meetings?—The depositions of witnesses are taken in chambers, unless the witness or parties desire to have the assistance of counsel, in which case the examination is adjourned to the examiner.

11,595. Who examines him?—The solicitor for the party examines him, and the chief clerk takes down the deposition.

11,596. Do you take it down verbatim, or only the substance of it?—It is taken down in the narrative form, and read over to the witness, and he signs every page. It is then filed, and parties can get a copy of it.

11,597. Is it taken on oath?—Yes.

11,598. Mr. Webster.—Is it taken upon oral questions?—Yes.

11,599. The Chairman.—What is the next point?—The next is as to how litigation involving matters of accounting is disposed of. The nature of the account to be taken is defined by a decree or order of the court or judge; it is usually an account of the estate of a deceased person, or of the transactions between A. and B. as partners or otherwise. The account is then brought into the judge's chambers, where the vouchers for the disbursements are produced to the junior clerk, and examined by him in the presence of the parties. The consideration of all doubtful or disputed or unvouched items, and of any surcharge brought in against the accounting party, is reserved for the chief clerk, who proceeds thereon in the presence of the parties, and upon evidence, if necessary; and the several items in the account or surcharge are allowed or disallowed by the chief clerk, subject to review before the judge if so required. The result of the account is then stated in the chief clerk's certificate, and the opinion of the judge thereon may be taken by any party before the judge approves the certificate. Any party may also take out a summons to vary the certificate after it has been approved by the judge and filed; and such summons may be heard by the judge in chambers or in court, as the parties may desire and the judge shall think fit. Any person may take out a summons and get the opinion of the judge on the finding of the chief clerk. The certificate is signed by the chief clerk, and when approved of by the judge it is filed.

11,600. That summons is served on the opposite party?—Yes; and the summons to vary the certificate is generally adjourned to come on with what is called the further consideration of the cause, and the ultimate decision is stated in the order of the court.

11,601. Is there any limit of time within which the summons may be taken?—The judge cannot approve the certificate till four days after the chief clerk has signed it; and any person objecting to it after it is filed must take out a summons within eight days. After that the certificate is binding on everybody.

11,602. How are the costs of that proceeding paid?—They are costs in the cause, unless any particular proceeding is so vexatious that the judge thinks fit to visit the party with the costs of it.

11,603. Do the parties pay any fees to the clerk?—No.

11,604. The Lord Justice-General.—Can you give us any notion of the expense of an accounting conducted in that manner?—I cannot give the separate expense of it. I have here some returns showing the general expense of an administration suit.

11,605. The Lord Advocate.—Can you show also the time occupied?—Yes. I prepared these returns in 1864 for the chairman of the committee on the Bankruptcy Bill. The first case given is a case before the Master of the Rolls. The testator died in August 1852; amount of property, £4694; the summons to administer was taken out, and the order made on 1st December 1852; chief clerk's certificate, 10th March 1853; order on further consideration, 20th April 1853; costs of suit, £155, 15s. 10d. I also prepared a return of several suits, stating the amount of assets on one side and the taxed costs on the other, and taking them together the costs come to about 3 per cent. I hand in a copy of these returns. (See No. 2 infra, page 459.)

11,606. The Lord Justice-General.—Can you give us a case of partnership?—I have no case of partnership in these returns. I see in another case the amount of property was £13,628; summons issued, January 1861; certificate, May 1861; costs, £156, 18s.

11,607. That is an administration suit?—Yes.

11,608. Mr Clark.—What kind of question was involved in the suit?—Ascertaining probably who were the next of kin of the deceased, or the legatees, and taking an account of the debts and assets of the deceased. These are the ordinary inquiries in an administration suit.

11,609. Mr. Webster.—What did the costs chiefly consist of? Fees to counsel and solicitors?—There were very few fees to counsel in this case, because there was no preparation of a bill. The only fees to counsel were those paid on the hearing of the cause on further consideration. The fees to counsel in the case I have mentioned were not £15 altogether.

11,610. Mr. Shand.—Were these cases in which there were litigated points between the parties?—No; there were no litigated points of any importance.

11,611. Mr. Baxter.—Is the accounting ever so large that you require the assistance of an accountant?—It is seldom required except in cases of partnership, where it is often impossible for any person except an accountant to investigate and what is called raise an account.

11,612. Mr. Shand.—Suppose a partnership suit to arise, involving a great many disputed points, are these all disposed of by the chief clerk?—So far as regards any question to be determined, it is done by the chief clerk, subject to the opinion of the judge. And in any question of account the judge or chief clerk may require the assistance of an accountant.

11,613. In practice, how are these cases disposed of?—In partnership cases it is very common to send the account to an accountant, the chief clerk giving his assistance.

11,614. In accountings, when questions of disputed fact arise, do you take evidence?—That is done on affidavits; or the parties may summon witnesses to be examined viva voce before the chief clerk.

11,615. Mr. Webster.—Has the accountant the privilege of direct access to the judge?—No; he comes to the chief clerk if he likes, but not to the judge.

11,616. Mr. Shand.—Suppose evidence requires to be taken, do you fix a day on which the parties must bring evidence?—We generally direct affidavits in support to be brought in on one day, affidavits in answer on another day, and in reply on a third day; but we find it impossible to confine the parties to these days.

11,617. Are these affidavits part of the evidence?—Yes.

11,618. Do the witnesses appear before you where there are affidavits?—No; unless they are cross-examined.

11,619. And the whole evidence consists of affidavits not taken in your presence?—Yes; but any party may examine a witness in chief, or cross-examine a deponent who has made an affidavit; and that is done viva voce before the chief clerk or an examiner.

11,620. Do you have evidence in supplement to the affidavits?—Very often.

11,621. Mr. Baxter.—Are accountants' fees paid by the parties?—Yes.

11,622. Mr. Shand.—Is the evidence taken at the option of the parties?—We don't allow evidence to be brought in upon accounts or inquiries unless the chief clerk requires it. If a party brings in evidence which is not required, he runs the risk of having the expense of it disallowed on taxation.

11,623. The Chairman.—When a case does go to an accountant, is there any control as to the fees of the accountant?—Yes. Under section 42 of the Masters in Chancery Abolition Act (15 and 16 Vict. c. 80), the judge has power to obtain the assistance of an accountant; and by section 43, the accountant's fees are to be regulated by the taxing master, subject to appeal to the judge, whose decision shall be final; and in a recent case the Master of the Rolls has decided that, in the absence of any special agreement, the Court of Chancery will allow on taxation the scale of charges fixed for accountants and their clerks by the general order of the Court of Bankruptcy of 19th May 1855, which is as follows:—Principal's time per day of eight hours, including necessary affidavits, £2, 2s.; chief clerk's time, £1, 15s.; other clerks' time per day of eight hours, 10s. 6d. to 15s. The expenses of taking accounts in the Court of Chancery are borne by the parties to the particular cause, as the judge may direct.

George Hume.

11,624. The Lord Justice-General.—Are the charges you have mentioned the accountant's charges?—Yes; in the case referred to the accountant charged £700, which was thought monstrous. He charged five guineas a day; and the Master of the Rolls reduced the amount to the scale allowed in bankruptcy.

11,625. Mr. Baxter.—The charges for clerks are for the accountant's clerks?—Yes.

11,626. Mr. Webster.—Do you find high-class accountants satisfied with two guineas per day of eight hours?—No, they are not at all satisfied with it.

11,627. Lord Barcaple.—Do they accept the employment?—Oh yes.

11,628. The Lord Justice-General.—The best accountants?—Yes; I am not aware of any difficulty.

11,629. Mr. Adam.—Do the accountants do the work personally, or through clerks?—It is chiefly done through clerks. I do not know if any of the Vice-Chancellors have adopted the rule to which I have referred.

11,630. Mr. Shand.—I suppose the cases you have given us of the expenses of administration suits are not a fair representation of the expense of partnership questions?—I don't think any of these were partnership questions.

11,631. Do you find that in partnership questions the expense has been a good deal more?—No. I should not think that, generally, it is more than an ordinary suit, unless you come to very expensive accountants' fees.

11,632. In partnership cases, have you not more frequently disputed questions?—No. I think in partnership accounts there are very seldom disputed questions.

11,633. The Lord Advocate.—In the case of partnership accounts and accounts of mercantile companies, what is the usual time that it takes before a report can be made?—I should think about a year and a half or two years; but of course it depends very much on the length of the accounts, and the obstacles put in the way by the parties.

11,634. Do they very frequently go on longer than that?—Very frequently; three or four years perhaps.

11,635. Mr. Shand.—Are there interim orders dividing funds from time to time as they come in?—Any party interested may apply at any time to have the funds in court divided; and orders to that effect are made. That is done by summons, and the expense of an order is not great; probably about £10.

11,636. The Lord Justice-General.—Have you ever such cases in Chancery now as Small and Attwood?—I don't know any recent case of that magnitude. The heaviest cases I remember at the Rolls during the time I was chief clerk, were those of Stainton and the Carron Company, Pole and Leask, and the York and North Midland Railway Company and Hudson. These all involved very large amounts of property, and questions of great difficulty. I think they all went on appeal to the House of Lords, and the litigation lasted some ten or twelve years.

11,637. Lord Barcaple.—Where there is a remit to an accountant, what is the ordinary proportion of the entire expense of the accounting that goes in fees to accountants and their clerks?—I can form no idea. A simple account may take a long time or a short time.

11,638. Have you, under the scale of fees which you have mentioned, pretty large sums paid to accountants?—I am not able to state the total amounts paid to the accountants.

11,639. The Lord Justice-General.—You mentioned one case in which the claim made by an accountant was £700. Was that a claim such as used to be allowed before the order was made by the Master of the Rolls?—Yes; it was made out on the principle of charging five guineas a day for the accountant, and two guineas for his clerk's time. I advised the accountant to make it £500; but the charge came before the Master of the Rolls, and in the result he got about £400. If he had charged £500, I should not have objected to allow it. The rule laid down by the Master of the Rolls is thought by the accountants to be a hard rule.

11,640. Mr. Shand.—Has business been conducted subject to that rule since?—In the Master of the Rolls' chambers certainly. He will not employ an accountant unless he consents to it.

11,641. Mr. Adam.—Who checks the accounts?—The chief clerk generally. The accountant keeps a note of the time during which he and his clerk are engaged.

11,642. Mr. Shand.—Do the proceedings for winding up companies fall under the chief clerk's control?—Yes.

11,643. What is the procedure there?—After the order to wind up, the parties apply to proceed upon the order. The first thing is to appoint an official liquidator, and then to settle the list of contributories, and ascertain who are the shareholders, which is generally a very difficult matter, and very much contested. The claims against the estate are then ascertained, and paid out of the assets of the company, or by calls upon the contributories.

11,644. How much of that falls under the duty of the chief clerk?—It is all done by the chief clerk.

11,645. Has it not been the practice in recent times to name an accountant?—The official liquidator is generally an accountant. He brings in the accounts of the estate, and makes out a balance-sheet. The chief clerk has nothing to do with that, except to verify it.

11,646. The chief clerk's duties there are very much judicial?—Yes, very much, especially in settling the list of contributories; but that is always subject to review by the judge.

11,647. The Chairman.—Is the liquidator paid by a percentage?—Sometimes; and sometimes by a lump sum. The rule in my time was a percentage, and that is very objectionable. The judges have now settled a scale of remuneration for liquidators, a copy of which I beg to hand in. (See No. 3 infra, page 460.)

11,648. The Lord Justice-General.—There is another class of accounts in the winding up of private trusts. Do these come before you?—No; except in a suit, when a bill is filed against trustees for an account.

11,649. That is what I mean?—That is very common.

11,650. Is that an expensive proceeding?—That depends very much on the length of the account.

11,651. It may extend over a long series of years?—Yes. Sometimes parties will consent to waive a detailed account, to avoid expense, and take a balance-sheet, or they will take the books sometimes as evidence of receipts and payments. The court has power (under 15 and 16 Vict. c. 86, sec. 54) to give special directions as to the mode in which an account shall be taken or vouched; and to direct that the books in which the accounts have been kept shall be taken as primâ facie evidence of the truth of the matters contained therein.

11,652. Generally speaking, in cases of that kind, is the business of making up the account done in the chief clerk's office, or is it sent to an accountant?—The account is prepared by the solicitor to the accounting party who brings in the account. I have known cases where it has been so complicated, that the court has allowed the expense of an accountant to frame the account; but that is very seldom done in the case of trustees' accounts.

11,653. After the account is framed and put in, parties may object to it?—Parties may object to any item in the account, or they may bring in a surcharge; that is, they may charge the accounting party with what he has not accounted for; and that is often very much contested.

11,654. Is that carried on in the chief clerk's office?—Entirely in the judge's chambers.

11,655. Without the assistance of an accountant?—Yes, without the assistance of an accountant.

11,656. Mr. Webster.—But in presence of the judge only when the parties require that?—Yes; or when the chief clerk requires it.

11,657. Mr. Adam.—Are solicitors considered personally responsible to the accountant?—Yes. The judge, before he sanctions the employment of an accountant, requires the solicitor of the party to undertake to pay the accountant's charges, without prejudice to the question by whom they should be ultimately borne.

11,658. Lord Barcaple.—Do you think it would considerably increase the expense if the solicitor for the accounting party did not, in the first place, produce an account, but the order were made at once to send it to an accountant?—I never knew such an order made.

11,659. I suppose it would very much increase the expense?—Very much indeed. Drawing the account by the solicitor costs one shilling a folio; but to send it to an accountant might cost five guineas a day.

11,660. But it may go to an accountant?—I have known very rare cases of trustees' accounts in which an accountant was called in.

11,661. Have you accountings, not where parties have been called into court as trustees or partners, but where there have been mutual transactions on open account for a series of years, and these transactions are complicated?—Only when that occurs in a suit against a person to account for sums which he has received. There are no means by which trustees or partners can have their accounts stated or adjusted by officers of the Court of Chancery in England without the institution of a suit, and a decree or order made in such suit, directing the account to be taken. Where such a decree or order is made, the account is taken in the manner described in a former answer.

11,662. It might come in that form?—Yes.

11,663. Is that common?—I remember some few such cases, but they are not common.

11,664. Mr. Shand.—Do you find it a great advantage that parties can give evidence in the form of affidavits?—Yes.

11,665. Does it save a great deal of time and expense?—Yes.

11,666. Do you think it would serve the purpose that all examinations should take place before the chief clerk viva voce?—No chief clerk could do it.

11,667. Then the system of affidavits is a very great advantage?—Yes, subject to cross-examination.

11,668. The Lord Justice-General.—When you say that the chief clerks could not do it, you mean there would not be time?—Yes; it would take much more time than the chief clerk could bestow upon it, consistently with his other duties.

11,669. Mr. Shand.—Have you any control over the length of the affidavits?—The chief clerks have power to certify that an affidavit is irrelevant altogether, or that certain parts of it are irrelevant; but the taxing masters do not go into that question unless the court directs it in the order. The judge, however, occasionally refers it back to the chief clerk to state what parts of the affidavit ought not to be allowed.

11,670. And that checks redundancy?—Yes, to a certain extent.

11,671. The Lord Advocate.—Is that a frequent occurrence,—the going back to the chief clerk?—No, I believe it is not frequent.

11,672. The Chairman.—What is the next point?—Proceedings under the Drainage Act (8 and 9 Vict. c. 56) are practically obsolete, a summary jurisdiction in such cases being exercisable by the General Inclosure Commissioners. Proceedings under the Settled Estates Acts (19 and 20 Vict. c. 120; 21 and 22 Vict. c. 77; and 27 and 28 Vict. c. 45) are by petition to the court; which petition is in the first instance referred to chambers to direct in what newspapers the notices required by the Act are to be inserted, and to appoint guardians to infant petitioners or respondents, and to make orders for leave for such guardians to make or consent to applications under the Act, and to appoint examiners to ascertain from married women whether they freely desire to make or consent to applications under the Act. After the order is made by the court, the proceedings as to sales or leases of the settled estate directed by the order are carried on in chambers in the same manner as on sales or leases under decrees or orders. The expense of all proceedings under these Acts is borne by the particular estate. There are six conveyancing counsel; and all questions on which the court requires their assistance are sent to them.

11,673. Mr. Webster.—Are these proceedings chiefly carried out through the intervention of the chief clerk?—Entirely.

11,674. The Chairman.—Have the conveyancing counsel salaries?—They are paid by fees.

11,675. Is there a list of these counsel sanctioned by the court?—They are appointed by the Lord Chancellor, under sec. 41 of 15 and 16 Vict. c. 80.

11,676. Mr. Webster.—Are their fees paid by the parties?—By the parties who consult them.

11,677. Is there a tariff?—No, there is no tariff; and sometimes unpleasant questions arise.

11,678. The Lord Advocate.—Do you think that a good system?—I think conveyancing counsel a very good system.

11,679. But do you think the system of payment a good one?—I think there is no other way of doing it. The fees often come to a very large proportion of the expense.

11,680. The Chairman.—Is it left to the discretion of the solicitor what fee to give?—The solicitor generally arranges the fee with the clerk of the conveyancing counsel; but in case of dispute the 43d section of 15 and 16 Vict. c. 80, provides that the fees of the conveyancing counsel shall be regulated by the taxing master, subject to an appeal to the judge; but the judges are jealous as to our interfering with the fees of counsel.

11,681. The solicitor does it at his own peril in the first instance?—Yes. He may go to the chief clerk and ask if he would sanction such a fee, but very much is left to the solicitor's discretion.

11,682. Are these fees sometimes very heavy?—Yes.

11,683. The Lord Advocate.—Has the chief clerk any subordinates in his office?—The Master of the Rolls and Vice-Chancellors have each three chief clerks, and each chief clerk has two junior clerks and an assistant clerk, and in some cases additional junior clerks.

11,684. Mr. Webster.—Would you mention the salaries of these clerks?—The chief clerks have a salary of £1500 a year each; the salaries of the junior clerks range from £200 to £500 a year; and those of the assistant clerks from £150 to £250.

11,685. Mr. Shand.—What is the qualification for the office of chief clerk?—He must be a solicitor of ten years' practice immediately before his appointment.

11,686. The appointment is not made from the bar?—No.

11,687. The Chairman.—Is he appointed by the Lord Chancellor?—He is appointed by the judge, with the approbation of the Lord Chancellor. The Lord Chancellor must give his approval.

11,688. Mr. Webster.—Is there any specified qualification for the assistants?—None for the assistants or the juniors. The junior clerks are taken from the best managing clerks of solicitors, and the assistant clerks are taken from solicitors' offices.

11,689. Mr. Clark.—Who makes the appointments under the chief clerk?—The judge appoints the junior clerks.

11,690. Mr. Adam.—Are there any other clerks?—Not in the judge's chambers.

11,691. They do the whole business?—Yes.

11,692. The Lord Justice-General.—What other officers are there connected with the Court of the Master of the Rolls or of a Vice-Chancellor?—The Master of the Rolls and each Vice-Chancellor has a secretary. The Master of the Rolls has also an assistant secretary, and subordinate clerks in his secretary's office, in which much business of a formal nature is transacted. He also appoints the examiners.

11,693. What is the salary of the secretary?—I am not able to say.

11,694. What is the officer called the examiner?—He takes the examination of all witnesses for the purpose of being used in the Court of Chancery. The evidence is taken viva voce before him.

11,695. Does he act for all the Courts of Chancery?—Yes.

11,696. Mr. Clark.—Is there only one examiner?—There are two examiners.

11,697. What are their salaries?—I think £1500 a year.

11,698. The Chairman.—Are the assistant clerks appointed by the judge?—They are appointed by the Lord Chancellor. He has power, under a special Act, to appoint assistant clerks.

11,699. Mr. Shand.—Has the examiner any other duty except to examine witnesses viva voce?—None.

11,700. Has he no control over the system of affidavits?—None.

11,701. Mr. Webster.—Are the examinations before the examiner conducted by counsel?—Usually by counsel.

11,702. Mr. Shand.—These examiners fix a time at which both sides, with their witnesses, must appear?—Yes; parties apply to the examiner for an appointment; and he fixes a day, and the parties are bound to attend on that day.

11,703. Does the proceeding go on as at a trial?—Yes.

11,704. And with the same penalties as to the absence of witnesses?—Yes.

11,705. Mr. Clark.—From what body are the examiners appointed?—They are barristers.

11,706. Is their time fully employed?—I believe not. Cases constantly go off; parties cannot attend, and the day is lost.

11,707. The Chairman.—Is the examiner paid by salary?—Yes; all the officers of the court are paid by salary.

11,708. Mr. Adam.—Is the examiner entitled to take other business?—No.

11,709. The Chairman.—Are there any other points on which you have any information to give?—One of the points was as to how the judgments of the court are drawn up. They are embodied in decrees and orders, which are drawn up and passed by the registrar in the presence of the parties, and entered in books preserved in the Report Office of the court.

11,710. Does the judge put them upon paper, or does he merely announce his judgment?—He announces his judgment, and the registrar in court takes a note of the decision. In some very special cases the judge himself prepares a minute of his decision. Lord Justice Knight Bruce, when he was Vice-Chancellor, and Lord Justice Turner, were in the habit of preparing their own minutes; and they were very admirable.

11,711. Mr. Shand.—But, as a rule, that is not done?—It is not. The counsel indorse on their briefs what the decision of the court is; and if any question arises, the registrar has to apply to the judge, or the parties may apply to the court again to settle the minutes.

11,712. The Chairman.—What is the proper province of a registrar?—To attend the judge in court, to take a minute of his decisions, and answer any questions as to practice, and to prepare and settle the orders made by the judge.

11,713. Who appoints him?—The registrars are appointed by the Lord Chancellor. They are appointed clerks at first, and they rise as vacancies occur to be registrars. They must at the time of appointment as clerk be on the roll of Solicitors, or have served five years under articles of clerkship.

11,714. Have they any other duties?—No. Their duties are very laborious.

14,715. Does the registrar attend the judge in chambers?—Not unless specially required by the judge.

11,716. Mr. Shand.—Has the registrar a separate chamber of his own?—Yes; each registrar has a room and a staff of clerks.

George Hume.

11,717. How are the duties so laborious?—He has to attend court during the sittings, and then he has to draw up thirty or forty orders in the course of a week, and to settle them all.

11,718. Lord Barcaple.—That is, to settle them out of court?—Yes.

11,719. The parties attending him?—Yes.

11,720. Do counsel attend on these occasions?—No; but the minutes are frequently drawn by the counsel on the one side, and approved by the counsel on the other.

11,721. When the order is signed, do the solicitors attend?—Yes; they attend when the order is finally settled and passed.

11,722. Is that a matter about which they dispute?—There are very often great disputes about the substance of the directions given by the court, and the terms in which they should be expressed.

11,723. Are there frequent adjournments of meetings before the registrar?—Very often.

11,724. The Chairman.—What is the salary of the registrar?—It is a graduated salary. They rise by seniority. The senior registrar has £2000 a year, and the junior registrar begins with £1200 and goes up by steps. There is one at £2000, three at £1800, four at £1500, and four at £1200.

11,725. The Lord Advocate.—Are all these payments made out of the suitors' fund?—Yes.

11,726. Mr. Gordon.—What fees are payable by suitors in Chancery?—The fees are all paid by means of stamps now.

11,727. But on what proceedings are they payable?—On proceedings in the different offices of the court; for example, £3 on every decree, and for every summons issued, 3s.

11,728. Is an order any interlocutory order?—The fee on any interlocutory order drawn by the registrar is £1, and the decree is £3. There is a table showing the fees of court in the regulations subjoined to the Consolidated General Orders of the Court of Chancery.

11,729. Mr. Clark.—Does the registrar express at length what the judge has expressed in short?—The order itself embodies the judge's judgment; that is, it directs a certain account to be taken, or declares that A. B. is entitled to certain rights; and the registrar's duty is to embody as shortly as he can, in the decree or order, what the judge has determined.

11,730. The judge expresses his opinion generally?—Yes.

11,731. And the registrar draws it up at length?—Yes, as concisely as he can. I remember when a decree was as thick as a book, but now it rarely exceeds a dozen pages of foolscap, and is frequently only three or four pages.

11,732. Mr. Gordon.—Are the documents recited now?—No; it states that there is a certain affidavit without setting it out. We don't, in taxation, allow any affidavit unless it is entered by the registrar in the order.

11,733. And every document also?—Yes, by exhibits, A, B, C, D, and so on.

11,734. The clerk or registrar does not keep the documents which are exhibited?—No.

11,735. The parties keep the documents?—The affidavits are filed, but the exhibits are not filed; they are retained by the parties.

11,736. Lord Barcaple.—When the judgment is finally adjusted, where is it recorded?—Every decree or order, when signed by the registrar, is forthwith copied at length into books preserved in the Report Office of the court, which books are open to public inspection on payment of a trifling fee. The decree or order, after it has been thus entered, is handed to the solicitor of the plaintiff or other successful party, and is kept by him, and produced when necessary.

11,737. If a party wishes to enforce against his opponent the judgment which he has got, has he to go to that record?—The officers of the court act upon production of the original decree or order, or if that is lost, or mislaid, or from any cause cannot be produced, upon an office copy of the decree or order from the record of it in the books of the Report Office.

11,738. The Lord Justice-General.—Are there any other points which you have not referred to?—There is a question about the higher and lower scales in the Court of Chancery.

11,739. What is the operation of the rules as to taxing accounts according to the value of the cause?—The rule depends on whether the estate in question amounts to £1000 or not. Above that a certain scale of fees is allowed, and below that another scale.

11,740. Are there only two scales?—Only two scales.

11,741. Is there much difference in the scales?—Yes. For example: 6s. 8d. lower scale, and 13s. 4d. higher.

11,742. That is double?—Yes. In some cases it is 2 guineas in the one, and 3 guineas in the other. There is also a difference in other respects in the fees paid to solicitors, and in the court fees; this difference will be seen by referring to the regulations as to fees, subjoined to the Consolidated Orders.

11,743. Is there not a little hardship in fixing a hard line?—Sometimes it is very hard. A very proper litigation arises sometimes with regard to a small property under £1000, and the successful party only recovers the lower scale of fees.

11,744. And that will not pay his account?—It will scarcely remunerate the solicitor; but the solicitor can only charge against his client the fees on the lower scale. The rule works very hardly sometimes, but still it protects small properties.

11,745. Mr. Adam.—Is there any limit to the number of counsel allowed as a charge against the opposite party?—Between party and party no more than two counsel are allowed, except for very special causes, such as a heavy examination of witnesses.

11,746. The Lord Justice-General.—With reference to the two scales, do you think that an expedient distinction to maintain?—I do.

11,747. For what reason?—I think it is expedient in the case of properties of the value of £300 or £400. We find in Chancery that very frequently the estate would be eaten up by costs if the higher scale were applicable; but undoubtedly there are cases where it works hardly.

11,748. The rule is for the protection of small estates?—Yes.

11,749. But still it operates hardly?—Occasionally.

11,750. In taxing accounts, is there much interference with the amount of fees sent to counsel?—The court is so jealous of our interfering with fees to counsel that we hardly ever touch them, unless it is a case of manifest abuse.

11,751. But the taxing officer has the power to deal with them?—We have the power; but if we exercise it, the party who paid the fees will generally object and go to the court, knowing that the court will be disposed to uphold the fees, so that we feel it is almost useless to interfere. We can limit the number of counsel, and we never allow more than two for the same party, except in very special cases.

11,752. What specialties induce you to allow more than two counsel?—A great many witnesses, or a vast amount of evidence, or a case that lasts perhaps a week in the hearing, where the strength of two men would hardly accomplish it. The Master of the Rolls allowed an extra counsel in a case lately where the junior was promoted to be a Q.C.

11,753. Mr. Webster.—What would be deemed to be an excessive fee?—If a solicitor paid 10 guineas for settling a deed of 30 folios, I would consider that very excessive.

11,754. The Lord Justice-General.—That is in the case of conveyancing counsel?—Yes; or 10 guineas on a motion to dismiss a bill.

11,755. That last being formal?—Yes; but for Queen's Counsel attending, it would be 2 or 3 guineas.

11,756. Mr. Webster.—Is there such a fee as 10 guineas for attending court?—It depends on the nature of the business.

11,757. Lord Barcaple.—Suppose a case in which the argument and the judgment occupied one entire day, and there are two counsel on each side, what would you suppose to be the ordinary scale of fees?—The fee is entirely regulated by the amount of paper the counsel has to read, and the nature of the case. It is impossible to say what fee should be given without knowing the nature of the case.

11,758. The Lord Justice-General.—In many cases in the Court of Chancery, I presume there is a solicitor in the country who instructs the solicitor here?—Yes; there are what we call agency cases.

11,759. Is there any rule for apportioning the fee between these two?—That is matter entirely of agreement between the principal and the agent; but the ordinary rule is one-half of the net profits.

11,760. If there is no agreement, would it be one-half?—The solicitor in the country would get one-half, and the agent in London would get one-half of such business as the London agent does. He does not share the country solicitor's charges for the business done in the country.

11,761. And the country solicitor receives one-half?—Yes.

11,762. Mr. Baxter.—Is the country solicitor's account allowed?—It is treated as if there was one solicitor.

11,763. The Lord Justice-General.—The account you examine is the account of the London solicitor?—It is the account prepared by the London solicitor, embracing his own and the country solicitor's charges as one entire account.

11,764. Lord Barcaple.—In a country case there has been probably a good deal of expenditure in getting up the evidence, and making preparation for the cause in the country: do these expenses come before you as expenses of the London agent?—They come before us in one bill.

11,765. For all the work done in the country as well as in town?—Yes.

11,766. Mr. Gordon.—Supposing the town solicitor writes to the country solicitor for information?—We never allow that. We never allow for correspondence between the principal and agent.

11,767. The Lord Justice-General.—Never for correspondence between the London solicitor and the country solicitor?—Never; but the taxing masters have power to allow, according to their discretion, a special fee for any special agency correspondence between the country solicitor and his town agent, beyond the usual fee of £1, 1s. 8d. for term fee and agency letters; and it is usual, in taxing agency bills, to allow £1, 1s. or £2, 2s. a year for special agency correspondence, or even a larger sum if the special circumstances of the case justify it. Any other expense properly incurred by country agents is allowed in the same manner as if done by the town agent—the town and country agents, where the business is conducted as agency business, being treated as one solicitor.

11,768. Mr. Adam.—Are agents ever allowed to borrow the principal papers?—They cannot take away papers that are filed.

11,769. They do not get the original bill?—The original bill is filed, and cannot be taken away.

11,770. Mr. Webster.—Is there a copy served on the adverse party of all papers that are filed?—That depends on what it is. A bill is served on all the parties who are to answer it; but if an affidavit is made, the solicitor is applied to, and he furnishes a copy of it at 4d. a folio.

11,771. The Lord Justice-General.—How does the solicitor for the other party know that there is such an affidavit?—A solicitor is obliged to give notice that he has filed an affidavit, and for that he is allowed a fee of 2s. 6d.

11,772. Lord Barcaple.—The witnesses are sometimes examined in court before the Vice-Chancellor?—Very often.

11,773. Have you found that that mode of procedure has any effect on the amount of costs in the cause? Does it increase or diminish them?—I think in contested cases the feeling is in favour of taking evidence viva voce in the Court of Chancery. The only objection is the great expense which is incurred, in the case of an appeal, by copies of the shorthand writer's notes of the evidence. By the General Order of the 5th February 1861, Rule 14, upon any appeal or further proceedings, the judge's notes of the viva voce evidence shall prima facie be deemed a sufficient note thereof; but the judges do not take sufficient notes of viva voce examinations before them, and the practice is for a shorthand writer to attend for that purpose; and in case of an appeal or re-hearing, a transcript of his notes (which are generally very voluminous) is furnished to counsel, and also frequently to the court, whereby a large expense is occasioned.

11,774. Is the employment of a shorthand writer the only material respect in which the taking of the evidence before the judge is found to increase the expense?—The bringing up of witnesses sometimes, where they come from a great distance, increases the expense very materially.

11,775. Can they be cross-examined without bringing them up?—You may appoint an examiner in the locality to examine them.

11,776. Suppose a case where the witnesses are in Northumberland?—The court, if it thinks fit, would appoint an examiner to take the evidence in Northumberland, but it would be very unwilling to do so.

11,777. But in ordinary cases the witnesses would be brought before the examiner in London?—Before the court in London, or before the examiner in London.

11,778. Is there a larger employment of counsel at the taking of the evidence before the judge than ordinarily takes place before the examiner?—If it is a very heavy case, three counsel are allowed.

11,779. Are there generally two counsel before the examiner?—No; only one.

11,780. That is the matter in which there is increase of expense?—By examining before the court instead of before an examiner you save the costs of the attendance of counsel before the examiner, and of copies of the depositions to be used in the court below.

11,781. Mr. Gordon.—Don't you think the examination of the witnesses is more quickly got through when there is a shorthand writer?—In equity, the judges do not take down the notes sufficiently. The general order of the court provides that the notes of the judge shall prima facie be deemed sufficient; but they never do take sufficient notes.

11,782. The Lord Justice-General.—Does that not arise very much from its being a novelty?—Very much so. The notes of the common law judges are always sufficient. No doubt it does very much increase the expense of an appeal where the witnesses are examined viva voce in the court below, because that involves the necessity of copies of the shorthand writer's notes for the court of appeal, and for each of the counsel engaged.

11,783. Mr. Gordon.—When you require so many copies, do you not print the evidence?—I believe printing would be cheaper, but it is not often done.

11,784. Is it the interest of the solicitor not to print?—No; he would be allowed the same per folio.

11,785. Mr. Shand.—Are there many appeals on matters of fact in Chancery?—Very few. Appeals in the Court of Chancery mostly arise upon questions of construction of deeds, wills, and other documents.

11,786. Suppose evidence taken, and the Vice-Chancellor or the judge in the first instance to come to a certain conclusion on the fact, is that not frequently appealed?—Yes; for example, when evidence is taken in a will case as to the competency of a party to make the will, that is very often appealed.

11,787. In that case, where the judge has not notes which are available, what do the judges in appeal look at?—They have copies of the shorthand writer's notes. In some cases the shorthand writer's notes are admitted and signed by the solicitors of the respective parties, and entered in the decree or order as evidence.

11,788. Are these notes taken officially?—They are taken by any shorthand writer the parties agree upon.

George Hume.

11,789. And if they do not agree?—Each party employs his own shorthand writer; and if any question arises, they compare the notes. If the viva voce system of examination is continued, I believe it would be very desirable to have a shorthand writer attached to each court, as is the case in Ireland, and in the Court of Bankruptcy here.

11,790. The Lord Justice-General.—Do you know how the officer you speak of in the Irish courts is paid?—I don't know. He is an officer called the clerk of court. This officer was abolished here, but not abolished in Ireland; and now I understand he is required to learn shorthand writing in order to take the evidence.

11,791. The expense of the shorthand writer's notes must of course be doubled if each party employs a shorthand writer?—They generally agree to employ one particular shorthand writer between them, and they share the expense.

11,792. You say there are not many cases in which appeals are taken on matter of fact in the Court of Chancery?—Not simply on matter of fact.

11,793. When you speak of matters of fact, do you mean mere matters of fact, or also inferences of fact?—Mere matters of fact.

11,794. In what are properly inferences of fact, I suppose there will be many appeals?—Yes.

11,795. And there it is necessary to examine the evidence just as much as if it were an appeal upon a mere matter of fact?—Certainly.

11,796. Mr. Shand.—Do you mean that there are many cases appealed in which the appeal judges require to look at the evidence?—Oh, constantly. The whole question may turn on the construction to be put on the evidence, the appeal being taken on the ground that the judge below has put an improper construction upon it.

11,797. The Lord Justice-General.—In such cases the judges in appeal read the evidence?—Certainly; unless it is a dry point of law.

11,798. Mr. Webster.—But there is no authentic record of the evidence; they merely take the judge's notes, and such notes as have been taken by the shorthand writer?—Yes; but the counsel always agree that the shorthand writer's notes are correct.

11,799. There is nothing on record to test the accuracy of the judge's notes, and the notes of the shorthand writer are not certified?—I don't believe the Lords Justices ever see the notes of the judge below. All they see is the shorthand writer's notes.

11,800. Mr. Clark.—Suppose there is a serious dispute as to what the witness has said?—Then they must re-examine the witness.

11,801. Does that frequently happen?—Very seldom, I believe. I remember one case in which Lord Justice Knight Bruce did it.

11,802. The Lord Justice-General.—If a witness is directed to be re-examined in such a case, is that done by the examiner?—It is done viva voce in the appeal court.

11,803. Mr. Clark.—Is it a matter of right to the party to require the re-examination of the witness?—No.

11,804. If he disputes the record of the evidence as it appears in the judge's notes, and says that is not right, can he insist upon the re-examination of the witness?—That is a matter in the discretion of the appeal court. They would not in every case yield to the statement of the party that he was not satisfied with the notes. The court would lean very much to the statement of counsel on the subject.

11,805. But if the counsel said that the judge's notes were altogether wrong?—If the court were satisfied that there was an error, it would order the re-examination.

11,806. The court cannot be satisfied of that except in so far as they receive information from the counsel?—They must be satisfied that there is some presumption that there is an error. But I know very little of that part of the practice of the court.

11,807. Mr. Justice Willes.—Does it not come to this, that there is practically no appeal upon a question of the credibility of a witness—that must be decided by the tribunal before which the witness is examined, upon the view that the appeal lies rather upon the proper conclusions to be drawn from the established facts than upon the question of credibility?—Yes; giving certain weight to evidence, the truth of which is doubtful. I am not aware of any appeal upon mere dry fact; the appeal is upon the construction of the evidence.

11,808.—The Lord Justice-General.—What is the general feeling of the profession, do you know, as to the advantage of taking evidence viva voce before the court?—I am hardly qualified to answer that question. My own opinion is in favour of it; but I am not competent to say what is the general feeling at the bar upon the subject.

11,809. What is the state of feeling as to the advantage of having a power of review within the court itself?—That should only be in cases of error or omission.

11,810. What I mean is not merely by the Vice-Chancellor reviewing his own judgment, but by his judgment being reviewable by the Lords Justices?—Every judgment of a judge of the first instance is reviewable by the court of appeal; but except for the purpose of correcting clerical mistakes, or errors arising from any accidental slip or omission, no review or re-hearing of a case should be allowed before the judge who has made the decree or order; and except by consent of all parties, no appeal to the House of Lords should be allowed until the decision of the judge has been reviewed by the court of appeal in Chancery.

11,811. Mr. Shand.—Is the review of the Lord Chancellor or of the Lords Justices the more popular?—I am not able to say; it depends entirely on the feeling of the parties. I think an appeal court consisting of two is too small. I think it ought to consist of at least three judges.

11,812. Lord Barcaple.—The parties have not their choice of appealing to the Lord Chancellor or the Lords Justices?—No; it is regulated by the Lord Chancellor and the Lords Justices. They make some arrangement between themselves.

11,813. Mr. Adam.—Is it the rule in Chancery not to give a successful appellant the costs of his appeal?—Not of the mere appeal. They attach a certain weight to the judgment of the court below.

11,814. Do you think that system prevents appeals?—I don't think anything prevents appeals.

11,815. The Lord Justice-General.—The cost of an appeal is not very great?—I should say, in an ordinary case, from £30 to £50. It depends upon the length of the evidence. No fresh briefs are delivered.

11,816. In what circumstances do you allow refreshing fees to counsel?—Where a brief is properly delivered in one term, but the cause is not heard, and comes into the paper next term, we allow a common refresher.

11,817. What proportion does that bear to the original fee?—The common refresher fee is 2 guineas to the leader, and one guinea to the junior counsel.

11,818. No more?—No more. Now, the practice is rather coming in of allowing daily refreshers in very heavy cases, as they do in the courts of common law. In a very heavy patent case, which lasted nine days, I allowed 5 guineas a day as a daily refresher to the senior counsel after the first day, and 3 guineas to the junior.

11,819. Was that for an entire day?—Yes.

11,820. Lord Barcaple.—What might be the amount of the counsel's fee there?—Very likely 100 guineas.

11,821. The Lord Justice-General.—That original fee would be a fee involving the reading of a great mass of papers?—Yes.

11,822. And preparing generally for the hearing?—Yes.

11,823. But suppose that the cause, when it comes on for hearing, originally lasts only a fraction of a day, would you then allow a refresher for the next day?—No. It must be an entire day.

11,824. It must be an entire day before the first fee is exhausted?—Exactly. That is the rule in common law and in Chancery. It must occupy an entire day. At common law the maximum of a daily refresher is, I think, 10 guineas to the leader, and 7 or 5 guineas to the junior counsel.

11,825. Suppose that there is an entire day occupied, but that of the second day there is only a small fragment?—I should not allow a refresher unless on the day on which the refresher is paid the case lasts the day.

11,826. In short, a refresher never represents anything else than an additional entire day's work?—Just so.

11,827. Mr. Shand.—If a cause is expected to last more than one day, how is the fee proportioned?—The fee is paid in proportion to the magnitude of the cause, not often with reference to the time it is likely to last, because it may go off very shortly. It is paid according to the magnitude of the cause and the length of the papers counsel has to read.

11,828. Mr. Adam.—If the argument in a case is once commenced, does it go on continuously?—Next day may be motion day, and it does not go on till the motions are disposed of.

11,829. The Lord Justice-General.—Do I understand that the first fee which you allow bears the same proportion to the length of papers to be read, or rather to the magnitude of the cause?—The real proportion is to the length of the papers to be read.

11,830. Have you anything like a scale or rule about the amount of fees according to the length of the papers?—We have a rule as to the amount of fee according to the length of paper when the counsel prepares the paper. But we have no fixed scale as to the fee on hearing in court, though we know very well what is the fee usually paid. The scale of fees paid to counsel has very much increased during the last twenty-five years, but as a rule I do not think solicitors pay exorbitant fees to counsel; it is not the interest of any solicitor to give an exorbitant fee, because it has to come in the first instance out of his own pocket.

11,831. Mr. Webster.—Are the fees for preparing papers sent before or after the paper is prepared?—In some cases the fee is paid when the papers are taken away, but the general rule here is that an account is kept. Some offices pay once a month. In most cases the counsel marks his own fee for drawing a deed. We never, on taxation, allow any fee without a voucher. But it is very seldom that fees are paid at the time.

11,832. Lord Barcaple.—Is the amount of the fee not intimated at the time of the instructions being given?—No; but there is a certain scale for preparing papers.

11,833. The Lord Justice-General.—What sort of papers do you refer to?—Bills in Chancery and answers.

11,834. Are bills in Chancery always prepared by counsel?—Yes; by the junior counsel.

11,835. By the counsel who afterwards argues the cause?—Yes.

11,836. Mr. Webster.—Who prepares the interrogatories?—They are prepared by the plaintiff's counsel.

11,837. And affidavits?—They are generally prepared by the solicitor, unless in special cases.

11,838. The Lord Justice-General.—Have you any scale for the fees for preparing papers?—It is usually about 1 guinea for less than 30 folios; for 30 folios, 2 guineas; for 60 folios, 3 guineas; and 1 guinea additional for every additional 30 folios. That is the ordinary fee of the conveyancer for drawing a deed.

11,839. How much is a folio?—Seventy-two words.

11,840. Mr. Shand.—What are the fees for bills in Chancery?—They are on very much the same scale. The same scale would apply to pleadings and deeds.

11,841. If counsel spends a great deal of time in condensing the pleading, he gets a smaller fee than when the pleading is diffuse?—And it is the same with the solicitor. The shorter he is, the worse he is paid.

11,842. Do you find that a good system?—No; I think it is a very bad system. Our system of remuneration to solicitors is very bad.

11,843. Do you say the same with reference to the preparation of deeds?—Counsel prepares the deeds.

11,844. Or pleadings?—Well, it is 3 guineas for 60 folios, and the solicitor charges £3 for drawing it. I have known cases where conveyancing houses have lost their clients in the country by getting deeds drawn very shortly. A conveyancer told me the other day, 'I have lost the business of So-and-so; I have got into such a short way of drawing, that he tells me his client in the country will not employ me again.' The worse a man does his work in England, the better he is paid for it.

11,845. The Lord Justice-General.—Not in all departments?—At judges' chambers, for instance, if a man comes before the chief clerk fully prepared, one meeting will settle the business; but if he is badly prepared, he will have three or four meetings.

11,846. Mr. Gordon.—Is there any remedy you can suggest for that?—It is very difficult indeed to suggest a remedy. I cannot see any way to it at present.

11,847. Mr. Webster.—Is there any scale of fees for counsel either for debating cases or for a day's attendance at an examination of witnesses?—The fee for attending and examining witnesses is ordinarily 5 guineas for a day, because the counsel is obliged to give up everything else. That is the ordinary fee. And the fee paid to a special examiner is 5 guineas also; it is a day's work.

11,848. The Lord Justice-General.—What do you call a whole day?—From 10 or 11 till 4 o'clock, the hours of the sitting of the court.

11,849. Mr. Webster.—Is more than one counsel allowed to each party attending the examination of witnesses?—Only one counsel attending the examiner.

11,850. Lord Barcaple.—But not before the judge?—Two are allowed before the judge.

11,851. Mr. Clark.—What is the usual fee allowed for counsel attending a hearing for a day?—There is no fee for a day.

11,852. But in the usual run of cases?—There are very few cases in which the leading counsel get less than 10 guineas, and the junior 5 guineas. If there is any argument at all, that would be the lowest fee. Of course interlocutory or simple applications would be less.

11,853. But when the case comes to a serious point for hearing, the average fee would be about 10 guineas?—The average fee would be much more. I am speaking of the lowest fee.

11,854. The Lord Justice-General.—For that lowest fee of 10 guineas, what amount of work would be done generally;—I mean how many hours would be occupied if the case goes on?—If the case goes on, it would occupy the whole day.

11,855. Lord Barcaple.—Besides the time occupied in reading the papers?—Yes; and there is always a consultation fee of 2 guineas for the leader, and 1 guinea for the junior besides.

11,856. Mr. Shand.—Suppose there is to be evidence taken before the court, but not before an examiner?—The fee would be much more. Counsel would have to prepare for an examination.

11,857. The scale of fees you have mentioned only applies to the examiner?—Yes.

11,858. Mr. Webster.—Besides the fee to the counsel, does the party pay any fee to the counsel's clerk?—Yes; there is a fee to the counsel's clerk, and that is another growing evil. The fee to the counsel's clerk laid down by an Order of the judges in 1840 is: On every fee under 5 guineas, 2s. 6d.; 5 and under 10 guineas, 5s.; 10 and under 20 guineas, 10s.; 20 and under 30 guineas, 15s.; 30 and under 50 guineas, £1; for a fee of 50 guineas, £1, 5s.; and above 50 guineas, at the taxing master's discretion. That is the rule adopted in the taxing master's office.

11,859. Is the clerk paid for writing in addition to these fees?—He has no fee for writing.

11,860. The paper which counsel prepares is written by the counsel himself?—Yes; except the formal part, which is generally written by his clerk.

11,861. But no fee is paid to the clerk for that?—None whatever.

11,862. Lord Barcaple.—That is covered by the fee you have mentioned?—It is.

George Hume.

11,863. He derives no other emolument as clerk?—No.

11,864. The Lord Justice-General.—The clerk is not paid in any way by the counsel, is he?—I suppose he is obliged to pay his clerk, if he has not sufficient fees for that purpose.

11,865. Lord Barcaple.—Can you state what the fees of the Court of Chancery have ordinarily been each year lately?—There is a return made every year to Parliament, by the Accountant-General, of the state of the suitors' funds of the Court of Chancery, from which the amount of court fees received every year can be ascertained; and from which it appears that the total amount of the court fees paid by suitors in respect of proceedings in the Court of Chancery, for the years 1866, 1867, and 1868, were as follows:—

For the year 1866 . .	£91,558	8	0
„ 1867 . .	98,710	6	8
„ 1868 . .	98,063	19	9

11,866. The Lord Justice-General.—Do these returns show the amount of fees paid upon particular classes of suits?—No; they are lumped together.

11,867. Is there any means of ascertaining what is the amount of fees paid upon any particular class of suits on the average?—What sort of suits?

11,868. Suppose an administration suit?—Yes; an average of the court fees payable on these could be made out. In a simple administration suit by bill, where there was only one defendant, the court fees would probably be, on the higher scale, about £12; and, on the lower scale, about £7.

11,869. Could it be extended to other classes of suits, such as partnership accounting?—Court fees are nearly the same in all cases.

11,870. In applications for an injunction, would there be much difference there?—No. The court fees are paid on orders and summonses, filing bills, and other proceedings, which are very much alike in all suits.

11,871. They are paid, in short, upon the steps of proceeding?—Yes; certain steps.

11,872. Then they will vary in particular cases where the proceedings are multifarious?—Only in this way, that the interlocutory orders will be £1, and the decree £3.

11,873. If there are many interlocutory orders, there will be so many more fees?—Yes.

11,874. Mr. Gordon.—And there are two scales?—Yes; a higher and a lower scale.

11,875. Depending on the interest involved in the suit?—Depending on whether the value of the entire suit is under £1000 or not.

11,876. The Lord Justice-General.—In what shape could we best get information as to the average amount of court fees?—This information can only be obtained by taking any number of causes in which the costs have been taxed in the taxing master's office, and extracting the court fees. I have for this purpose selected, at haphazard, ten litigated causes, of which I have recently taxed the costs; and I find the aggregate amount of the taxed costs of the ten causes was £5546, 13s. 8d., and the aggregate amount of the court fees was £350, 9s. 9d.; which gives £35, 1s., or about 7 per cent. on the taxed costs, as the average amount of court fees for each cause.

11,877. Mr. Shand.—What is the ordinary expense of obtaining an interlocutory order?—That depends on whether it is by petition, or by motion, or by summons.

11,878. Suppose it is by motion?—£20 to £30.

11,879. Are counsel always instructed in such cases?—Always in motions and petitions, but not in summonses. In petitions, the expense will depend on the length of the petition. Summonses are much more simple.

11,880. Is a summons a mere formal proceeding?—It is the formal mode of proceeding in the judge's chambers.

11,881. And counsel have nothing to do with it?—No.

11,882. But in every step where counsel do appear in court, they are instructed?—Yes.

11,883. Mr. Webster.—In connection with the division of fees in agency cases, can you inform us whether the whole preparation of the cause is practically conducted by the agent in the country where there is one, and whether the fees that are divided are those practically for routine matters done by the London solicitor?—The preparation of the cause is practically conducted by the London agent; the only fees divided are the fees relating to the business done by the London agent.

11,884. What does the London agent do in agency cases?—In some cases he does all the substantial work of the cause itself; but generally he attends only to the routine business transacted in London,—such as attending and communicating with counsel, attending court, and all the proceedings in chambers on the accounts and inquiries, filing and procuring office copies of affidavits, preparing and arranging for the hearing of the cause, settling the minutes of the decree and orders; and he attends the Accountant-General on all the monetary matters in the cause; but he does not negotiate with parties in the country, or get up the evidence, which is generally prepared in the country.

11,885. Is the rate of fee allowed to him different in cases where there is an agent in the country, and where he is the sole solicitor?—The fees are the same in both cases. The only difference is in the term fee. Every term, 6s. 8d. is added for agency correspondence.

11,886. Each term the cause lasts?—Yes; the term fee is 15s. in an ordinary case, and there is an additional fee of 6s. 8d. in agency cases.

11,887. Lord Barcaple.—Does the country solicitor frequently come to London to hear the case?—No; that is seldom allowed in party and party costs, and not even against his own client, unless the client sanctioned his coming.

11,888. Mr. Webster.—Is the rule the same in common law cases as in Chancery cases with regard to that matter?—As to agency, very much the same.

11,889. Lord Barcaple.—Are the fees of counsel which are disallowed as excessive in taxing the account as between party and party, allowed in taxing the account as between agent and client?—Yes; in case the taxing master considers the solicitor exercised a fair discretion in paying the fee.

11,890. Mr. Morton.—Suppose you were taxing the London agent's account, would you allow him for correspondence with his client?—No.

11,891. Even in taxing between agent and client?—It would not be allowed.

11,892. Then it would be held to be covered by the one-half of the London agency?—Yes.

11,893. Would anything else be held to be covered by the one-half of the London agency?—No.

11,894. Mr. Gordon.—Is there any general fee allowed to the agent?—At the end of the bill there is usually a general charge for letters, postages, messages, etc., amounting to 2 guineas, or 5 guineas, or 10 guineas. That is to cover outlays not included in the bill. Charges for coach hire in London are not allowed.

11,895. Mr. Morton.—That is merely to cover outlays?—Only outlays; but we are pretty liberal in allowing that. There was a case the other day in which there was a very important examination of witnesses, and the solicitor in the country was the only person who had the facts in his head; I therefore allowed his journey to London, to be present at the examination. I allowed that against the client.

11,896. The Lord Justice-General.—But you would not allow it against the opposite party?—No.

11,897. Can you give us a notion of what proportion of an account is not recovered from the other party?—I had a case the other day as to waste occurring in mines: the principal surveyor's charge was £149; and though I was anxious to be as liberal as I could, I could only allow, as between party and party, £51. Another charge was 40 guineas, and I allowed only 10 guineas. The difference between these sums, of course, the client would have to pay.

11,898. Mr. Shand.—Was that a case in which men of great eminence were employed?—Yes.

11,899. Lord Barcaple. — Where witnesses are brought up from the country to be examined in court, or before the examiner, and they are not all examined, the party becoming satisfied that he has led a sufficient amount of evidence, are these witnesses who have not been examined universally disallowed against the opposite party?—Yes; between party and party we only allow the evidence actually taken, and entered in the decree or order.

11,900. Do you think that leads parties to examine too large a number of witnesses when they have brought them up?—No man would bring up witnesses unless he was pretty sure of using them, because he knows that he would not get the costs against the opposite party.

11,901. But he may wish ob majorem cautelam to be sure that he has sufficient evidence?—That will be allowed against his own client.

11,902. The Lord Justice-General.—Supposing that witnesses are brought up to prove a particular fact, and that an admission is made on the opposite side which renders their examination unnecessary?—If the admission was not made until it was too late to countermand the witnesses, the attendance of the witnesses would be allowed as between party and party; and where evidence has been in the course of preparation and the cause is settled by agreement, we allow the evidence which has been prepared. On further considering my answers to the two preceding questions, I beg to be permitted to add, that I think, in cases where the evidence in chief is to be taken vivâ voce at the hearing, the Court of Chancery would follow the rule in the courts of common law, and allow, as between party and party, the costs of witnesses bona fide brought up for examination in chief, although not actually examined, provided the court was satisfied that the solicitor exercised a reasonable judgment and precaution in being prepared with such witnesses. In Clark v Malpas, 31 Beavan 554, the Master of the Rolls allowed, as between party and party, the costs of bringing up witnesses to be cross-examined in court, although they were not actually cross-examined.

11,903. Mr. Shand.—Is the great bulk of the evidence in Chancery cases taken on affidavit?—The great bulk of it.

11,904. What proportion is taken on affidavit as compared with what is taken before examiners or viva voce before a judge?—I am quite unable to say.

11,905. Is it quite a fragmentary part of the evidence that is taken before the examiner or before the judge?—In causes where issue is joined, the parties may verify their case either by affidavit or oral evidence, or both. The oral evidence in chief is taken before the examiner, and the cross-examination thereon and on the affidavit evidence is taken in court, at the hearing of the cause. The common course now is to give notice of motion for decree, in which case the evidence in chief is taken on affidavit, and the deponents may be cross-examined by an examiner, but not in court.

11,906. Is that done far more frequently than having examinations before the examiner?—Yes.

11,907. Is that a saving of expense?—Affidavit evidence is the cheapest evidence you can have. The witness has not to come to London to be examined, and the affidavit is seldom so long as the deposition.

11,908. Mr. Webster.—Where a witness has made an affidavit, and a cross-examination takes place, do you find frequently that the truth has been fairly presented in the affidavit, or that it is only brought out in the cross-examination? — I think that generally affidavits are true so far as they go. The cross-examination of deponents who have made affidavits is comparatively infrequent, and I think generally the truth is fairly represented in affidavits. The objection is, that affidavits frequently state only so much of the truth as may be most favourable to the case of the party on whose behalf they are prepared; and in that case the whole truth can only be got at by cross-examination or counter affidavits.

11,909. Mr. Shand.—Is the affidavit made under the fear of cross-examination, and in the knowledge that the party may be so tested?—Yes; and I think the terror of cross-examination is very great.

George Hume.

11,910. Mr. Shand.—Is there not such a thing as filing cross-interrogatories? — A defendant may file interrogatories for the plaintiff to answer.

11,911. But for witnesses, is there no filing of cross-interrogatories?—No.

11,912. Mr. Gordon.—Are there many cases in which witnesses are examined in the Court of Chancery? Would you say that that is done in one-fourth of the number of cases?—Oh no.

11,913. I mean in court?—It is not encouraged by anybody.

11,914. Mr. Shand.—Suppose a party to insist on having a viva voce examination after an affidavit, and the witness subsequently adheres to his original affidavit, what would be done about the expense?—Any party summoning a witness to be examined vivâ voce must in the first instance pay the witness's expenses; and any party on whose behalf an affidavit has been filed is bound, if so required, to produce the deponent for cross-examination by the opposite party, and the party requiring such production must in the first instance pay the expenses thereof; but all such expenses are ultimately borne as the judge, on the hearing of the cause, shall direct.

11,915. Mr. Gordon.—Has it been found that witnesses were kept in London for some time before they could be examined?—I cannot answer that. No doubt there are cases where the cause is expected to be on, but is adjourned from time to time, and the witnesses are brought up and sent down again and again. That does happen sometimes.

DOCUMENTS PRODUCED AND REFERRED TO BY MR. HUME.

No. I.

THE RETURN of the CHIEF CLERKS of the Master of the Rolls, and Vice-Chancellors Sir Richard Torin Kindersley, Sir John Stuart, and Sir William Page Wood, to the Requisitions of Her Majesty's Commissioners for inquiring into the Superior Courts of Common Law and the Courts of Chancery in England and Ireland, contained in a letter from H. R. Vaughan Johnson, Esq., the Secretary to the Commissioners, dated the 12th day of November 1862.

The Master of the Rolls and each of the Vice-Chancellors has attached to his Court two Chief Clerks, and two junior clerks to each Chief Clerk, and also two assistant clerks; and the Master of the Rolls has also attached to his Court Mr. Buckley, as an additional clerk to assist the Chief Clerks, and one assistant clerk to such additional clerk.

Requisition I.—The nature and extent of the duties performed by the Chief Clerks and each officer under them.

As to the Chief Clerks.

1st.—With reference to interlocutory applications.

To hear and dispose of the following applications:—

1. For time to plead, answer, or demur.
2. For enlarging time for filing voluntary answers.
3. For leave to file interrogatories.
4. For leave to withdraw replication and amend bills and interrogatories; and for enlarging the time for amending bills and interrogatories under orders to amend.
5. For plaintiff to give security for costs.
6. For time to file affidavits in answer, or in reply, on motions for decrees.
7. For payment into Court of moneys admitted by defendants' answers.

George Hume.

8. For production and inspection of documents admitted by defendants' answers.
9. For production by Plaintiffs or Defendants of documents upon oath, under 15 and 16 Vict. c. 86, ss. 18, 20.
10. To consider the sufficiency of affidavits as to production of the documents.
11. For leave to serve bill and interrogatories out of the jurisdiction of the Court.
12. For the appointment of special examiners.
13. For the appointment of Commissioners to take the examination of married women.
14. For enlarging time for closing evidence.
15. For the oral examination and cross-examination of witnesses, under rule 11 of the General Order of 5th February 1861.
16. For enlarging the time prescribed for taking other proceedings in causes or matters.

2d.—With reference to applications originating in Chambers, and matters adjourned from Court into Chambers, before decree or order made.

1. To hear and dispose of applications for orders to administer the personal and real estate of deceased persons, under 15 and 16 Vict. c. 86, ss. 45 and 47.
2. To examine the evidence in support of applications for guardianship and maintenance of infants and persons of unsound mind, not found so by inquisition, and to attend the Judge thereon.
3. Similar duties on applications for sanction of the Judge to the marriage of wards of Court.
4. Similar duties on applications for placing infants out in trades or professions, and for leave for infants to quit the jurisdiction of the Court.
5. To approve settlements on marriages of wards, in accordance with proposals approved by the Judge; and to approve indentures of apprenticeship of wards, and to certify the approval of such settlements and indentures.
6. To examine the statements in petitions and the evidence adduced in support thereof, when adjourned by the Judge into Chambers for that purpose, and to report the result thereof.

3d.—With reference to proceedings in Chambers under decrees and orders.

First.—As to taking accounts and making inquiries under decrees and orders.

1. To determine what parties are entitled to attend on the several accounts and inquiries directed by decrees or orders, and who shall have the conduct of the proceedings.
2. To direct what persons, not being parties to the suit, are to be served with notice of decrees or orders, and in what cases service of such notice may be dispensed with.
3. To hear and dispose of applications for service of notice of decrees or orders upon infants, or persons of unsound mind.
4. To hear and dispose of applications for substituted service of decrees or orders, where the proceedings are pending in chambers.
5. To issue advertisements for creditors, encumbrancers, heirs at law, next of kin, and other classes of persons as to whom inquiries are directed by decrees or orders.
6. To approve and appoint persons to be receivers under orders directing such appointment, to fix the amount of security to be given by them, to ascertain the sufficiency of the proposed sureties, and to fix the times for bringing in the receivers' accounts, and for paying their balances into Court.
7. To settle and sign receivers' recognisances.
8. To approve and appoint persons as trustees under orders directing trustees to be appointed, and to approve the necessary deeds of conveyance and transfer.
9. To give directions as to the bringing in of accounts by executors, administrators, or other accounting parties, or as between partners, and to adjudicate upon all disputed or doubtful items of such accounts.
10. To investigate pedigrees under inquiries as to heirs at law, next of kin, or other classes of persons.
11. To adjudicate upon claims by creditors; also upon claims by encumbrancers, and, when required, to take the account of their claims, and settle their priorities.
12. To hear the several parties and their solicitors on the various accounts, inquiries, and directions contained in all decrees and orders brought into Chambers, and consider the evidence in support thereof.
13. To hear and dispose of applications for payment into Court of balances appearing on accounts brought in by executors and other accounting parties.
14. To revise and settle the certificates of result of proceedings under decrees or orders.

Second.—As to sales of estates by decrees or orders directed to be sold.

1. To refer to the conveyancing counsel the abstracts of title to the estates directed to be sold.
2. To appoint auctioneers to conduct sales, and fix their remuneration, and the mode, time, and place of sale.
3. To settle the particulars and conditions of sale.
4. To approve and sign the advertisements of sales.
5. To fix the amount of the reserved biddings.
6. To hear and dispose of applications for leave to parties to bid at sales, and as to the parties to have the conduct of sales.
7. To revise and settle certificates of the result of sales.
8. To approve of conditional contracts for sales by private contract.
9. To hear and dispose of applications to substitute purchasers.
10. To open the biddings.[1]
11. For payment in and investment of purchase moneys and deposits.
12. To pay off mortgagees or other encumbrancers out of purchase moneys.
13. For delivery of title deeds to purchasers or parties.
14. For compensation for misdescription, or on other grounds.
15. To discharge purchasers and for re-sale, etc.
16. To settle and approve conveyances, when directed by the decree or order.

Third.—As to matters connected with the management of property.

To hear and dispose of the following applications (that is to say):—

1. For getting in assets.
2. For suing or compounding for, or paying off debts and claims.
3. For defending suits or actions.
4. For granting or renewing leases.
5. For expenditure in repairing buildings and in draining land.
6. For cutting and selling timber.
7. For leave to trustees to employ an agent or bailiff, or to appoint a valuer.
8. For liberty to enfranchise copyholds.
9. For liberty for executors or trustees to concur in sale of mortgaged estates.

[1] Opening biddings are now abolished by 30 and 31 Vict. c. 48, s. 7.

10. To compel receivers to bring in accounts and pay balances.
11. To dispose of doubtful and disputed items in receivers' accounts.
12. For leave to put receivers' recognisances in suit.
13. For leave for executors of deceased receiver to pass his account and pay any balance due.
14. To discharge a receiver (not being an adverse application), and to vacate receiver's recognisance.

Fourth.—Miscellaneous proceedings under decrees and orders.

1. To summon parties and witnesses.
2. To administer oaths, and take affidavits and receive affirmations, and to take acknowledgments, other than acknowledgments of married women.
3. To examine parties and witnesses either upon interrogatories or viva voce.
4. To settle written interrogatories for the examination of parties.
5. To investigate the value and desirability of purchases under orders of the Court, and to refer the titles to property comprised in such purchases to the conveyancing counsel, and approve the conveyances thereof, and settle the certificates of approval of the titles and conveyances, and as to the parties to execute the conveyances and receive the purchase moneys.
6. To investigate the objections to titles under decrees or orders, and settle the certificates of the result of such investigations, and to approve the deeds of conveyance when required.
7. To prepare minutes of orders made in Chambers on further consideration in suits for administration of real and personal estate originating in Chambers.

4th.—With reference to proceedings under particular Acts of Parliament.

First. Under the Settled Estates Acts, 19 and 20 Vict. c. 120, and 21 and 22 Vict. c. 77.

1. To direct in what newspapers the notices required by the Acts are to be inserted.
2. To hear and dispose of applications for the appointment of guardians to infant petitioners or respondents, and for leave for such guardians to make or consent to applications under the Act, and for the appointment of examiners to take the examination of married women.
3. Similar duties on sales of settled estates when ordered by the Court, as on sales under decrees.
4. To settle leases of settled estates, when directed by the order.

Second.—Under the Infants' Marriage Settlement Act, 18 and 19 Vict. c. 43.

1. To examine the evidence produced in support of petition when adjourned into chambers.
2. To settle marriage settlements in conformity with the proposals approved of by the judge.
3. To settle minutes of orders approving settlements, for the Registrar.

Third.—Under the Legacy Duty Act, 36 Geo. 3, c. 52, s. 32, and the 35th Consolidated General Order, Rule 1.

To hear and dispose of applications for transfer and payment to legatee, where the fund does not exceed £300.

Fourth.—Under the Trustee Relief Acts, 10 and 11 Vict. c. 96, and 12 and 13 Vict. c. 74, and the 35th Consolidated General Order, Rule 1.

To hear and dispose of applications for transfer and payment out of Court, where the trust fund does not exceed £300.

Fifth.—Under the Trustee Act, 1850, and Trustee Extension Act, 15 and 16 Vict. c. 55, and the 35th Consolidated General Order, Rule 1.

1. To hear and dispose of applications for vesting orders in cases of sales or conveyances directed by the Court.
2. For the appointment of persons to convey land, or to execute deeds in the like cases.
3. To appoint new trustees in the like cases.

Sixth.—Under the Charitable Trusts Acts, 1853, 1855, and 1860.

1. To hear and dispose of applications to appoint trustees, to settle schemes, and to vest charity lands and funds in official trustees.
2. To settle schemes for the regulation and management of charities.
3. To settle minutes of orders approving schemes, and directing same to be carried into effect, for the Registrar.

Seventh.—Under 1 Will. 4, c. 65, ss. 12, 16, 17, and the 35th Consolidated General Order, Rule 1.

To investigate proposals for and settle leases of infants' estates.

Eighth.—Under the Defence Act, 1842, and sec. 23 of the Defence Act, 1860.

To hear and dispose of applications for the investment of, and for the payment of the dividends or interest on, or otherwise in relation to, moneys paid into the Bank of England in the name and with the privity of the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery, under the said Acts.

Ninth.—Under the Drainage Act, 8 and 9 Vict. c. 56, and Acts amending the same.

To proceed with applications for draining lands, and for charging the expense thereof on the inheritance of the said lands, under the provisions of the said Act, when referred to Chambers.

Tenth.—Under the Acts for winding up of Joint Stock Companies, namely, 11 and 12 Vict. c. 45 (1848); 12 and 13 Vict. c. 108 (1849); 19 and 20 Vict. c. 47 (1856); 20 and 21 Vict. cc. 14, 49, 78 (1857); 21 and 22 Vict. c. 60 (1858); and 25 and 26 Vict. c. 89 (1862).

1. To appoint interim or official managers or liquidators, and fix the amount of their recognisances, and approve of their sureties, and fix the time for passing their accounts.
2. To fix the remuneration of official managers or liquidators.
3. To examine and pass official managers' or liquidators' accounts.
4. To approve and sign advertisements for creditors to bring in their claims.
5. To appoint creditors' representatives.
6. To adjudicate upon debts and claims not allowed upon the affidavit of the official liquidators.
7. To revise and settle certificates of the result of adjudication upon debts and claims.
8. To settle the lists of contributories.
9. To settle certificates of the result of the settlement of lists of contributories.
10. To hear and dispose of applications to vary the list of contributories.
11. Similar duties on sales of property belonging to the Company, where sold with the approbation of the Judge, as on sales under decrees.
12. To make calls upon the contributories of the company.
13. To examine and sign directions to the Bank of England to open an account with the official manager or liquidator.
14. To examine all cheques upon the accounts at the Bank of England to be countersigned by the Judge, or by the Chief Clerk in case the proceedings are under the Companies Act, 1862.

George Hume.

15. To consider and allow compromises with the contributories.
16. To adjust the rights of contributories inter se.
17. To examine contributories and witnesses vivâ voce.

N.B.—No proceedings have at present been taken in Chambers under the Land Registry Act, 25 and 26 Vict. c. 53, or under the Declaration of Title Act (1862), 25 and 26 Vict. c. 67.[1] 5th.—With reference to incidental and miscellaneous proceedings.

To hear and dispose of the following applications (that is to say):—

1. For payment of income of real or personal property to parties interested therein, pending the proceedings in a cause.
2. For payment out of Court of legacies or funds carried to separate accounts.
3. For payment to any persons of the dividends or interest of any funds standing to the credit of any cause or matter to the separate account of such person; and
4. For stop orders, where assignor concurs.
5. To discharge stop orders.
6. To appoint a person to represent the estate of a deceased person, pending inquiries in Chambers.

Also—

7. To investigate the evidence on special applications to be disposed of by the Judge.
8. To attend upon the Judge in Chambers and in Court, when required by him.
9. To settle the minutes of orders made by the Judge in Chambers, and which are to be drawn up by the Registrar, including a short statement of the evidence read in support of the order.
10. To moderate bills of costs, and fix amounts to be allowed on applications by summons for guardian and maintenance, and on other special applications.

6th.—Meetings of Chief Clerks, pursuant to Rule 34 of the 1st Consolidated General Order.

The Chief Clerks meet on the first day of Michaelmas term, and the first day after the Christmas, Easter, and Whitsun vacations, to consider such orders, rules, or regulations as may appear to them calculated to expedite and facilitate the satisfactory transaction of the business of the suitors in the Judges' Chambers.

As to the Junior Clerks.

1. To examine all summonses required to be issued; to appoint a time for the return thereof, and to affix the seal of the Chambers thereto, and cancel the stamps.
2. To prepare from the Chief Clerk's notes a minute of every order made at Chambers, of the class drawn up by the Registrars, and a statement of the evidence read thereon, and obtain the Chief Clerk's signature thereto.
3. To draw up from the Chief Clerk's notes all orders made at Chambers of the class drawn up there, and obtain the Chief Clerk's signature thereto.
4. To make a short abstract of the accounts, inquiries, and directions contained in all decrees and orders brought into Chambers, for the use of the Chief Clerk.
5. To examine all advertisements required to be issued, and to obtain the Chief Clerk's signature thereto, and afterwards see that they have been inserted in the proper papers.
6. To examine the vouchers produced in support of the items of all accounts left in Chambers, and to reserve all doubtful or disputed items for the Chief Clerk to dispose thereof.
7. To settle the ordinary costs on passing receivers' accounts, and see that such accounts are duly entered and verified.
8. To examine and check computations of interest, apportionments, and other similar matters.
9. To examine schedules of creditors' and encumbrancers' claims brought in, and to compare the same with the Claim-book kept at the Judge's Chambers, and with the Chief Clerk's notes of the claims allowed and disallowed.
10. To examine other schedules and statements with documents adduced in support thereof, where specially directed by the Chief Clerk.
11. To prepare a minute for the conveyancing counsel of any matter referred to him on a sale, purchase, or otherwise.
12. To prepare requests to taxing masters to tax costs forming items in accounts being taken in Chambers.
13. To prepare requests to examiners to take the examination of parties or witnesses on proceedings pending in Chambers.
14. To examine the drafts of all recognisances, and the formal parts of the drafts of deeds, and particulars and conditions of sale, before the same are settled by the Chief Clerk.
15. To obtain the Chief Clerk's signature to a memorandum of approval of all recognisances and deeds settled in Chambers, on the engrossments thereof.
16. To prepare from the Chief Clerk's notes a minute of the biddings reserved on any sale, and the instructions to the person appointed to sell.
17. To prepare from the Chief Clerk's notes and instructions the drafts of the Chief Clerk's certificates, under decrees and orders, preparatory to the same being revised and settled by the Chief Clerk.
18. To examine the engrossments of such certificates, and obtain the signature of the Chief Clerk, and afterwards of the Judge thereto.
19. To file such certificates and the accounts or other documents therein referred to at the Report Office, and to transmit all recognisances to the Enrolment Office.
20. To collect, by means of stamps, all fees of Court payable in respect of proceedings in Chambers, to keep an account thereof, and to furnish annually an abstract of such account to the solicitor to the suitor's fund.
21. To attend upon the Chief Clerk at the commencement of business, daily, with such documents as require his examination and signature, and with reference to other matters that require his attention or direction.
22. To keep, with the assistance of the assistant clerks, books for the purpose of preparing the annual return of proceedings had in Chambers, required by the Secretary of State for the Home Department for insertion in the 'Judicial Statistics,' and to prepare such annual return, and to collect from the official managers and liquidators returns of proceedings in winding-up matters, and to transmit all returns to the said Secretary of State.
23. To attend to and answer applications by parties for information as to the state of any proceeding or matter in which they may be interested.
24. To keep a general supervision over the state and progress of all matters pending in Chambers; and, under the directions of the Chief Clerk, to apply to the solicitors concerned for explanation as to matters that have not been duly prosecuted.

25. And generally to assist the Chief Clerks in any way they may require in the discharge of their duties.

As to the Assistant Clerks.

1. To enter in 'The Summons and Appointment Book' a minute of the date on which every summons is issued or appointment made; the name of the cause or matter, and by what party, and, shortly, for what purpose such summons or appointment is obtained, and at what time such summons is returnable, and for what time such appointment is made.
2. To enter in the 'Register of Proceedings' a minute of every proceeding in Chambers in each cause or matter, consecutively and in chronological order, with a short statement, extracted from the Chief Clerk's notes, of the result of the proceedings at every hearing.
3. To receive and register all accounts, statements, and other documents directed to be brought into Chambers.
4. To keep an alphabetical index of all causes and matters disposed of or pending in Chambers, and of the place of deposit of the papers therein, and a like index of the name of every deceased person whose estate is or has been the subject-matter of proceedings in Chambers.
5. To keep diaries of all appointments, and various other books required in the transaction of Chamber business.
6. To prepare lists of matters appointed for each day, and to see that the same are duly affixed in the Chambers and outside the doors thereof.
7. To furnish the Chief Clerk with a copy of such list, and to select and arrange such papers as he may require during the day.
8. To prepare lists of cases adjourned for hearing before the Judge.
9. To prepare from the Chief Clerk's notes a certificate for the taxing master of the fees and allowances to solicitors for attendances in Chambers in any cause or matter, and get same signed by the Chief Clerk.
10. To put away and keep in proper order for immediate reference, all papers relating to proceedings in Chambers.
11. To fair copy the Chief Clerk's notes and other papers, when required.
12. To assist the junior clerks in keeping the books for the purpose of preparing the annual return required by the Secretary of State.
13. And generally to assist in the discharge of the business of the Chambers.

General Note.

The duties of the Chief Clerks are performed under the immediate superintendence of the Judge, with whom the Chief Clerks communicate upon all questions of difficulty.

The business transacted by the Chief Clerks and by the junior and assistant clerks varies in the respective Chambers of the Master of the Rolls and Vice-Chancellors, and the above is the best general return the Chief Clerks are able to make, without specifying in minute detail the variations in the performance of such duties in the different Chambers.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD COLONSAY IN THE CHAIR.

The Hon. Baron Bramwell.

THE HON. BARON BRAMWELL, examined.

11,916. The Chairman.—The Commissioners are desirous of having some information as to the system of procedure in the English courts, with a view to their present inquiry with regard to the Scotch courts. You are aware, I suppose, that in our courts there is no separation of law and equity. The cases are almost all considered, in the first instance, by a single judge, under whose eye the record is prepared, and his judgment is subject to review by one of the chambers or divisions of the court, consisting of four judges. Some causes, which turn upon facts, are tried by juries, but in others the evidence is taken before a single judge, and his judgment is reviewable. Now, have you in your courts a system of taking evidence before a single judge without a jury?—Our cases are tried by jury, but they may be tried before a single judge if the parties give their consent in writing.

11,917. But generally you try the cases by jury?—Yes. I should say there is not one case in a hundred that is tried by a judge without a jury; I mean where the viva voce evidence of witnesses is given.

11,918. Is the verdict generally 'in favour of the plaintiff' or 'in favour of the defendant,' or do you require the jury to pronounce upon certain issues, or special matters that you put to them?—Both practices prevail. I should say the more common course is to state to the jury what are the questions which they have to consider, and to tell them to say whether they find for the plaintiff or the defendant. But there are very frequently cases in which it is desirable that they should answer particular questions, either with reference to the actual disposal of the issues at the time, or with reference to the court adjudicating upon the matter afterwards. For instance, take a case in which an issue is raised for a jury, which involves several distinct matters. Suppose an action on a bill of exchange, the defence being that the defendant did not accept it, there might be several questions involved. It might be said that the alleged acceptance was by an alleged partner of the defendant, and upon that the defendant might make two propositions. He might say, first of all, he never was my partner; or he might say, in fact, that is not his handwriting, even if he was; and he might say, thirdly, moreover, if he did accept it, he did not accept it in respect of a partnership debt, as was known to the plaintiff when he drew the bill. All these would be involved in the question whether the defendant accepted the bill of exchange; and there might be considerations inducing the judge to tell the jury to find for the plaintiff or the defendant, or to find whether it was the handwriting of the party—whether there was a partnership, and whether it was for a partnership debt. In some cases, and indeed very frequently, the jury are asked to answer specific questions in that way. It is a practice which varies a good deal, according to the disposition of different judges.

11,919. Where the question is sought to be brought under review, does the judge who tried the case report to the court the different points that have been raised?—Yes, he would report the findings. If he had left it generally to the jury, he would say, I told the jury, that if they thought there was a partnership subsisting, and that this was the handwriting of a partner, and that either it was not given for a private debt, or if it was, that the plaintiff was not affected by notice of it, they ought to find for the plaintiff; or I told them to answer the following questions, and they answered them in such and such a way, and thereupon the verdict was entered up for the plaintiff or the defendant, as the case might be; in short, he would report precisely what took place.

11,920. Is the evidence taken down by the judge, or is it taken in shorthand?—The judge takes the note himself.

11,921. And is that the only record that can be appealed to?—That is the authoritative record. Any other can be objected to, but it is continually permitted; for instance, a shorthand writer's notes. For my own part, when there is a shorthand writer's note that contradicts mine, I rather rebel against its being listened to; but if it has something in it which mine has not, I think it possible that he may have taken down something which I did not hear, or forgot to take down, and I make no objection to its being stated. If there were a general concurrence of the counsel on both sides, and the shorthand writer's note also showed, that I had got down something wrong, I suppose I would say I was wrong; but I am not aware that that has happened. I have known the late Chief Baron peremptorily refuse to listen to a shorthand writer's note.

11,922. Is the matter brought under the consideration of the court by a bill of exceptions to the judge's charge, or is it generally done by a motion for a new trial?—The bill of exceptions is a very rare proceeding indeed, and it is never brought before the court in which the record originally was. For instance, in a cause tried in the metropolis, if a bill of exceptions is tendered to a judge of the Court of Exchequer, it would inevitably go before the Court of Exchequer Chamber, consisting of the judges of the Queen's Bench and Common Pleas. If it was tried at nisi prius in the country, it might be a record in Exchequer, but tried by a Common Pleas judge, and it would go before the Common Pleas and Queen's Bench, and the judge who tried it would also sit; but I don't suppose there are four bills of exceptions in a year. The common way of objecting to that which has been done at nisi prius is to apply to the court for a new trial; or where leave has been reserved to correct any error that may have been made in entering the verdict, by the party for the time decided against applying for leave to enter the verdict differently.

11,923. And that would be so, whether the ground of challenge was wrong law laid down, or evidence wrongly admitted or wrongly rejected?—Yes. The motion for a new trial or to enter a verdict may be upon the ground that the law laid down was wrong; or a new trial may be asked on the ground that improper evidence was admitted; and where, if that evidence had not been admitted, there would really be no evidence, you may get leave to enter a verdict or a nonsuit. But, generally speaking, in the case of an improper admission of evidence, as there is always, or at least generally, some other evidence, you cannot enter a verdict; because the party in whose favour the improper admission of evidence had taken place would say, No, I cannot consent to your entering a verdict against me, because even though that evidence had been rejected, there was enough for the jury to find a verdict for me.

11,924. The court deal with that question?—Yes; then they would have to grant a new trial. I remember a case in which I was counsel—Lady Wenman's case—in which the evidence was very strong against us, but the other side pertinaciously would give a little bit of bad evidence in addition. We applied for a new trial; and the court were compelled to admit that that evidence had been improperly received, but they could not take upon themselves to say that even without it the plaintiff ought to have recovered, and the result was that a new trial was granted.

11,925. Have the court the power to say that the evidence so improperly received is wholly immaterial, and that therefore the verdict ought not to be disturbed?—That can only be done by consent. Suppose a plaintiff tenders a piece of evidence, and the defendant objects to it as not admissible, the judge may say, 'It is very doubtful, but will you agree that I shall receive it? and if the verdict goes against you, and the court shall consider that it was not admissible, but still that the verdict ought to have been for the plaintiff, it shall so stand.' If the opposing party chooses to agree to that, it may be done; but that is not a very common occurrence, where the jury are to express an opinion on the evidence, for the objecting counsel would naturally say, 'I will not agree to that, because I cannot tell how far the jury may be influenced by it;' but where it is in truth a matter of law for the determination of the judge at the trial, or of the court afterwards, although in form an issue for the jury, I think such agreements as that are not very uncommon.

11,926. Of course, if evidence is improperly rejected, one cannot tell what effect it might have had?—No; nor where it is improperly admitted. But I may mention that I have known persons of great eminence who held the opinion, and I confess it is my own opinion, that the court should not be bound hand and foot to grant a new trial where they find that an idle piece of evidence has been improperly admitted, and that without it the verdict ought to have been the same as it was. I think the court should have a discretion in that matter.

11,927. Mr. Justice Willes.—You are aware that at the Common Law Commission it was considered whether we should not adopt the rule which prevails in Scotland—and which, I understand, is limited to documentary evidence—that the wrong admission of a document which the court is satisfied had no effect on the verdict shall not be prejudicial to the trial?—Yes. Perhaps I might state that I imagine that originally the bill of exceptions was the proper remedy for a mistake on the part of a judge at nisi prius, or the judge at the trial. Then the court of appeal had nothing but a written record before them, and they could scarcely exercise a discretion perhaps. It has always been said that what the court of appeal must do on a bill of exceptions, the court before whom the motion is made must do also, otherwise you would drive people to bills of exception. I think that is the origin of the court considering that they had no discretion where an error had been committed in the reception or rejection of evidence.

11,928. The Chairman.—What are the pleadings upon which the case goes before a jury?—The first proceeding is the writ of summons. That is a call on the defendant to give him an opportunity of appearing and making his defence. Then there is a declaration by the plaintiff, which is supposed to be a narrative of the cause of action. Next we have the pleas which constitute the defence. If the plaintiff has any new matter to state in consequence of these pleas, he replies. I may mention to you a case which I drew when I was a pupil of Sir F. Kelly, though I did not draw it as his pupil. The plaintiff complained that the defendant had assaulted him; the defendant pleaded that the plaintiff assaulted him first; the plaintiff replied that it was in defence of certain chattels of his own which the defendant was improperly removing; the defendant rejoined that these chattels were affixed to the house of him, the defendant; the plaintiff surrejoined that the shop of the house had been let by the defendant to him, the plaintiff, and that the goods were on the demised premises; the defendant's rebutter was a denial that they were on the demised premises; the plaintiff's sur-rebutter denied that, and on that issue they went to trial.

11,929. Is there a certain time allowed for each of these statements?—Yes; they are made alternately. First, the plaintiff makes his complaint. Eight days are allowed for the defendant to plead. I think the plaintiff, if called on, must reply in four, and I think the defender must rejoin in four.

11,930. Mr. Clark.—In the case you have mentioned, did each of the statements form separate issues?—That might be so now; but at the time I am speaking of, each pleading admitted the truth of the antecedent pleading, but said, in our language, 'I confess and avoid.' The defendant says, I confess I beat you, but you beat me first; the plaintiff says, I confess I beat you first, but you were running away with my chattels; and so on. At that time a plaintiff might put his complaint in a variety of ways, and the defendant might plead double, but he could neither reply, nor rejoin, nor rebut, nor sur-rebut double; but, under the auspices of the Common Law Commissioners, the privilege of making a double pleading was extended to all pleadings; and now the defendant might have said, I did not beat you at all, and, moreover, you beat me first; and the plaintiff might have said, I did not beat you first, and, moreover, you were taking away my chattels; and so on.

11,931. The Chairman.—There is no issue framed out of these pleadings before the case goes to trial?—They are self-producing. According to the true rule of pleading, they must ultimately come to an affirmative and negative. Ultimately, if one man keeps confessing the other's case, and avoiding, they must come to an issue.

11,932. But there is no paper in the cause which is the essence extracted out of the pleadings, and forming the issue which the jury is to try?—Our theory is, that they extract their own issue, as it were. It is not the case that our pleadings do evolve precise issues; that is, on account of the pleading rule, which permits a man not to state the absolute facts of the case, but the legal implications from them,—suppose a man brings an action against me on a bill of exchange, which he says I accepted: he means it was accepted by a man who was my partner, and that it is in that man's handwriting; so that though in one sense the precise issue is evolved, in another sense it is not evolved in a great many cases.

11,933. In the case which you have mentioned as to the assault, how would the jury deal with it? Would they find upon the separate matters, or would they simply find for the plaintiff or for the defendant?—The case I mention was tried by Chief Justice Tindal, and he said, Gentlemen, a long record makes a short issue: the question you have to consider is, whether these things were on that part of the premises which had been demised to the plaintiff. He did not say, You have to consider whether the plaintiff beat the defendant; but what you have to consider is, Were these chattels on that part of the premises demised to the plaintiff?

11,934. Mr. Shand.—Suppose there had been double pleading in that case?—If there had been a denial that he beat the plaintiff at all, he would have told the jury, You have to say first, whether the plaintiff assaulted the defendant: if you determine that one way, then you will determine whose the chattels were; if you find the one for the defendant and the other for the plaintiff, you must say so, that the verdict may be entered properly; but you will find no damages due to the plaintiff.

11,935. Does that system still prevail?—That system still prevails; but whereas formerly the power of pleading double stopped at that plea, it now goes on as long as an issue is not evolved between the parties.

11,936. Is it an answer to a general issue, or an answer to each of the inquiries?—I must give rather a long answer to that, I am afraid. The party against whom issues are found has to pay the costs of them, so that it is always, or at least very frequently, a relevant inquiry what issues are particularly found, as well as whether there is a general verdict for the plaintiff or defendant. For instance, in an action upon a bill of exchange there may be two pleas: 1st, I paid the bill; and next, I have a set-off against it. The judge says to the jury, Gentlemen, you have to consider two questions: 1st, Was the bill paid? next, Was there a set-off? If you find either of these for the defendant, he is entitled to your verdict; if you find both for the plaintiff, the plaintiff is entitled to your verdict, and you will say what damages you give. Then the counsel might get up and say, Will your Lordship ask the jury to say, if they find for the defendant, whether they find both pleas proved, or only one? He might ask that, in order that if one plea were found in favour of the defendant, the plaintiff might get the costs occasioned by the improper pleading of the other plea, which was affirmed in his favour.

11,937. In that case there would be a special verdict?—Not what we call a special verdict. That has a technical meaning with us. It would be what I would call a particularized verdict.

11,938. Mr. Clark.—In the case which your Lordship has supposed, of a bill of exchange involving so many issues, does the defendant get any notice of the particular point which the plaintiff intends to raise when he goes to trial?—None.

11,939. Nor vice versa?—Nor vice versa.

11,940. So that it may be any case such as will raise the legal implication, however different the facts may be?—Precisely. I cannot better express it.

11,941. Mr. Shand.—Do you think that a satisfactory system of pleading?—Most unsatisfactory.

11,942. In what respect?—My opinion is, that pleadings ought to state the absolute facts; and the Judicature Commission have so recommended. That has always been my opinion strongly; but the difficulty suggested is, that you will have pleadings as long as a bill in Chancery. That would be wrong, no doubt; and they ought not to be so. What I have always hoped is, that they might be no longer than the proceedings in the Admiralty or Divorce Court, where they are very concise. Some pleadings are quite free from any objections of that sort,—for instance, an action on a covenant in a lease: the plaintiff may say, A. B. granted a lease to the defendant, and assigned the reversion to C. D., and C. D. assigned it to me: I complain that the defendant did not pay the rent due on such a quarter-day. Nothing can be more specific than that: all the facts are stated; but there are very few cases that you can put in pleading in which there may not be some very different thing involved from that which is commonly supposed. In the well-known case of Marston v. Allen, the defendant denied that he indorsed a bill: the bill was produced bearing his handwriting; he said, That is very true, but 'indorse' in point of law means not only to write your name, but hand it over to another, with intent to pass the property; I gave it to a rogue to get it discounted; he handed it to you, who knew he was a rogue, and you gave no value for it: therefore you cannot rely on your being the bona fide holder of a negotiable instrument de facto made by me.

11,943. Mr. Clark.—Could he, under such a plea, have raised this: 'I was drunk when I indorsed it?'—Speaking off-hand, I should say not.

11,944. Or that the plaintiff by fraud induced him to indorse it?—No, I think not. In all these cases he would have to avoid his act by showing that he was wrongly made to do it.

11,945. Mr. Shand.—Under the system of pleading which you have suggested, of stating the facts distinctly, but shortly, would you contemplate that the issue should be raised by the statement, or that the statement should itself form the issue for the jury?—That is a question which we considered at the Judicature Commission. I don't think you could very well lay down any absolute rule. There might be some statements and answers so long that there would be some difficulty in saying that anybody could tell the precise controversy; and it might be desirable in a case of that sort that issues should be specially stated. I think we made a recommendation to that effect; but I am not quite sure.

11,946. Mr. Gordon.—Would there not be an advantage in having such special questions put in cases where there are several points left for the determination of the jury? Suppose the case involved three points, and in respect of one of which the plaintiff would be entitled to a verdict, and four of the jury took one view and eight the other view on one of these points, and there was on all the points a majority against the plaintiff, who obtained the general verdict in respect of the ultimate concurrence of the twelve in a general verdict for the plaintiff upon opposite grounds, would it not be an advantage to put the special questions to the jury there?—I think that is a very difficult thing. I have often thought of it. Take the case of four judges, and four points for the plaintiff. Three of the judges say, We think he is wrong on point A; the other says, But I think he is right; then two of the first three and the dissenting fourth say, We think he is wrong on point B, but No.

1 of the first three says, I think he is right; and so on with the other points: the result is, that you will have four judges pronouncing judgment in favour of the plaintiff, though there are three to one against every proposition. I think that is a very recondite question. I don't know whether one ought to settle it according to any metaphysical consideration, or according to the doctrine of chance.

11,947. But in regard to separate questions of fact, would there not be an advantage in getting separate answers from the jury?—It may very well happen that there are three facts brought forward, each of which, if true, would prove the plaintiff's case; and four jurymen might think one fact proved, and four another, and four the third, and there might be eight against each fact. I don't know at all that the plaintiff ought not to recover in that case. I don't know but what the probabilities are that he is right.

11,948. Mr. Shand.—Reverting to the pleadings, does it come to this in your view, that if the points of fact raised are simple, the record itself might go to the jury without a separate question, but that if the facts are involved and refer to numerous points, questions should be adjusted in the shape of issues?—I should say generally, from knowing what takes place in common law courts, that you might present the case to the juries without any particular agreement on the issues beforehand, because there is the written statement of the plaintiff and of the defendant; and although the pleaders with much ingenuity cram into both of them everything that could be serviceable, when the counsel have examined the evidence, they open their case, and what the jury decide upon is the case opened to them, and not what is on the record. I think that is an elimination of the true issues by word of mouth by the counsel at the time, and I have never known any difficulty from it either as judge or as counsel. I don't know how many issues I have counted as having been raised in one case. For instance, there are half a dozen pleas, and issues are taken on each; then there are three replications to each plea,—that is, eighteen replications,—and an issue is taken on every one of them; to a dozen of these there are two rejoinders, which make twenty-four rejoinders. Now, you would say that that would cause inextricable confusion; and so it might; but the counsel in addressing the jury say, 'Gentlemen, you have heard a great many pleadings which you will not understand, but the question in the case is so and so.'

11,949. Mr. Clark.—In the trial of the 'Alexandra,' there were 98 issues or counts: was that in the least necessary?—That is a very difficult question to answer. In our system of pleading, no alternative pleading is allowed. For instance, you never can say to a man, 'I found my case against you on this, that you did so and so, or if you did not, you did so and so.' You must have two counts, and first of all say, 'You did so and so;' and then in another count, you must say, 'You did so and so.' In the 'Alexandra' case, instead of its being allowed to the Crown to say, 'We charge against the defendants that they did this, that, or the other, and we say that is an infringement of such and such a section of the Foreign Enlistment Act,' they were obliged to say, 'You wrongfully did this, and wrongfully did the other,' taking the particular words out of the Act, and making each particular word a separate offence, though in point of fact only one thing was done.

11,950. Mr. Webster.—Has the defendant to come prepared to meet each of the 98 alternatives?—Yes; but he is always entitled to particulars.

11,951. But in the 'Alexandra' case, would he have got any further particulars under any form, than that he was charged with these 98 offences?—He would, I have no doubt, if he had applied for them; which I think is a condemnation of the pleading system, because it never can be a right system in which you must say, 'I want to know what this means in plain language.' But he applies for particulars; and the particulars given are, 'I say that on or about such a date you did such a thing.'

11,952. Mr. Clark.—With regard to the issues in the 'Alexandra' case, have the Judicature Commission of England recommended anything which would lead to a different system of pleading in such a case?—I think so. I hope our recommendation is that there should be a short narrative of the facts.

11,953. A short and simple narrative of the facts which are alleged to be a contravention of the Act?—Yes.

11,954. Mr. Shand.—In the case where a number of points go to the jury in the pleadings, are the verdicts most commonly general verdicts, or particularized verdicts?—It is a general verdict for the plaintiff; and what takes place is this: If it is important afterwards to settle the issues, the counsel say to the judge, 'This is a verdict for the plaintiff, but he is not to have a verdict on such and such a count;' and then he says, 'I pleaded a release, and the jury have found against me; but there is a replication of fraud, and he is not to have a verdict on that.' The judge says, 'Certainly not.'

11,955. Is that so minuted?—In the records of the court, it is entered as if the jury had found according to the direction of the judge; but that is with a view to costs.

11,956. Mr. Gordon.—The judges seem to exercise considerable control over the verdicts; they put a verdict in shape although it has been received from the jury as a general verdict?—Quite so. That is a great deal owing to the good-fellowship that there is, if I may so say, between the judges and the bar, because if counsel chose to say, 'The jury found a verdict for the defendant, but your Lordship has not asked them upon such an issue,' the judge would say, 'I shall take on myself to do that,' and the counsel might say, 'I shan't allow that;' or the judge might say, 'There is no evidence on such a point.' But it is practically done without any objection, and it is no real exercise of power. Suppose a man brings an action on a bill of exchange, and the defendant says, 'I did not accept the bill, and moreover I have paid it;' at the trial it is obvious that the only question is, whether he has paid the bill; he is liable on his acceptance, no doubt, and nobody says a word about that. The counsel for the plaintiff don't open it, and the judge says to the jury, 'The question is, whether you believe that this bill was paid.' The jury find for the defendant, and the counsel for the plaintiff says, 'We must have the first issue entered for us;' the counsel for the defendant says, 'Of course you must,' and that is done.

11,957. Mr. Clark.—In point of fact, the verdict exhausts all the issues that are raised?—The verdict must exhaust all the issues that are raised, because if there is no evidence on any issue, the judge ought so to direct the jury; and if there is, the jury ought so to decide it.

11,958. Mr. Gordon.—If there is no evidence, is it a case for non-suit?—Properly speaking, a judge has no power to non-suit a party. All he can do is to direct the jury to find a verdict for the defendant; but in point of fact, a plaintiff is entitled to be present when the jury give their verdict; and if he withdraws, then he is non-suited, because the jury give no verdict. Therefore, when a judge says, 'I will non-suit you,' that means, 'I will direct the jury to find a verdict against you, unless you choose to pretend to leave the court, and so be non-suited.'

11,959. What is the difference to the plaintiff?—The difference to the plaintiff is, that if he is non-suited, he may bring a fresh action; and in the other case, estoppel takes place. A defendant of course never can be non-suited.

11,960. Mr. Webster.—Has the defendant not a right to insist on the jury answering the issue, even on points where no evidence has been led; or has the plaintiff the right to withdraw these?—A plaintiff cannot be partially non-suited. He must be non-suited altogether, or not at all. Each party has a right to call on the jury to return a verdict upon every issue; but the judge may say to them, 'On such and such issues you are bound in point of law to return a verdict in such a way, because there is no evidence.'

11,961. Mr. Clark.—Could not the plaintiff insist on trying the question over and over again by electing to be non-suited?—He can.

11,962. Has the defendant no power to prevent that?—I rather think there is a proceeding in the Court of Equity, what they call a bill of peace, to stop a man from doing that.

11,963. The Chairman.—But a court of law has no power?—A court of law has no power; but it has this sort of power, that if he don't pay his costs, and vexatiously brings a second action, they may stop him.

11,964. Mr. Gordon.—Then I understand that bills of exception are very seldom resorted to?—Very seldom.

11,965. There is great difficulty in stating objections to a judge's charge in the hurried way in which jury trials are conducted?—Yes; and it is an inelastic proceeding; and you have to put it all down on paper.

11,966. The Lord Justice-General.—You cannot get beyond the record of the bill of exceptions in discussing a point of law?—Not at all. In the case of a bill of exceptions, you have nothing but the record at nisi prius; that is to say, the pleadings and the evidence given at the trial, the direction of the judge, and the exception taken to it.

11,967. In the case of a motion for a new trial upon a misdirection, is there any appeal against the judgment of the court refusing or granting the new trial?—There is, in certain cases. There was not until the year 1854; and then by virtue of the Common Law Procedure Act, in consequence of the commission of which my brother Willes and myself were members, an appeal was given either in cases where the question had been reserved by the judge, or, though it had not been reserved, in cases where there was a difference of opinion in the court; but still at this moment, when there is no leave reserved, and where there is no difference of opinion, there is no appeal. That power of appeal went a great way towards abolishing bills of exception.

11,968. Mr. Clark.—Does the judge in all cases keep a note of his direction at the trial?—Well, I cannot say that every judge does. I very rarely do. I believe I trust to my memory; but when there is anything of any difficulty, and I am afraid that I may forget the precise terms I use, I write it down that I told the jury, 'If you are of opinion, so and so,' stating it as briefly as I can.

11,969. But does the judge who tried the case always form a member of the court that disposes of the rule for a new trial?—No; he need not ever do so. In London, at Westminster and at Guildhall, the motions for new trials are always made before the court of which he is a member; but where the trials have taken place at the assizes, he may or may not be a member of the court in which the record is.

11,970. And if he is not, and the question is raised whether the direction is good in law, how is the court informed of his direction?—The counsel tell them.

11,971. But if the counsel dispute as to what the direction was?—Then they appeal to the judge as to what he said.

11,972. What record is before the court when the counsel make the motion for a new trial?—None when the motion is originally made. When the rule nisi is applied for, there is no record. The counsel says, 'In the case of So-and-so, tried at the assizes, and in which there was a verdict for the plaintiff, I crave, on behalf of the defendant, to move to set aside the verdict, and that a new trial shall be granted on the ground of misdirection: it was an action for dismissing the plaintiff, and it appeared that a month afterwards they found out their mistake, and offered to take him back to his situation, and he said he would not go: the judge said, You cannot recover after that offer.' There is nothing but the counsel's statement; he states the question and the pleadings, and what he holds to be the misdirection. I must say it is loose; but it works well, and I find no fault with it.

11,973. Suppose you grant a rule to show cause?—Then we write to the judge for his notes.

11,974. If his Lordship has not kept a note of his direction, what takes place?—We do not ask notes of his direction. We ask him for any note he has got, and perhaps he will send us a note of the evidence only, or he may go on to say, 'I told the jury so and so.' If counsel agree as to the direction, we then discuss whether it was a right one; but if they don't agree, we appeal to the judge.

11,975. Mr. Shand.—And what he says is accepted as final?—Yes.

11,976. Mr. Clark.—Then the judge is not under any obligation to keep a note?—Not of his direction.

11,977. The counsel could not say to him, 'You will be good enough to keep a note?'—I don't know that counsel ever say to the judge, 'I wish you to take a note of the direction.' I rather think they prefer not to awaken his attention to his going wrong, but take a careful note themselves; but if they take an objection to evidence, they ask him to take a note of it.

11,978. Do the counsel ask for directions from the judge?—Occasionally. They get up and say, 'Would your Lordship be good enough to say so and so to the jury?' or, 'You have not explained what such a witness has said.'

11,979. At the end of the charge, does the counsel ever ask the judge to give a particular direction in point of law?—It is quite open to them to do that, and they do it whenever there is occasion for it. It is not always done; because the counsel on both sides having presented their views, the judge knows what points of law are relied on, and very likely says that he thinks there is nothing in such and such a point. The counsel then says, 'I hope your Lordship will take a note that I have made it;' or perhaps the counsel may say, 'Would your Lordship ask the jury so and so?'

11,980. On the motion for a new trial, can the counsel move to set aside the verdict on the ground that the direction is imperfect as well as erroneous?—Oh yes; that is to say, he can object that the judge did not leave the right question to the jury.

11,981. But can he make that motion without having brought the matter under the notice of the judge at the trial?—It is not very easy to give a direct answer to that. He would be told, 'If you had such a point as that to make, why did you not make it at the trial? because, if you had, the opposite side might have called a witness to prove so and so;' and where it appears that the party may have been lying in wait for a misdirection, he would probably take very little by his motion. But if the objection he took was one that the judge ought to have been aware of, and it was an incurable objection, and it was not uncandid to take it, it is very likely that the rule would be granted.

11,982. Mr. Shand.—Then it is one ground of a new trial that a direction has been refused which the party thought essential to the justice of his case?—It is not a very frequent occurrence.

11,983. And you do not find it necessary to present a bill of exceptions, but it is done under the ordinary form of a motion for a new trial?—Yes.

11,984. Mr Gordon.—If the court is unanimous, there is no appeal?—There is no appeal unless the point has been reserved.

11,985. Mr. Shand.—You said that the judge's notes were transmitted when asked: are they simply in manuscript?—They are always copied out by his clerk.

11,986. Is there ever such a thing as the printing of these notes?—No. We only send one copy made by our clerks, and it is read by one of the judges when the case is called on.

11,987.—Is it the passages which are thought important that are read?—The whole of the evidence is read as a rule; but perhaps at a particular passage the counsel may say, 'You need not read about that.'

11,988. Does it not occupy a long time if you have to read the notes of a whole day's trial?—No; the notes are generally very short.

11,989. Mr. Clark.—How long would it take to read the notes in the case of Saurin v Starr?—I should not at all wonder if they could all be read in a couple of hours.

11,990. Mr. Shand.—And a good deal is omitted by arrangement?—Supposing it is an action against a railway company for negligence, and half a dozen doctors are called to prove that the party sustained great damage, and the defendant denies that there was negligence, directly the judge comes to the evidence of the medical men, the counsel say, 'You need not read that,' and in that way time is saved. I don't remember any case which it took an hour to read.

11,991. Mr. Webster.—In point of fact, the court get over a great many cases of that kind in a single day—hearing a motion or a new trial?—No; of discussions when rules are granted, I should say that three or four a day would be a fair average, speaking of my own court.

11,992. Mr. Shand.—You may grant a good many rules in one day?—Oh yes; because there you have an ex parte statement, and all you have to consider is, whether a doubt is made out to justify you in having it discussed.

11,993.—Suppose the ground of objection to be that the verdict is contrary to evidence, is it an absolute rule that where the judge who tried the case is satisfied with the verdict, the verdict shall stand?—I say no; but I have heard a very distinguished person say the contrary, though I always thought he was very considerably influenced by a desire to find a certain road to a decision. But I think it is a very objectionable rule; and I think it is absurd, because if it were so, you had better have the rule for a new trial granted or refused by the judge at the time he hears it. It would be a farce to go through the form of moving for a new trial if it is to be disposed of according to the opinion of the judge who tried the case. But there is no doubt that the opinion of the judge at the trial as to whether the verdict was against evidence or not, generally receives the very greatest weight, and indeed is almost decisive. There are some cases where it certainly ought to be so; for instance where the question is upon the credibility of the witnesses from their manner and demeanour—a thing that cannot be reported to the court in which the motion is made.

11,994. Mr. Clark.—Do you think it desirable that the judge who has tried the case should be a member of the court which disposes of the motion for a new trial?—I think so. It is true he is to a certain extent appealed against and impeached,—what has happened before him is in controversy; but still the assistance he could give is of such use that it is better he should be present, if there were not inconveniences attending his being so.

11,995. Mr. Shand. — You have mentioned that though there is power to try cases before a judge instead of before a jury, a very large proportion are tried by juries. Do you infer from that that the system of trial by jury works satisfactorily, and gives satisfaction in England?—I think trial by jury works satisfactorily and gives satisfaction, but I do not infer that from what you have mentioned. I think that more causes would be tried before the judge alone, if instead of its being necessary that there should be a consent to the case being tried before the judge, it were necessary that there should be a consent to its being tried before a jury. In the first place there is an affirmative act, and people don't take the trouble to do things affirmatively which are not necessary; in the second place, the supposition is that you must get the plaintiff and the defendant, who are of the most unconsenting disposition in the world to each other, to consent. I think if the law was, that the case must be tried before the judge unless the parties consented to its being tried before a jury, you would have nearly as many tried before the judge as are now tried before a jury.

11,996. There is no review of trials before a judge to any greater extent than trials before a jury?—To a less extent. You cannot impeach a judge's finding on the ground that it is against evidence; you can move for a new trial on the ground that the jury have found against the evidence.

11,997. In the majority of cases, do you think that trial before a jury or before a judge is to be preferred?—That is a very large question indeed. I think if I wanted the truth to be ascertained in the particular case, I should prefer an intelligent man who had been in the habit of exercising his faculties all his life on such questions, to twelve men who had not been in the habit of exercising theirs, who might not be so intelligent men, who certainly have not been in the habit of exercising them together,—farmers and others, who are very much fatigued from being taken and shut up in a hot court. If I wanted nothing but the truth in the particular case, I should prefer the verdict of the judge; and it seems to me impossible to doubt that he is the preferable tribunal. When I was first made a judge myself, I was very strong in favour of trials being before a judge; but I am afraid that the jury is a crutch that I have been leaning on for so long a time that I have now got used to it, and I don't think I am as good a judge of the question now as I was thirteen years ago. Moreover, there is no doubt that trial by a jury popularizes the law. I remember a case before the House of Lords in which I was contending for a particular construction of a covenant, and my brother Willes was contending the other way, and the question put to me was, How was it possible that people should enter into so stringent a covenant as you contend for? I said, 'My Lords, they will trust to that true court of equity, a jury, which, disregarding men's bargains and the law, will decide what is right in spite of all you say to them.' And it is so; I don't say that they do not regard the law, for I believe they do; but every man must feel that although he may have the law on his side, he is in some peril if the justice of the case is not with him also. I think it would be difficult to discriminate between civil and criminal cases; and in criminal cases I think it is better that the judge should not be the man to find the prisoner guilty. But it is a very large question; and I feel some hesitation in offering an opinion about it.

11,998. Mr. Clark.—What do you mean by saying that it is difficult to distinguish between civil and criminal cases?—I mean that it is difficult to say that the one should be tried differently from the other.

11,999. Mr. Shand.—You have had no cause from your great experience to be dissatisfied with jury trials?—No. There are cases in which juries go wrong: for instance, in an action against a railway company—they generally go wrong there; in actions for discharging a servant they generally go wrong; in actions by a tradesman against a gentleman in questions of whether articles supplied were necessary to an infant or wife, they are sure to go wrong; in actions as to malicious prosecution, they are always wrong. You may say to them, 'The question is not whether the man is innocent, but whether there is absence of reasonable cause and malice,' but in vain. They find for the innocent man.

12,000. Mr. Justice Willes.—And cases of running down?—There they generally find for the plaintiff; so much so, that a man who has run down another, if he is wise, will bring the action first. I have been in cases myself where each party has brought an action, and each plaintiff has recovered. I remember one case particularly, in which the question was, whether the man that recovered was free from blame, and there was blame in the other; and each recovered in the action where he was plaintiff.

12,001. Mr. Shand.—Do you think it satisfactory that a party should be bound to accept the decision of one judge on matters of fact, it may be involving property of very large value: take as an illustration a case which has been mentioned once or twice before this Commission,—the Breadalbane case,—where the succession to the Breadalbane estates depended upon questions of fact only, and that, under the system suggested, the verdict or decision of the single judge should be final?—Perhaps it is no answer to the question, but that exists at present in Chancery.

12,002. There is review on matter of fact in Chancery, I understand?—Yes; and I should say that if you confided the jurisdiction to a judge, as a matter of course it would be right that there should be some review of his finding. I don't know that I am capable of giving the Commission any information on that point.

The Hon. Baron Bramwell.

12,003. The Lord Justice-General.—In any event, you would not set aside the verdict of a single judge except upon the same ground that you would set aside the verdict of a jury?—I should say not, certainly.

12,004. Mr. Gordon.—Probably the absence of any power of challenge of the verdict of a single common law judge in England may arise from the consent of both parties being required to his acting without a jury?—Yes. The law doesn't impose him upon them; and if they select him, they take him for better or for worse.

12,005. The Lord Advocate.—I suppose the defendant in a running down case would never consent to its going to a jury?—Not if he could help it; that is to say, if he were wise, he would not.

12,006. Lord Barcaple.—You were asked just now about the case of Lord Breadalbane; but let me put to you the Douglas cause, where Lord Mansfield and Lord Camden upset the judgment of the Court of Session, the only question being whether two children, twins apparently, were the children of a particular lady, or were supposititious children, who had been smuggled by that lady and her husband into the house, and made to pass as the heirs. Do you think that, in a case like that, it would be right to give finality to the opinion of a single judge on point of fact?—I think I gave a very hesitating answer before; but if you wanted nothing but the actual truth in that particular case, without reference to the system, I think the probabilities are, that the trained intellect of a man accustomed to weigh evidence all his life would be worth more than the opinion of one who was not so accustomed, or than any dozen; because, though you augment their number, you do not necessarily augment their capacity.

12,007. But my question was as to the judge, assuming there was no jury?—I cannot see why there should not be review of the judge's decision on matter of fact.

12,008. Mr. Shand.—That necessarily introduces a new discussion and a great deal of expense, if the evidence has to be laid before a court composed of three or four persons, and that has to be set against the advantage of jury trial. Don't you think the expense incurred in cases of comparatively small value, by leaving review open upon questions of fact, is a very serious disadvantage?—I think it would be a very reasonable thing to limit almost all appeals where the amount in question was small.

12,009. Mr. Webster.—As against the expense of the further discussion, which Mr. Shand has alluded to in the case of the decision of a single judge, you have, where the case goes before a jury, motions for new trial, and discussions as to setting aside the verdict?—Yes.

12,010. Mr. Gordon.—Whereas, in the case of the review of a judge's verdict, the court are enabled to pronounce a correct judgment upon the evidence adduced before the judge without a new trial?—That may be. We have no such proceeding; and therefore all I can say is, that the one thing might be, or the other. You might either say that the court of appeal should direct a new trial, or that they should of new try it themselves.

12,011. Mr. Clark.—Do you think it safe to leave it in the hands of the judge, in the first instance, to decide whether there should be an appeal from his judgment or not?—The Commission must forgive me if I say that it is rather an impertinence in me to offer an opinion on matters upon which I have not reflected much; but I don't see why, if you once admit the principle of appeal, you should confine it to any particular tribunal. If you once admit the principle of appeal, you must suppose the possibility of error either in point of fact or in point of law; and I cannot see why there should not be an appeal from the judge except for this, which ought always to be borne in mind, that he has had the witnesses before him, and has had the means of judging of their conduct and demeanour. If he were to say, 'I don't believe such and such a witness,' and the court of appeal were to say, 'You ought to have done so,' I think they would make a very great mistake.

12,012. Mr. Gordon.—And his being a member of the court of appeal would give him the advantage of stating these views before them?—Yes.

12,013. Mr. Shand.—If you had such an appeal on matters of fact in the courts of common law in England, would it not add very seriously to the labours of your appeal courts?—I think not. I don't suppose we should have so many motions for new trials on the ground that the judge has decided wrong, as we have on the ground that the jury has decided wrong.

12,014. The Lord Justice-General.—Are there many motions for new trial on the ground of the verdict being contrary to evidence?—Yes. I should say there are a good many.

12,015. What proportion should you say of the total number moved?—I am speaking very off-hand, but, perhaps, one in six; and very frequently there are affidavits of new matter discovered.

12,016. Mr. Webster.—Are there many instances in which the verdict is set aside as being contrary to evidence?—Yes.

12,017. Lord Barcaple.—Does the motion to set aside the verdict as contrary to evidence not sometimes involve matter of law in this way, that the party moving alleges that the evidence proves something short of the issue in point of law?—We had such a case the other day, where there was a motion for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was against evidence; and when we came to consider the case, we said we were of opinion that the judge who tried it should not have left it to the jury, but should have said that the jury must find in the way the objectors said they ought to have found. That was an action for dismissing a servant.

12,018. You gave the remedy on a motion for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was contrary to evidence?—All we could do was to say, 'There must be a new trial;' though, when the cause went down for trial, we knew that the judge must tell the jury that they must find a verdict for the defendant.

12,019. Mr Clark.—The same facts being proved?—Yes.

12,020. The Lord Justice-General.—You spoke some time ago of the circumstances in which a party is entitled to demand particulars before going to trial: is that in every case?—Yes; I may say in every case, but with a qualification. It has been very much extended of late years. Formerly the particulars used to be granted principally for money demands. A man brought his action for goods sold and delivered, and the defendant asked the particulars; but now, in all cases, if the defendant will make an affidavit that he doesn't know what the plaintiff is going for, particulars will be ordered unless it can be shown that the application is vexatious or unnecessary. Take such a case as slander. I am charged with having slandered you, and I don't know what is meant; the plaintiff objects to give particulars there, because he says, 'You will find out my witnesses and corrupt them;' but in such a case as that he is ordered to give particulars as to what month it was in, or at what place.

12,021. Mr. Gordon.—Or in whose presence?—No. I think they generally say they will not ask you to state that.

12,022. The Lord Justice-General.—Time and place?—Yes.

12,023. But is the defendant entitled in any case to demand particulars, or is it in the discretion of the court?—It is in the discretion of a judge in chambers. They seldom come to the court about it. Injury to a mine or damage to a house are very common cases for particulars.

12,024. I suppose the only case in which a note of particulars is absolutely required is in patent cases?—There there is some statutory enactment which I have not the precise particulars of.

12,025. The clause in Lord Brougham's Act?—Yes.

12,026. Mr. Clark.—If the facts as proved are different from the particulars delivered, what is the consequence?—I was going to use an inaccurate expression, and to say that the plaintiff ought to be non-suited, but the judge ought to tell the jury that he has not made out his case.

12,027. In a case of slander, suppose the plaintiff says it took place in such a street on such a day, and he proves that it took place in the same street, but on another day?—Then there is this sort of rule, that if the defendant cannot have been misled, the error ought not to prejudice the plaintiff. That is the general rule, and we endeavour to do justice as well as we can. Properly speaking, he has not proved the case; but we consider whether the defendant has sustained any damage, or has been misled.

12,028. Mr. Gordon.—Would you allow the plaintiff to amend the particulars, or would you take a verdict without that?—A verdict would be taken without that. The object of the particulars was to give the defendant information, and they did give him information.

12,029. The note of particulars is not treated as part of the record?—No; technically it is not on the record.

12,030. Mr. Shand.—And evidence is admitted, although it may be subject to objection afterwards, on the ground of surprise?—No. Suppose the plaintiff, in giving particulars, says, 'To a coat sold on such a day,' and 'trousers sold on such a day,' and he has given the wrong year for the trousers, he gets into the box, and says, 'There can be no mistake, because he never had but one pair from me, and that was in the month of October, though the wrong year has been stated.' The judge then says that the defendant has not been misled. It is got through somehow or other, if the defendant has not been misled, and no harm has been done.

12,031. If it is the other way, would the evidence be excluded?—If there was any appearance of mala fides on the part of the person giving the particulars, or if there was any prejudice suffered by the defendant.

12,032. Mr. Clark.—In the case of an action on a bill of exchange, raising three possible issues, can the defendant demand particularly to know what is the issue truly to be raised?—I don't think I have ever known such a case as that. I think I have known it tried, and I think the answer generally given is, 'You should interrogate him, and know what his case is.'

12,033. And how does he do it?—There is a power of administering interrogatories.

12,034. Mr. Justice Willes.—Discovery?—Yes.

12,035. The Chairman.—A good deal of work is done in chambers?—An immense deal.

12,036. And that clears away a great deal of business?—Without that, we should require to have the number of the judges almost doubled. Probably the Commission will be surprised when I tell them that I have had 66 cases in one day which were to be attended by counsel, besides as many more not to be attended by counsel at chambers.

12,037. Mr. Gordon.—These are motions on points of order or form?—Of late years a great quantity of very serious business has been sent to chambers. You may say almost all the important business, except new trials. For instance, discovery and interrogatories are always asked for at chambers, and particulars are always asked for there.

12,038. Arranging interrogatories?—The power to administer them. The plaintiff says, 'I want to interrogate the defendant;' the defendant says, 'Your questions are improper,' or, 'This is not a proper case for interrogatories;' and the judge has to examine into that, and make an order or not, as he thinks proper.

12,039. The Chairman.—Do you attend on certain days? or how do you arrange that?—We attend daily during the business year, and three Masters now attend. In the long vacation there is an attendance twice a week.

12,040. An attendance by some judge, or by every judge?—No; one judge now attends for all the three courts.

12,041. Mr. Shand.—Besides discovering and ordering particulars, would you mention any other illustrations of what is done at chambers?—The best answer I could make to that would be to say that all the business of the court is done there, unless certain excepted cases. The exceptions are much fewer than the cases that go to the chambers.

12,042. Are they not minor matters in the progress of the case, or do they ever embrace matters of important discussion?—They are interlocutory proceedings. New trials are never heard or moved for at chambers, except you want to dispose of a case, and the parties agree to it. Demurrers—that is, questions of law—and special cases are never heard at chambers. Motions for attachments for contempt of court are never heard at chambers.

12,043. Mr. Justice Willes.—Except in cases of injunctions?—Except in cases of injunctions; there is statutory power to do that.

12,044. The Chairman.—You have mentioned some classes of cases in which you think that juries almost always go wrong. Are there frequent motions for new trials in those cases?—That is very common.

12,045. And all you can do is to grant the new trial?—Yes.

12,046. They are not so glaring as to suggest the remedy of giving a power to the court to order the verdict to be entered the other way?—No; I think not. I may say that I think juries are habitually wrong in certain cases. Take the case of an action by a discharged servant against his master. Common juries have a strong tendency to find against the master; and in malicious prosecutions, it is in vain to say that there is no public prosecutor here, and therefore the law protects a private person acting bona fide, or that in this case there is some trumpery matter which makes it necessary to leave it to the jury. What malice can this person have against a man whom he never knew? They just shake their heads, and turn round and say, 'Verdict for the plaintiff.'

12,047. Mr. Clark.—How do they do in landlord and tenant cases?—The tenant always tries to get before the farmers, and the landlord before the squires. The landlord can always get a special jury.

12,048. Mr. Shand.—Are you attended by counsel at chambers?—Sometimes. I have seen Sir William Follet at chambers; but sometimes there is only a little boy, whose nose you can just see over the table.

12,049. But, as a rule, is the business at chambers before the judges transacted by counsel or agents?—The greater part of the business is transacted by the attorneys and their managing clerks.

12,050. How long does it take the judge?—It varies with the judge. I daresay my brother Willes will be surprised when I say that it takes me three or four hours in the day. I daresay it takes him less.

12,051. Lord Barcaple.—Every day of the week?—Every day in the week during the business time; but a great deal of the business is of the most trifling character. Sometimes it is a question of giving time to plead. One of the parties refuses to give a week, and they take four days.

12,052. Are the chambers open to the public?—I rather think my brother Willes says that chambers are a public court.

12,053. Mr. Shand.—What hours of the day are devoted to that work by the judge?—We go at eleven o'clock, and sit till the business is over.

12,054. And then you take the sittings in the other courts?—No; after we have done our work at chambers, we are free for the day.

12,055. Are there certain days in the week for chamber work?—Every day.

12,056. When is the business done in banc?—The other judges do the banc business.

12,057. Lord Barcaple.—Then every judge does not sit in chambers every day?—Oh no. Every day there is a judge attending at chambers; but it is one judge only.

12,058. The Lord Justice-General.—That is one judge of the five who constitute the court?—It is one from the eighteen judges now. The three courts send only one judge to chambers.

12,059. Lord Barcaple.—Then you are making orders in causes that are depending in the other courts?—Yes.

12,060. Mr. Gordon.—There is a system of taking proof by affidavits in the equity courts. Has your

The Hon. Baron Bramwell.

Lordship had any experience of it in the common law courts?—We have affidavits in our courts.

12,061. For formal matters?—For what we call interlocutory matters. For instance, if a man wanted a new trial on the ground that he had discovered new evidence, he would have to make an affidavit; if he wanted particulars of demand, he might make an affidavit, and say that he did not know what the plaintiff was going for; or if he wanted a commission for examining witnesses abroad. In fact, an affidavit is always wanted where extrinsic facts are to be acted upon; by which I mean, if a man wants time to plead, he will probably want nothing more than the declaration, and he will show it to the judge, and say he wants more time; but if an extrinsic fact is to be acted on, it has to be proved by affidavit. But the business is so creditably conducted by the attorneys and their clerks at chambers, that where there is no doubt about a fact, they do not ask for an affidavit.

12,062. Mr. Shand.—Then affidavits are practically unknown as part of a cause?—At the trial all evidence is viva voce before the jury or before the judge.

12,063. Mr. Gordon.—Does your Lordship think that it would produce any bad effects to allow proof by affidavit, at all events where the case is to be tried before a judge?—I should say not, either before a judge or before a jury; but my opinion on this point is not worth nearly so much—indeed if it is worth anything at all—as the opinion of Mr. Hollams, a very sagacious gentleman, who is a member of the Judicature Commission, and who, though strongly in favour of viva voce examination in all cases of controverted facts, has expressed an opinion that there are formal things which you cannot call upon a man to admit, because he cannot tell exactly how they stand; but in such cases as that, he thinks it very reasonable that the party wanting to give the evidence should give it by affidavit, to prove those facts which, though not admitted, are not disputed.

12,064. Where there is not likely to be a conflict of testimony upon them?—Yes.

12,065. The Lord Advocate.—What has been the effect of the Common Law Procedure Act as regards the course followed in the trial of causes, and with regard to the average time which an ordinary common law suit occupies in court?—I don't think the Common Law Procedure Act made much difference in the trial of causes.

12,066. What was the particular difference that that Act introduced as compared with the former law on the subject?—It abrogated all unnecessary steps; it got rid of all fictions; and, if I may so say, it made everything as simple as the nature of the case would admit of. That is not a very satisfactory description of it; but I don't know that I can give a better one. For instance, suppose a man had brought an action for assault and battery, and had begun his declaration, 'For that whereas the defendant with force and arms, on the first June, assaulted and beat the plaintiff,' etc., that was a bad declaration, because, instead of being a direct averment that he had beaten him, it was only by way of recital, 'That whereas he had beaten him.'

12,067. Mr. Justice Willes.—And there was another objection to that, that it did not state whether the year was the year from the Hegira, or what year it was?—Yes. Well, the Common Law Procedure Act got rid of such things as these.

12,068. The Lord Advocate.—How long, on an average, does it take, after a cause comes into court, before it reaches trial?—It is very difficult to make an average. Some causes are tried in the country, and some in London; some before special juries, and some before common juries; some in courts that have a great deal to do, and some in courts that have less to do. But the ordinary writ of summons requires the defendant to appear in 8 days, I think; after he has appeared, you declare, and he has to plead in 8 days more, that is, 16 days; you may then deliver him notice of trial, which requires 10 days, that is, 26 days; so that in a month the cause may be ripe for trial; and then if the court is not blocked up with business, it will be tried.

12,069. Mr. Gordon.—But if there is further pleading?—If the defendant's plea requires a replication of new matter from the plaintiff, the defendant has time to rejoin to that.

12,070. The Lord Advocate.—Is the average of causes tried within two or three months?—I should think, on the average, the causes are not tried within two or three months. It would be very difficult to try all the causes at the assizes in that time; and even in London the courts are not sitting for the trial of nisi prius between 10th July and 2d November. They are not sitting for the trial of nisi prius in London between the last day of February and 16th April, and special juries are not taken except at three periods of the year; that is to say, in December, in February, and in the end of June and July.

12,071. Mr. Justice Willes.—The defendant has 8 days to appear, and as soon as he appears the plaintiff may declare. Then the defendant has 8 days to plead; and if he does not plead within these 8 days, he is tied down to take notice of trial for the next practicable sittings, which may be either in London or in the country. If they are in town, the vacation may intervene; but, taking the speediest proceeding that could be had, the 24th October is the first day of the legal year for delivering pleadings; if the defendant were served 8 days before that and appeared, and it was a common action, the defendant could declare on 24th October, and the time would expire on 1st November. The defendant would have to go to trial if it were a town cause, in November, at the third sitting; that would allow 10 days' notice of trial. Or if he obtained time, on condition of taking short notice of trial, he would have to go to trial some time before 25th November—so that it is just possible that an action might be over in five weeks; and I have noticed over and over again, in trying causes in term, that actions of a common kind are over in six weeks. The judge has a power of giving speedy execution; and in undefended actions he gives execution immediately?—That is so.

12,072. The Lord Advocate.—What is the proportion of cases that never go farther than the verdict of a jury; and what is the proportion in which a rule is moved for?—That is a very difficult question to answer. I think the last returns showed that 2 per cent. come to trial; but how many that come to trial are afterwards heard of in the court, I don't remember.

12,073. Mr. Clark.—What is the smallest sum of money that can be sued for in the superior courts?—You may sue for the smallest possible amount; but if it is under 40s., and there is no question of principle involved, but only the question of whether it is owing or not, the court will stay proceedings on the ground that it is contrary to their dignity to entertain such a case.

12,074. Are there many cases of small amount, say under £25, before the superior courts?—Yes, there are a good many cases of that kind.

12,075. Mr. Gordon.—By an Act passed last session, I think costs cannot be recovered if the case is below £50?—Below £20.

12,076. Mr. Clark.—Has the county court, to a certain extent, co-ordinate jurisdiction with the supreme courts up to £50?—Yes; they can entertain cases up to £50 of the same quality and description that we can; but they cannot try cases of libel, or slander, or malicious prosecution, or seduction.

12,077. What are the grounds on which you give delay to a defendant?—It is almost impossible to give an easy answer to that. A man will come forward and say he wants more time to plead; we generally say to him, 'You must take short notice of trial, and make an equivalent to your opponent for this;' if he says, 'I cannot take short notice of trial,' or if the defendant is ill, or the attorney himself is ill, or if there is a long declaration, and it is a difficult case, he will say that he cannot get ready; and sometimes he will say, 'Before I can plead, I must interrogate the plaintiff, and ascertain certain facts from him.' A variety of reasons of that sort may be given. Sometimes he will say simply, 'Really, my Lord, I have been very busy, and it is two months to the assizes, and the other party will have plenty of time.'

12,078. Suppose a man brings an action to recover an estate on the ground that he is the true heir, and a question of pedigree arises in that way, would the defendant, as matter of course, have a long time to prepare, or would the case go to trial immediately?—Not as matter of course. It would come on for trial immediately, unless he applied to postpone it.

12,079. Would the judge, as matter of course, give him a long time?—He would have to make an affidavit, and make out a good case for postponement. If he said, 'I pledge my oath, as a respectable member of this profession, that I cannot get ready,' I suppose delay would be granted.

12,080. Mr. Gordon.—Would you give him months?—I have given a man six months to plead, on the ground that his client was in New South Wales.

12,081. Mr. Clark.—Is that a matter entirely in the discretion of the judge?—Yes.

12,082. He is not bound down to a statutory rule?—No, there is no hard and fast line.

12,083. Mr. Gordon.—In the statistics it is stated that so many thousand summonses are disposed of in chambers: that does not mean suits?—Oh no.

12,084. A summons may be a proceeding after the cause has come before the court?—A summons is either the name of the writ commencing the action, or it is a judge's summons calling on the defendant or his attorney to attend at chambers, to show cause why the party issuing it should not get something that he wants.

12,085. How many causes are set down for trial each day at the assizes or at the Guildhall? or is there just a list which the judges go through continuously?—The parties enter as many causes as they have to try. Every plaintiff enters his cause, or in some cases the defendant may enter it. That is what we call the printed list, and day by day the judge appoints so many to be in the paper for hearing next day; and in doing so he will be governed by the appearance of the causes.

12,086. I suppose witnesses are sometimes kept in attendance for days?—Cruelly.

12,087. Is that often the case?—Very often.

12,088. The Lord Justice-General.—Do you see any remedy for that grievance?—The only remedy I see is a very doubtful one, namely, to take care not to put out any more cases than can be tried; but the judge does not like that, because a case may go off, and he may have to rise at twelve o'clock in the forenoon, and instead of finishing the cases in a week, he may have to sit for a fortnight. The juries and the officers of court also complain. I don't know that there is a remedy.

12,089. Are there sometimes remanets which cannot be disposed of at the sittings?—Either the parties have agreed to make them remanets, or there has been no time to try them, and they are made compulsory remanets.

12,090. When are they tried?—They wait till the next assizes or sittings. If it is a remanet at the assizes, it remains over till next assizes; if it is a remanet in the metropolis, it remains over till next sittings.

12,091. Mr. Adam.—In the case of a criminal trial, supposing there was a variance between the facts proved and the facts charged, is there any remedy?—There is a small power of amendment at common law. There is a larger power of amendment, the precise terms of which I do not remember, in an Act of Lord Abinger's, but it is an amendment of variances in names more than anything else. Otherwise there would be an acquittal.

12,092. The Chairman.—Suppose a man was tried for the slaughter of A. B. C., and it turned out that the true name of the party was A. B. D., and the prisoner was acquitted, could he be tried again for the slaughter of A. B. D.?—I should say so. I remember a case very many years ago in which an Irishman named Shee, who lived in Whitechapel, London, cut off the head of his child. He was indicted for the murder of the child, the indictment giving the child a name; and he was acquitted on the ground that it had no name. They then tried him on a second indictment for cutting off the head of a child without a name, and a set of friendly witnesses proved that it had a name, and he was again acquitted.

The Hon. Baron Bramwell.

12,093. Mr. Gordon.—Does your Lordship think that important cases are better tried in London or on circuit, with reference to the expense of counsel being taken down to them?—Well, there are circuits and circuits. The Guildhall juries are very good. As to county juries, they vary; some very good; in others the juries, especially common juries, are often very inferior.

12,094. I was alluding to the expense?—The expense is greater at the assizes than it is in London, certainly, because it is only in Liverpool and the Surrey towns that there is anything like a list made out. The consequence is, that every plaintiff and defendant has to be at the assize town, and to wait till his cause is tried. All the attorneys and witnesses and parties have to go to some hotel in the assize town, and that adds considerably to the expense. The attendance is longer; but I don't know that the fees to counsel are higher.

12,095. Unless in important cases where special retainers are given?—Yes. There is a fixed fee for Queen's counsel.

12,096. Mr. Clark.—Is the special retainer allowed against the opposite party?—It is not allowed against the opponent.

Henry John Hodgson, Esq., Master in the Court of Queen's Bench;
William Morgan Benett, Esq., Master in the Court of Common Pleas; examined.

12,097. The Chairman.—Mr. Walton, you are a Master in the Court of Exchequer? Mr. Walton.—I am.

12,098. You have been so for a considerable time? Mr. Walton.—Upwards of thirty years.

12,099. We are desirous to know generally from you the nature of the duties that are performed in the Masters' office? Mr. Walton.—Their principal duty is that of taxing costs in the suits, taking references, and superintending the whole of the business of the office, which embraces all the proceedings in a suit from the issue of the process till the final execution. We have also to attend the courts, and take any references that may be made from the courts, and we have to be present during the proceedings in court to record them.

12,100. Would you state as shortly as you can the procedure in a cause from its origin, till it goes to trial? Mr. Walton.—The first step is a writ of summons under the Common Law Procedure Act. Do I understand your Lordship to refer to a defended suit?

12,101. Yes; a defended suit. Mr. Walton.—Having been served with the writ, the defendant appears; then the plaintiff delivers his declaration, and calls upon the defendant to plead.

12,102. The Lord Justice-General.—Within what time must the defendant appear? Mr. Walton.—Within eight days from the service of the writ.

12,103. Mr. Webster.—Within what time must the plaintiff make his declaration? Mr. Walton.—He must declare within a year; and if he does not do so, he is supposed to be out of court. Having declared, he calls on the defendant to plead within eight days; and the defendant having pleaded, if it is a plea which merely traverses the declaration, and does not raise any fresh matter in confession and avoidance, as it is called, the plaintiff may join issue on that, and give notice of trial. I have described the simplest case.

12,104. The Chairman.—If the plaintiff does not make his declaration for a length of time, can he be forced to make it? Mr. Walton.—He can; there may be a notice to declare, but it is very seldom that that takes place.

12,105. Then the case goes to trial? Mr. Walton.—Then the issue is delivered, and the notice of trial is to try at the next assizes or the next sittings; and generally speaking, the notice of trial is ten days. The plaintiff must give ten days' notice of trial.

12,106. Are these steps all taken in your presence as Master? Mr. Walton.—No; all formal proceedings are delivered by the attorneys.

12,107. Without the intervention of any officer? Mr. Walton.—In our office, we merely issue the writs and file the proceedings; but the steps which belong to the duty of an attorney are taken by him.

12,108. And the time is absolutely fixed by the Procedure Act? Mr. Walton.—Yes; but there are many occasions on which the time is altered by application to a judge. When the defendant asks for time to plead, he is generally put under terms to take a shorter notice of trial, or he gets it on any terms the judge pleases to impose.

12,109. Mr. Webster.—When the plaintiff joins issue, what notice does he give to the other party? Mr. Walton.—He joins issue and delivers the issue itself to the opposite side.

12,110. The Lord Justice-General.—What is the issue? Mr. Walton.—A paper transcript of the declaration and pleadings. The defendant then knows what the issues are.

12,111. Mr. Gordon.—Does the attorney for the plaintiff hand the declaration into your office? Mr. Walton.—No; he hands it to the defendant's attorney.

12,112. When does the declaration come into your office? Mr. Walton.—It does not come at all to our office.

12,113. Do you get a copy of it? Mr. Walton.—No.

12,114. In whose custody are the principal documents kept,—the declaration and pleas? Mr. Walton.—The attorneys have them.

12,115. Each has his own? Mr. Walton.—Yes; and each has his adversaries'.

12,116. How are the papers identified? Are they subscribed by any person?—Mr. Benett.—The attorney's name is put on the back.

12,117. Mr. Baxter.—Are they subscribed by counsel? Mr. Benett.—No; there were pleadings signed by counsel before the Common Law Procedure Act; but that has been abolished.

12,118. Mr. Gordon.—Does it only come into your office after there has been a trial and a judgment? Mr. Hodgson.—Yes.

12,119. And there may be some other proceedings to be taken by way of review? Mr. Hodgson.—Yes. Mr. Benett.—It never comes into our office unless there are other proceedings. When a judgment is signed, the attorney simply gives in the first three words of the first proceeding; and we don't keep even that.

12,120. The Chairman.—Nobody can find these proceedings anywhere? Mr. Benett.—No; only the parties themselves. Mr. Hodgson.—We have the præcipe for the writ, which is the authority for issuing the writ. We have the appearance entered in our book, and nothing else till it comes to a judgment roll.

12,121. Mr. Baxter.—Then the issue to be tried is a copy of the declaration? Mr. Hodgson.—The issue is a copy of the declaration, the plea, and the replication.

12,122. Who prepares that copy? Mr. Hodgson.—The attorney for the plaintiff delivers it to the attorney for the defendant. The record made up on parchment is substantially the same thing.

12,123. The Chairman.—When there is time asked, or any application of that kind, does it come before you? Mr. Walton.—No; it goes before the judge. Mr. Benett.—But under a new Act the Masters sit as judges at chambers, and hear all applications of that kind—almost everything except matters affecting the liberty of the subject. Mr. Hodgson.—And other matters which may be done by consent.

12,124. If any matter arises attended with difficulty, do you refer it to the judge? Mr. Benett.—We may; but it is not often that we do. Either party may appeal to the judge from a Master's decision.

12,125. Are these appeals frequent? Mr. Benett.—No; I fancy not. Mr. Hodgson.—We have no means of knowing.

12,126. You know if there has been an alteration of your judgment? Mr. Hodgson.—No; not always.

12,127. Mr. Clark.—Can you increase the time that is given to plead by statute? Mr. Benett.—Yes, we do that every hour. I have done it in more than twenty causes this morning.

12,128. Mr. Gordon.—In fact the general rule is to give additional time, is it not? Mr. Hodgson.—Yes; always taking care that the plaintiff does not lose his sitting or assizes.

12,129. Mr. Webster.—Do you make formal orders? Mr. Hodgson.—A summons is taken out by the defendant's attorney: 'Let the attorney for the plaintiff attend and show cause why defendant shall not have a month's time to plead.' That is initialed by the Master; and when further time to plead is ordered, he has usually to take short notice of trial,—that is, four days' notice.

12,130. Mr. Clark.—Where does that summons remain? Mr. Hodgson.—It is filed in the judge's chambers. The order remains in the possession of the party who obtains it.

12,131. Mr. Gordon.—Who takes charge of the summons at the judge's chambers? Mr. Hodgson.—The judge's clerks.

12,132. Mr. Shand.—In what year was the additional power given to the Masters? Mr. Hodgson.—1st January 1868.

12,133. Has that power relieved the judges very much of work? Mr. Hodgson.—Yes. Formerly one judge from each court used to attend chambers; now one judge attends for the three courts, the Masters doing the ordinary work.

12,134. Mr. Clark.—Is it practically the same kind of work that comes before the judge at chambers and before the Master at chambers? Mr. Benett.—Yes; excepting matters affecting the liberty of the subject. All other matters can be heard by a Master, with consent; but without consent they cannot hear interpleader orders, and some other matters.

12,135. Mr. Shand.—Is there any rule of court or any statutory rule defining the class of things that the Masters may take up, as distinguished from those which the judges take up at chambers? Mr. Benett.—The Masters may do all matters done at chambers by a judge, except those I have mentioned.

12,136. Is that rule to be had?—Mr. Benett.—Yes; it is published. They are the rules of Michaelmas term 1867, and they came into operation on 1st January 1868. It is as follows:—

'As to the Jurisdiction of the Common Law Masters at Chambers.

'Michaelmas Term, 1867.

'Whereas by the statute made and passed in the session of Parliament held in the 30th and 31st years of the reign of her Majesty, intituled "An Act to provide for the better Dispatch of Business in the Chambers of the Judges of the Superior Courts of Common Law," it is enacted that it shall be lawful for a majority of all the judges of the said courts, which majority shall include the two Chief Justices, or one of the Chief Justices, and the Chief Baron, from time to time to make and publish general rules for certain purposes therein mentioned: It is therefore ordered that the Masters of the said courts of common law at Westminster be, and each of them is hereby, empowered and required to do all such things, and transact all such business, and exercise all such authority and jurisdiction in respect of the same, as by virtue of any statute or custom, or by the rules and practice of the said courts, or any of them respectively, were at the time of the passing of the said Act, and are now done, transacted, or exercised by any judge of the said courts sitting at chambers, except in respect of matters relating to the liberty of the subject, and except (unless by consent of the parties) in respect of the following proceedings and matters; that is to say:

All matters relating to criminal proceedings.

The removal of causes from inferior courts, other than the removal of judgments for the purpose of having execution.

Prohibitions and injunctions.

The referring of causes under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854.

The rectifying of omissions or mistakes in the register under the Joint Stock Companies Acts.

Interpleader—other than such matters arising in Interpleader, as relate to practice only.

Discovery—whether by inspection of documents, interrogatories, or otherwise.

Reviewing taxation of costs.

Staying proceedings after verdict.

Leave to sue in forma pauperis.

Orders charging stock, funds, annuities, or share, or dividend, or annual produce thereof.

'That in case any matter shall appear to the Master to be proper for the decision of a judge, the Master may refer the same to a judge, and the judge may either dispose of the matter, or refer the same back to the Master, with such directions as he may think fit.

'That appeals from the Master's order or decision shall be made by summons, such summons to be taken out within four days after the decision complained of, or such further time as may be allowed by a judge or Master.

'The appeal to be no stay, unless so ordered by a judge or Master.

'The costs of such appeal shall be in the discretion of the judge.

'That all summonses be issued by a judge as heretofore; but that orders by the Masters be made in their own names.

'That the scale of costs for all matters done by and before the Masters shall be the same as are fixed for business done by and before the judges.

'That the same fees shall be taken in respect of business transacted before the said Masters at chambers as are now taken when the same business is transacted before a judge.

'That these rules take effect on the 1st January 1868.'

12,137. The Chairman.—Is there a very large proportion of writs issued that never reappear in the form of judgments? Mr. Walton.—I think an answer to that question will be found in the judicial statistics of 1867, the last year published. In that year there were in the Court of Exchequer 50,181 writs, and the judgments only amounted to 12,057; and these were judgments merely on affidavit of service of the writ, where there was no defence; but in posteas and trials the judgments were 759, that is, 759 contested cases out of 50,181 writs.

12,138. The Lord Justice-General.—It was only in these 759 cases that any contentious litigation arose? Mr. Walton.—Contentious so far as trials went before a jury.

12,139. The Chairman.—That is only 1½ per cent.? Mr. Walton.—Yes; but since 1867, when this return was made, the last County Courts Act has diminished the number of writs by at least one-third.

12,140. Mr. Gordon.—That is the Act which provides that a party cannot recover more costs in the superior courts than in the county courts in certain cases? Mr. Walton.—They cannot recover any.

12,141. Does that apply to cases up to £50? Mr. Walton.—£20.

12,142. So that between £50 and £20 there is a co-ordinate jurisdiction between the County Court and the Supreme Court, and the party may recover full costs? Mr. Walton.—Yes. Mr. Benett.—But if the plaintiff issues his writ in the superior court, the other party may apply to get it sent to the inferior court.

12,143. Of the 729 cases which went to trial, there would probably be a considerable number in which evidence was led in the absence of the defendant. Mr. Benett.—Some might be undefended.

12,144. Where a plea is given in, you cannot get judgment without going before a jury? Mr. Benett.—Not unless the plea is withdrawn.

12,145. But you cannot get the judgment of a judge without going before a jury? Mr. Hodgson.—It is very common that a plea is put in to gain time; and when that object is gained, the plea is withdrawn.

12,146. The Chairman.—When cases are defended, and go to trial, can you give us any idea of the time which usually elapses between the issuing of the writ and the return of the judgment? Mr. Hodgson.—Supposing the writ issued on 1st January, and served within a reasonable time, the defendant has eight days to appear, and the plaintiff can declare immediately; and on an average a fortnight's time is given to plead. It would be tried by the end of January probably. That is a simple case.

12,147. Mr. Clark.—But take a difficult case? Mr. Hodgson.—In a difficult case longer time is required to prepare the pleadings. They must go before counsel, and probably it might be a month or two months longer.

12,148. But do you think a case has been long in court if it was raised in January and not tried in three months? Mr. Hodgson.—It depends on whether it is a country case.

12,149. But take a London case? Mr. Hodgson.—Yes; I should say three months is a long time.

12,150. But the plaintiff will usually be able to get his judgment in three months from the date of his writ? Mr. Hodgson.—Yes. Mr. Benett.—Assuming that the autumn does not interfere. It takes 26 days, supposing the court is sitting; 8 days to appear, and then the plaintiff may declare immediately; 8 to plead; and 10 days' notice of trial. Mr. Hodgson.—It depends a little on whether it is in London or Middlesex. If the case is set down, it has to wait till it is reached, and there may be longer time occupied in that way.

12,151. Mr. Adam.—Supposing there is a motion for a new trial after the verdict, when will the case be ultimately disposed of upon the average? Mr. Hodgson.—In the Court of Queen's Bench I should say it is pretty nearly a year from the time when the rule to show cause is obtained before it comes on for argument. That is probably getting shorter now, in consequence of the diminution of causes. Mr. Walton.—It is not near so much as that in Exchequer. Mr. Benett.—It is not nearly so much in the Court of Common Pleas.

12,152. Mr. Webster.—Is that the amount of time required for a decision whether there is to be a new trial or not? Mr. Hodgson.—Yes; but it depends on the amount of business.

12,153. Mr. Clark.—Can a defendant stay the execution of the judgment for a year by merely intimating that he is to move for a new trial? Mr. Hodgson.—No; he must make out a prima facie case, and get a rule to show cause. Mr. Benett.—And he must get that within the first four days of the term after the trial.

12,154. Mr. Gordon.—Is it not also the rule that the judge trying the cause may issue judgment, and indeed does issue judgment, unless he thinks it a proper case in which to give time? Mr. Benett.—Yes; he may certify for speedy execution.

12,155. And that can only be prevented by the party finding security? Mr. Benett.—It could not be prevented even by that means unless the judge thought fit. The judge would frequently order the money to be paid into court. Mr. Hodgson.—The ordinary rule is execution within fourteen days of the verdict, unless the judge gives longer time; and he may also certify to give immediate execution.

12,156. When is that determined? Is it when the verdict is given, or do you wait for the fourteen days? Mr. Hodgson.—Sometimes when the verdict is given, they apply to the judge to stay execution. If not, they can go to judge's chambers and get execution stayed.

12,157. The Chairman.—The matter of taxing accounts comes before you? Mr. Walton.—Yes; taxing costs. Mr. Benett.—We try referred causes involving matters of account, and in fact involving questions that have nothing to do with accounts. If the cause involves, in whole or in part, matters of account, it may be sent to the Master; and many of the cases so sent do not involve matters of account. Sometimes they come to us by consent of the parties.

12,158. In these proceedings you have the parties before you by their solicitors? Mr. Benett.—Yes, and their witnesses and counsel usually.

Messrs. Walton, Hodgson, and Benett.

12,159. And they bring all their vouchers before you? Mr. Benett.—Yes.

12,160. Have you sometimes to take evidence? Mr. Benett.—Always. Mr. Hodgson.—The case is heard exactly as before a jury, except that we are judge and jury.

12,161. Is there an opening by counsel? Mr. Hodgson.—Yes; but counsel don't make speeches in the same way that they would to a jury, and time is saved in that way.

12,162. Mr. Shand.—Are the examinations viva voce? Mr. Hodgson.—Yes.

12,163. Is any part of the examination taken in any other way than viva voce? Mr. Benett.—Not in a reference.

12,164. Do you fix a day on which the witnesses must attend? Mr. Benett.—Yes.

12,165. Supposing witnesses don't appear, do you allow adjournments? Mr. Benett.—We allow adjournments if it is reasonably necessary that we should do so.

12,166. But you restrict that? Mr. Benett.—Yes. We don't allow a defendant an adjournment merely to gain time to pay; otherwise, the applications would be endless. Mr. Hodgson.—And in our courts we are very much disinclined to adjourn, because counsel cannot attend. The object is to get on as fast as we can; and in consequence of the speediness and inexpensiveness of that mode of procedure, we find it is very popular. I have made an extract from the judicial statistics of the number of these references, in all the three courts, from 1858 to 1867. In 1858 the number of causes referred to the Masters in all the courts was 413, and in 1867, 887, or more than double. In the same years the total number of causes tried at nisi prius in London and Middlesex and on circuits was: 1858, 2153; and 1857, 2895,—showing nothing like the same increase. And it is very remarkable that they have progressively increased, with the exception of one year in each case; but it is not the same year. The list is as follows:—Number of causes referred to Masters in all the courts: 1858, 413; 1859, 550; 1860, 501; 1861, 592; 1862, 646; 1863, 656; 1864, 664; 1865, 729; 1866, 799; 1867, 887. Number of causes tried at nisi prius in London and Middlesex, and on the circuits: 1858, 2153; 1859, 1964; 1860, 2138; 1861, 2192; 1862, 2238; 1863, 2159; 1864, 2205; 1865, 2563; 1866, 2593; 1867, 2895.

12,167. How many Masters are there? Mr. Hodgson.—Five in each court; and there are three courts.

12,168. Then the numbers you have mentioned were before fifteen Masters? Mr. Hodgson.—Yes.

12,169. Is any part of that work done by assistants of Masters? Mr. Hodgson.—No.

12,170. Have you no assistance in that work? Mr. Hodgson.—We have a great many cases of building accounts: a man employs a builder to build a house, and he gets into difficulty with him, and a litigation ensues. It generally comes to be a question of the value of work. We find that it is perfectly useless to attempt to dispose of that by scientific witnesses—by surveyors called for the plaintiff and for the defendant—for they speak from totally different points of view. The plaintiff's surveyor bases his valuation on what the plaintiff tells him of the facts, and the defendant's surveyor speaks on what the defendant tells him, which are two different sides of the shield, and we find we cannot contrast them: therefore we deprecate their calling any of these witnesses; and by consent of parties we nominate an independent person to make the valuation. That saves time and expense, and gives satisfaction.

12,171. But suppose a question of fact to arise as to the state in which the premises were when the tenant entered, as contrasted with the state in which they were when the litigation arises, what do you do?—That we get evidence of, and decide ourselves.

12,172. You take evidence? Mr. Hodgson.—Yes.

12,173. And you have a surveyor besides? Mr. Hodgson.—There is no use of having a surveyor, except where the work is in the same state.

12,174. It is only where it is a mere question of value of work? Mr. Hodgson.—Yes. Mr. Walton.—I can only say that we follow the same practice in our court. I have never known an instance where the parties refused to adopt a suggestion of the Master, and I have never known an instance where the report of the surveyor has been objected to. Mr. Hodgson.—That is my experience also. Mr. Benett.—I may mention a case in which I did the same. It was an action by an engraver for engraving a picture by Gustave Doré. The sole question I had to determine was whether the engraving was so done as to ensure success on publication. I suppose there were a dozen first-rate artists in London to swear that it would never be sold, and another dozen to swear that it would be bought immediately. I sent the matter to another engraver by consent, and he gave judgment that it was well done. My own impression would have been that it was not well done.

12,175. Mr. Shand.—Are partnership accounts brought before you? Mr. Hodgson.—No; they are Chancery matters. Mr. Benett.—Unless they have been agreed to by the parties.

12,176. Besides building contracts, what other references have you? Mr. Benett.—The judge has power to refer to the Master any action which consists wholly or in part of matters of mere account; but a matter of account may involve questions of liability. I can hardly say that a case ever came to us merely as matter of an account. Mr. Walton.—The other day I had a case referred to me as to the proper making of a steam-engine for a gentleman's yacht. There were witnesses on both sides, and I found myself very incompetent to decide. I accordingly called in Mr. Braithwaite, by consent of parties, and he decided the case in a very short time. Mr. Benett.—I tried a case for a collision between a barge and a dolphin, in building a bridge over the river.

12,177. The Chairman.—Was there cross-swearing there? Mr. Benett.—A great deal. But these are the things the Masters try; and they dispose of them, I think, to the satisfaction of the parties.

12,178. Mr. Gordon.—Is there any review? Mr. Benett.—You may go to the court to refer back to the Master; but that is rarely done. Mr. Hodgson.—I have known a few applications in my experience, but I have never known one that has been successful.

12,179. Mr. Shand.—Your decisions are treated in the same way as awards by an arbiter? Mr. Hodgson.—Yes.

12,180. Mr. Gordon.—You seem to depute your powers to a person of skill, and adopt his opinion? Mr. Hodgson.—That is, by consent of parties. Mr. Benett.—It is ensuring a disinterested witness.

12,181. The Chairman.—When you examine witnesses before you, does it frequently occur that the trial lasts beyond a day? Mr. Hodgson.—My own experience is, that the majority of cases are disposed of at one sitting. There are cases that go over a longer time; but the majority of cases are got over in three or four hours.

12,182. After you have heard all the evidence, you take your own time to consider your judgment? Mr. Hodgson.—I generally decide at the time; and one advantage of this tribunal is, that we are often enabled, instead of giving a strict decision at law, if we see that it is a case that ought to be arranged between the parties, to make a suggestion that the parties agree to, and it is commonly settled in that way to the satisfaction of both.

12,183. Mr. Gordon.—How is the judgment written out? Mr. Hodgson.—The form of it is a certificate. We in our court have a printed form: 'In pursuance of the order of reference of Mr. Justice So-and-so, I find, certify, and award for the plaintiff for the sum of so-and-so.' The costs of the reference are left to our discretion; the costs of the cause abide the event. Unless there is some reason against it, I always make the costs of the reference abide the event.

12,184. Is that reported to the court? Mr. Hodgson.—No. Our clerk gives it out to the party who comes and pays the office fees, which are very small.

He is entitled, after a lapse of seven days, to go to a judge and ask leave to sign judgment on that certificate.

12,185. That is the judge at chambers? Mr. Hodgson.—Yes; but if he chooses to wait till seven days of next term, he may sign judgment as matter of course.

12,186. The Chairman.—If you are attended by counsel, does that form part of the cost of the proceedings? Mr. Hodgson.—Yes.

12,187. Do you exercise control over the amount of fees paid to counsel? Mr. Hodgson.—Yes; we do so in all cases. Mr. Benett.—But more in references than anything else. We have fixed a scale for that. Mr. Hodgson.—It depends on the time. We consider a single meeting to be three hours, and a double meeting not exceeding five hours. Supposing a counsel has a fee on his brief and papers, we allow him 3 guineas for a single meeting, and 5 guineas for a double meeting. That is for mere attendance before us, in addition to the fee on the brief.

12,188. Do you exercise any control over the fee on the brief? Mr. Hodgson.—Yes; if it was exorbitant we should reduce it.

12,189. Mr. Clark.—Can you give us any notion of the amount contained in your decrees? Mr. Hodgson.—From £10 to thousands. Mr. Benett.—I remember one case in which I gave a certificate for more than £8000.

12,190. What kind of a case was that? Mr. Benett.—An action on a bond. I forget the circumstances on which the amount due on the bond depended.

12,191. Lord Barcaple.—Suppose that the amount had been five times £8000, would that have prevented the case from coming before you in the same circumstances? Mr. Benett.—No; we are not limited by any amount. Mr. Hodgson.—That might have an effect on the discretion of the judge sending it.

12,192. Mr. Justice Willes.—The mere amount would make no difference. Mr. Benett.—I had a question between the owners and the captain of a ship, and the accounts involved enormous sums. The captain claimed the expense of repairing the ship at Calcutta, and the owners had set-offs.

12,193. Mr. Clark.—Do you find that many cases come before you for small amounts? Mr. Benett.—Oh yes. I have had a great many under £20. In fact, the amounts vary just as much as trials at nisi prius.

12,194. Mr. Webster.—Can you inform us on what principle you judge of the brief fee? Mr. Benett.—It is by the amount of labour involved. Mr. Hodgson.—A brief may consist of a comparatively small number of sheets, and matters may be very complicated. We judge of the matter by our own experience.

12,195. The Chairman.—You give what you consider reasonable? Mr. Hodgson.—Yes.

12,196. The Lord Justice-General.—What are the extremes? From what to what does the counsel's fee on the brief vary? Mr. Hodgson.—In a common jury case, I would say from 8 to 10 guineas was about the fee for leading counsel, and from 4 to 6 for the junior.

12,197. That is in a cause that goes to trial by a jury? Mr. Hodgson.—Yes. Mr. Benett.—In causes referred to the Master, it is very seldom more than 5 guineas.

12,198. Mr. Shand.—Are these consultation fees? Mr. Hodgson.—We don't allow in arbitrations more than one counsel.

12,199. Is there a consultation fee, a brief fee, and an attendance fee? Mr. Hodgson.—Not ordinarily. The ordinary case is, that the fee put on the brief covers both the attendance and the brief. In most cases 6 or 8 guineas would cover everything.

12,200. Mr. Webster.—As to the attorney's part of the bill of costs, would you inform us as to what is usually done in agency cases? Mr. Hodgson.—The agency cases are these: Attorneys who take out a certificate to practise in London must carry on business within twelve miles of London. The country attorney does no part of the business done in London: he employs a town agent to do all the work which necessarily is done in London, and the practice is to divide the profits equally; but sometimes there is a special arrangement.

12,201. So that a division of the whole attorney's fees in the bill is a division of the town agent's charges only? Mr. Benett.—It is only the work that the town agent does that is divided. In 9 cases out of 10, the most profitable part of the work is drawing the brief, which is done by the country agent; and the town agent has nothing but one-half the charges of handing the papers backwards and forwards in London, and entering the cause, if that is done in London.

12,202. Is the work done by the town agent routine work, or must he take the trouble of mastering the case? Mr. Hodgson.—It is generally routine work.

12,203. The country agents who participate have town certificates? Mr. Hodgson.—Yes; they must have town certificates.

12,204. Mr. Shand.—Suppose the agent in the country to prepare the brief, and to see all the witnesses, and to write out details of what they are to say, does he receive the whole rumuneration for that? Mr. Benett.—If he is the attorney properly employed by the party, he keeps the whole remuneration for that himself.

12,205. And the London agent has no share of it? Mr. Benett.—No.

12,206. But the fees for the London agent are divided between him and the country agent? Mr. Benett.—Yes.

12,207. And the work done by the London agent is of a formal character? Mr. Hodgson.—It is of a formal and routine character.

12,208. Does it involve time?—Mr. Hodgson. It involves the time of clerks; for instance, attending a summons at chambers, 6s. 8d.

12,209. That is done by clerks? Mr. Hodgson.—Almost entirely; the town agent will get 3s. 4d. of that.

12,210. Suppose a case comes on for discussion before you, do you allow for the attendance of either, or both of these agents? Mr. Benett.—Only the London agent. We don't usually allow for the country attorney coming up to town.

12,211. Mr. Justice Willes.—What are the circumstances in which you do allow that? Mr. Benett.—In an action of ejectment involving a long investigation of title-deeds, with which the country attorney is well acquainted and the London agent is not, we should allow it; or in complicated matters of account. Each case must depend on its own circumstances. If it is a case which can be attended to by the London agent reasonably well, we don't allow for the attendance of the country attorney. It is only done in extreme cases.

12,212. The Lord Justice-General.—In rare cases? Mr. Benett.—Very rare. I don't think that on an average a country attorney is allowed costs for attending at a trial in London once a year.

12,213. The Chairman.—When a London solicitor attends a trial before you, are his charges for that attendance divided between him and the country agent? Mr. Benett.—Yes.

12,214. In equal proportions? Mr. Benett.—Yes. They do make different arrangements between themselves. I believe some country attorneys stipulate that they shall have two-thirds of the profit; but the recognised rule is equal division.

12.215. Mr. Webster.—When a town solicitor is the proper attorney of the party, and he requires assistance in the country, how is it regulated? Mr. Benett.—Then the country attorney charges his whole fee.

12,216. Mr. Shand.—And the town solicitor gets his own charge? Mr. Benett.—Yes. Mr. Hodgson.—There is no case of a country attorney being an agent. The ordinary notion of agency does not apply where the principal attorney is the town attorney.

12,217. Where a case is from a distance, have you not frequently the local agent from that distant place in attendance? Mr. Hodgson.—Yes; that will occur at the assizes. Suppose a Sheffield attorney has a cause tried at York, he will go to York.

12,218. The Lord Justice-General.—And the London

Messrs. Walton, Hodgson, and Benett.

attorney will not go to the trial? Mr. Hodgson.—If it is a Sheffield attorney, and the cause is tried at Lewes, he will go to it.

12,219. Mr. Shand.—Is correspondence between the attorney and his client in any case allowed against the opposite party? Mr. Benett.—Very rarely. Where it leads to the settlement of the cause, and saves other expense, it is allowed within restricted limits.

12,220. Is it allowed between the attorney and client? Mr. Benett.—Yes; we allow all communications necessarily had between the attorney and his client. Mr. Hodgson.—But we don't allow communications between the town and country attorney. We don't allow two attorneys in the same cause, as far as costs are concerned.

12,221. Mr. Gordon.—Don't you allow a slump sum at the end of the term? Mr. Hodgson.—Yes; there is a term fee.

12,222. How much is that? Mr. Hodgson.—In cases above £20, 13s. on proper business, and 15s. on agency business. That term fee does not attach till after declaration is delivered in a case.

12,223. How many term fees may there be in the course of a case? Mr. Hodgson.—There may be a great many. The case goes on to trial, and there may be a motion for a new trial, and an appeal to the Exchequer Chamber; it may go on for two years, and there are four terms in the year. We only allow a term fee where a step is taken in the cause that term.

12,224. The Chairman.—What staff have you in your office? Mr. Hodgson.—In the Court of Queen's Bench there are 5 Masters, and we have 23 clerks. There is a certain number of clerks in the department of issuing the writ. Mr. Benett.—In the Court of Common Pleas there are 5 Masters, and I think we have 16 or 18 clerks. Mr. Walton.—We have five Masters, and 16 or 17 clerks. Mr. Hodgson.—The reason why the Queen's Bench has a larger staff is, that there is some peculiar business belonging to it. We have the whole enrolment and admission of attorneys. We have the registration of bills of sale, occupying 3 or 4 clerks exclusively, and warrants of attorney.

12,225. Are your clerks all on the same footing? Mr. Hodgson.—No; they are in different classes with reference to salary. Our chief clerk receives from £600 to £700 a year, and the junior clerks £100.

12,226. Is there one chief clerk? Mr. Hodgson.—Yes. Then there are three first-class clerks at from £500 to £600; and there is a certain number in the second class.

12,227. The Master's own payment is by salary? Mr. Hodgson.—Yes,—£1500 a year; there is an exception introduced into the Act, that a Master appointed since our increase has only £1200 a year for the first three years.

12,228. The Lord Justice-General.—What is the qualification for a Master? Mr. Hodgson.—He must be a barrister, a special pleader, or an attorney of five years' standing.

12,229. The Chairman.—Who appoints them? Mr. Hodgson.—The Chief Justice of each court; he appoints the Masters of his own court.

12,230. Mr. Webster.—Do they hold office for life? Mr. Hodgson.—Yes.

12,231. The Chairman.—Who appoints the clerks? Mr. Walton.—The appointment is by the Masters, subject to the approbation of the chief of the court.

12,232. Mr. Shand.—Is the registrar of each court a separate officer? Mr. Walton.—We have no registrar. Mr. Hodgson.—I may say the Masters in the common law courts perform all the duties that are performed by all the officers connected with the Court of Chancery,—chief clerks, examiners, registrars, and taxing masters. We perform them all.

12,233. Do you write out the orders of court? Mr. Walton.—Our clerks do.

12,234. Who attends the judges in court? Mr. Walton.—We attend the judges.

12,235. By whom are the orders written out? Mr. Hodgson.—The rules are written out by our clerk, and given out to the parties.

12,236. Mr. Gordon.—The orders by the common law courts are merely formal; they do not recite documents? Mr. Hodgson.—No.

12,237. Mr. Shand.—Does the judge sign anything in court? Mr. Hodgson.—No; it is all signed by the Master or the Master's clerk. Mr. Walton.—The counsel, after hearing the decision, indorse on the back of their briefs what the judgment is, and that is handed to the Master. If their notes differ from the Master's, he settles the rule from his own notes, or, if necessary, applies to the court for directions.

12,238. Lord Barcaple.—Is the Master present in court? Mr. Walton.—Yes.

12,239. And he makes a note of it? Mr. Walton.—Yes.

12,240. Mr. Shand.—When you have references and other matters, can you attend court? Mr. Hodgson.—Yes; one Master has to be at court, and one at judge's chambers; that leaves three. We generally keep one Master clear for taxation of costs.

12,241. The Chairman.—Are there any fees payable into your offices? Mr. Hodgson.—Very large fees. Almost everything pays fees, and they are now received in stamps. The amount of them appears in the judicial statistics.

12,242. Mr. Shand.—What is the average usual amount of fees? Mr. Benett.—You pay 5s. on a writ; 2s. for the appearance. The plaintiff pays £2 to the associate for entering the cause, and when it is heard he pays £1 more for the postea. Judgment is entered on that; and he pays 10s. in the Master's office for that judgment. All the payments necessarily made by the plaintiff are then at an end. He may have to pay 5s. more for the execution.

12,243. If there are interlocutory orders made?—Mr. Benett.—They are made at judge's chambers, and there is a fee of 2s. on every matter of course order; 5s. for a special order; 2s. on the summons issued when the order is made; and 1s. on every affidavit filed in support of the summons.

12,244. Mr. Webster.—By each party? Mr. Benett.—Each party who files an affidavit pays 1s. for filing it, and 1s. for swearing it.

12,245. What are the fees paid on the part of the defendant? Mr. Benett.—He pays 2s. when he enters appearance, and that is all he need do as matter of course in the Master's office. He then rests on his oars till the plaintiff has got his judgment; but if he wants time to plead, or makes any other application, that is made at the judge's chambers, and he pays 2s. for the summons, and 2s. or 5s. for the order. Mr. Walton.—I think £5 will cover all fees paid on both sides in our office up to a trial. The fee at trial is about £3.

12,246. Lord Barcaple.—In addition? Mr. Walton.—Yes.

12,247. Mr. Gordon.—Have you fees depending on the amount, or is it the same fee on everything? Mr. Walton.—It is the same fee on everything.

12,248. Mr. Justice Willes.—The reason for the heavy fees on trial was that so many causes come to an end before trial, and it was thought more reasonable that those who took up less of the time of the court should pay less? Mr. Benett.—I believe the real reason was the difficulty of getting the fees paid.

12,249. The Lord Justice-General.—You have mentioned an officer called the associate. Tell us what he is? Mr. Walton.—He attends the judge at nisi prius when the case is tried, and he has the care of the list in which it is entered before it is tried; and after it is tried he prepares the postea, and gives it to the party in whose favour it is. He is the officer of the nisi prius judge.

12,250. Mr. Justice Willes.—He enters the verdict? Mr. Walton.—Yes.

12,251. The Lord Justice-General.—Has he any duties except in connection with the trial? Mr. Walton.—No.

12,252. The Chairman.—He is an officer of court? Mr. Walton.—Yes.

12,253. Is there one in each court? Mr. Walton.—Yes.

12,254. Who appoints him? Mr. Walton.—The Chief Justice.

12,255. Mr. Shand.—How many associates are there altogether? Mr. Walton.—Only one in each court in London, and he has a deputy when two courts are sitting.

12,256. What salary have they? Mr. Walton.—£1000 a year.

12,257. These are officers besides those you mentioned before? Mr. Walton.—Yes.

12,258. The Lord Justice-General.—The associate does not go on circuit? Mr. Walton.—Not the London associate.

12,259. Who discharges the corresponding duties on circuit? Mr. Walton.—There are clerks of assize, and judges' marshals generally receive the records. Mr. Justice Willes.—Not now; the clerk of assize now receives the records.

12,260. Mr. Gordon.—How many clerks of assize are there? Mr. Hodgson.—One for each county.

12,261. What salary has he? Mr. Benett.—The salaries vary.

12,262. Mr. Shand.—Besides the masters, the associates, and clerks whom you have mentioned, are there any other officers assisting in the judicial duties? Mr. Benett.—Not in London. Mr. Walton.—There are the judges' clerks at chambers.

12,263. These are in addition to those you have mentioned? Mr. Walton.—Yes.

12,264. How many of these are there? Mr. Hodgson.—Each judge has two clerks, and the Chief Justice has three.

12,265. How many is that altogether in the London courts? Mr. Benett.—There are now six judges in each court. Mr. Hodgson.—There are thirty-nine judges' clerks altogether.

12,266. What are their salaries? Mr. Walton.—I think the highest is £600 a year.

12,267. Mr. Justice Willes.—The Chief Justice's chief clerk gets £700 a year, and his other two clerks £400. What is the practice as to the allowance to witnesses who have been subpœnaed, but not examined? Mr. Benett.—We don't disallow them merely because they have not been examined. We inquire into the necessity of having them present. If it appears that it was reasonable to have them present, and the attorney swears that they were material and necessary, we allow them.

12,268. The rule in the common law courts, I think, is the same as in Chancery as to affidavits,—only the affidavits read are allowed? Mr. Benett.—Yes.

12,269. But as to witnesses, you allow them if they are reasonable witnesses to have present, even though they have not actually been examined? Mr. Walton.—Just so.

12,270. The Lord Justice-General.—Have you two scales of costs, or only one? Mr. Benett.—Now there is only one. Before the last County Court Act there were two,—one for actions under £20, and one for actions over £20.

12,271. Is there a practice of allowing refreshing fees to counsel where a cause is heard on more days than one? Mr. Benett.—No, not eo nomine. If, as the result of the whole matter, we think the first fee was not enough, we let it be increased; but we don't let them be called refreshers. Mr. Hodgson.—I think what we agreed to is that we allow refreshers in a case which is really more than a single day case. If the cause begins to-day, and goes into to-morrow, that is not necessarily a second day cause. We allow a limited fee—10 guineas being the highest—to the leader, 7 guineas to the second, and 5 guineas to the junior, as refreshers, supposing there are three counsel. But the Master is at liberty to take into consideration the fee originally marked on the brief, and if he considers that the fee marked on the brief is sufficient to cover all, he disallows the refreshers; but if the fee originally marked on the brief was such as was proper in contemplation of the cause only lasting one day, we should allow a refresher. That is our practice. Mr. Benett.—That is not exactly our practice.

12,272. What is the length of a day; how many hours? Mr. Benett.—At nisi prius, from 10 to 5 or 6. That is the longest day.

12,273. Supposing the case goes into a second day, but lasts only a small portion of it? Mr. Hodgson.—Then I should not allow a refresher. It is matter of discretion.

12,274. Then the refresher you speak of—10 guineas, 7, and 5—is only in case of the cause occupying two whole days? Mr. Hodgson.—Yes; and those fees are the maximum.

12,275. Lord Barcaple.—Do you apply that in the event of a case lasting eight or ten days? Mr. Hodgson.—I don't think any of us have taxed Saurin v Starr yet.

12,276. The Lord Justice-General.—But you must have had occasion to tax causes lasting for more than two days? Mr. Benett.—Yes.

12,277. Mr. Shand.—Suppose the case lasts a substantial part of the second day? Mr. Hodgson.—I should allow a refresher, provided the fee on the brief is not marked as for a case that would last two days.

12,278. Mr. Webster.—As between party and party, what is the highest fee you allow for junior counsel for a case likely to last one day? Mr. Hodgson.—That depends entirely on the nature of the case and the quantity of documents. Sometimes cases involve masses of documents. Sometimes 25 or 30 guineas are allowed on the brief.

12,279. Mr. Adam.—How many counsel are allowed as a charge against the opposite party? Mr. Hodgson.—We don't allow more than two counsel on each side, unless there are a great number of witnesses or documents. Generally we say that under ten witnesses we will not allow three counsel. I don't mean to say that we should allow three because of there being ten witnesses, unless it were an ejectment case or a pedigree case.

12,280. The Lord Justice-General.—There seems to be some difference in the Court of Common Pleas as to the matter of refreshers? Mr. Benett.—It comes nearly to the same thing. When refreshers are paid, we don't allow them as refreshers; but if we think the fee at first paid for the work done is not sufficient, we increase it. Whenever a fee is paid, the attorney is entitled to a fee for attendance himself, and we don't allow the subsequent attendances of the attorney to pay the refreshers. Suppose a brief marked 20 guineas, and 10 guineas are afterwards paid as refreshers, and I thought 30 guineas was no more than ought to have been paid to counsel in the first instance, I should allow the 30, but only one attorney's attendance, in place of two. Mr. Walton.—The reason why we allowed fees of the nature of refreshers was this, that it was rather an inducement to the attorney not to assume to himself marking a very high fee, on the assumption that the cause would last five or six days. We said, we will rather give you something in the shape of a refresher, if, when the case is tried, we have ascertained that the fee is deserved; but you must not yourself discriminate, and say this cause will last five days, and therefore we will give a hundred guineas. Mr. Hodgson.—I believe the whole system of refreshers has grown up gradually. I think I have heard it said that the late Mr. Justice Cresswell used to have a very strong opinion against refreshers, and thought they were wrong. They have grown up gradually.

12,281. Mr. Clark.—That was when he was on the bench, I presume? Mr. Hodgson.—No; when he was at the bar.

12,282. Mr. Justice Willes.—I think I recollect a time when more refreshers were allowed in the Queen's Bench,—when a cause did not come on for two years, and there ought to have been refreshers for every term during these two years? Mr. Hodgson.—The question has not been asked as to these refreshers.

12,283. When I was first called to the bar there were ridiculous refreshers from term to term. Mr. Hodgson.—These go on now. Supposing a cause is set down for trial one term, and from the multitude of causes it is made a remanet, and goes into Easter term, a refreshing fee is paid to counsel; and if it goes on to Trinity term, another refresher is paid; and again, supposing a new trial is moved for, and the case goes over a year, there is to the leader 2 guineas and to the junior 1 guinea refresher for every term, the reason being that he had prepared himself for one term, and the case has gone out of his mind.

12,284. The Lord Justice-General.—That fee is a fixed sum, without considering the weight or difficulty of the cause? Mr. Hodgson.—Yes. Mr. Benett.—That is not if a cause goes over from one assize to another. The Master must use his discretion. Mr. Hodgson.—It is very seldom that they go from one assize to the other.

12,285. Mr. Shand.—It may sometimes lead to change of counsel? Mr. Hodgson.—Yes.

12,286. The Lord Justice-General.—With reference to arguments in banc, does the same remark apply as to refreshers de die in diem? Mr. Hodgson.—No.

12,287. What is the rule there? Mr. Hodgson.—Only from term to term.

12,288. Then there are no refreshers de die in diem in such cases—in arguments? Mr. Hodgson.—No.

12,289. Suppose a brief is delivered, with a fee marked upon it, and the argument lasts over the first day and occupies an entire second day, is that a ground for a refresher? Mr. Hodgson.—No; I should say not. Mr. Benett.—Exactly in the same way as refreshers on the trial: if the Master does not think the first fee sufficient, he increases it.

12,290. Then they look on an argument in court as the same as a trial? Mr. Hodgson.—I never knew a case in which it was increased. Mr. Benett.—I have known several.

12,291. Mr. Shand.—Suppose an argument has been longer than was anticipated, and lasts two days? Mr. Hodgson.—It is not often these things occur. Of course the Master has a general discretion in the matter.

12,292. The Chairman.—What is the rule in regard to the fees of scientific witnesses? Mr. Hodgson.—The allowance to witnesses between party and party is taxed upon a scale sanctioned by the judges. For professional witnesses, if they are living in town, it is a guinea a day; if it is a country case, it is from 1 guinea to 3. That is the limit.

12,293. Do you, in taxing the accounts, exercise any control as to the number of such witnesses that you will allow to either side? Mr. Hodgson.—Certainly. If you are satisfied that they have had too many witnesses, you will disallow them; but one is always liberal. If it was outrageously too many—more than was reasonably necessary—you would disallow them.

12,294. Mr. Webster.—Is there any allowance to them for preparation? Mr. Hodgson.—No, not between party and party. If a witness qualifies to give evidence, it must be done at the expense of the party.

12,295. Mr. Adam.—Does any case come before the public court in which only one counsel is allowed against the opposite party? Mr. Hodgson.—Very often only one counsel is employed. In undefended cases we should not allow a second counsel.

12,296. But there is no particular class of cases to which that applies? Mr. Hodgson.—Do you mean with reference to the subject-matter?

12,297. I mean in appeals from the County Court? Mr. Hodgson.—Only one counsel can be heard in the special paper—on demurrers.

12,298. Mr. Webster.—After the argument in a cause has commenced, is it the custom of the court to hear out that cause before taking any other; or does it allow the argument to be interrupted, and take up other cases? Mr. Hodgson.—A list is made out of the cases before the court; and if a case is called on, it is heard and finished, but sometimes the court take time to consider. Mr. Benett.—But there may be a special paper day intervening, and then the argument on the new trial would go over that special paper day.

12,299. Lord Barcaple.—Is there not an interval of time in the morning, when motions are taken? Mr. Benett.—Yes; on all open days, as they are termed, they begin with unopposed motions; and as soon as all the unopposed motions are heard, they take the opposed motions.

12,300. Then the unopposed motions would come before the continued cause? Mr. Benett.—Yes.

12,301. And nothing else? Mr. Benett.—Nothing else. It does happen that an opposed motion takes an immense time. I have known it take the greater part of the morning.

12,302. Mr. Shand.—Does it happen often in your experience, that a cause is continued three, four, or five times before it is disposed of? Mr. Benett.—Do you mean adjourned over certain days?

12,303. Yes; partly heard to-day, to-morrow, and a third day? Mr. Benett.—I remember one which was partly heard on seven different days. That was the case of Mr. Kennedy. Mr. Hodgson.—This not unfrequently happens, that an argument in a case, either on special paper days, or in a new trial case, commences to-day at two, and the court rises at four, and it may be some considerable time before it comes on, because next day one of the judges has to be away; and I have known it go on over a term in consequence. But when it is called on, it generally finishes at the second hearing. Mr. Benett.—We had one case in the Common Pleas this term, which was heard on three days.

12,304. But that is not very usual? Mr. Benett.—No.

12,305. Mr. Justice Willes.—You said just now, that, with the exception of special paper days, the unopposed motions are taken first; but an argument for a new trial is liable to be interrupted, not only by the unopposed motions, but also by the round of opposed motions taken after the unopposed motions. That is so, is it not? Mr. Benett.—Yes; the opposed motions would also be taken before the argument.

12,306. I have known the argument on a new trial taken up in bits, on several days? Mr. Benett.—That is so. Mr. Walton.—That sometimes happens in our court. Mr. Benett.—There was a case this term which went on one day, half an hour on a second day, and another a third day.

THE LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL IN THE CHAIR.

ROBERT CHEERE, Esq., examined.

Robert Cheere.

12,307. The Chairman.—What office do you hold?—I am registrar of Clerkenwell County Court of Middlesex.

12,308. How long has that court been in existence?—Since 1847—since the General County Court Act.

12,309. Have you been registrar long?—For the whole time.

12,310. You have had a great deal of experience, then, of the working of that jurisdiction?—I have not been absent one day.

12,311. Will you explain to us, in the first place, what are the limits of the jurisdiction?—It was originally for debts up to £20; but now £50 is the extreme limit.

12,312. Within the term 'debts' what is included?—All money obligations and rents to the amount of £50.

12,313. Not actions for damages?—Yes; actions for damages to the amount of £50.

12,314. In short, all money claims up to £50?—Yes.

12,315. Is there any other jurisdiction they have, which is not measured by money?—We have a qualified jurisdiction in ejectments. Where the term has expired, and possession has not been given up, we have power to order it to be given up; and where rent has not been paid, and there is a right of re-entry in the contract of hiring, we can, on non-payment of the rent, order possession to be given up.

12,316. What is the limit of that?—£50 of rent; but the jurisdiction is unqualified up to £20 annual value.

12,317. Is there any other common law jurisdiction?—None that immediately occurs to me.

12,318. You have also an equitable jurisdiction?—Yes; the equity jurisdiction has been put on us now for two or three years.

12,319. Mr. Justice Willes.—You have replevin?—Yes; but that is a remnant of the old shrievalty duty that is cast on me as registrar; and the people who bring actions of replevin, have the option of taking them to the court at Westminster, or the local court. I simply do the duty of taking the sureties.

12,320. The Chairman.—Would you explain what that is?—It is where a distress for rent is made, and the person disputes the right to make the distress. It is part of my official duty, upon their giving me security for the rent, to order the person distraining to re-deliver the goods, and then they bring an action for the distress, or rather to try the right of the distress.

12,321. Mr. Justice Willes.—There are certain exceptions to the common law jurisdiction of the County Courts; for instance, you don't take actions of slander?—We do not; nor actions for criminal conversation. There are some few exceptions that we do not take any cognisance of.

12,322. Slander, libel, seduction, and breach of promise of marriage?—Yes; we don't take these.

12,323. Nor malicious prosecution?—Nor malicious prosecution. I think we would take an action of damages for false imprisonment.

12,324. You don't take actions in which the title to land is involved?—Where the title to land is involved, we have no jurisdiction, except where the annual value does not exceed £20.

12,325. Mr. Adam.—In a case of ejectment, if the title to land was raised, would you go on to decide the case?—No; we could not proceed. We are expressly prohibited from doing so. The parties would have to go to one of the courts at Westminster. Or if the action were more than the £50, we could not proceed.

12,326. Mr. Clark.—How do you ascertain the amount?—The parties allege it in taking out their proceedings, or the objection would be taken on the hearing.

12,327. But if the defendant says it is worth £60?—He must prove it.

12,328. If there is a dispute, do you go into evidence of value?—I suppose we should be obliged to do so if it was raised; but it is seldom raised.

12,329. Mr. Justice Willes.—A plaintiff may say, 'The defendant owes me £1,000. I abandon £950, and proceed for the £50 rather than go to another court?'—Yes.

12,330. The Chairman.—What is the equitable jurisdiction?—It is a very curious thing that it was expected that that would be a very large jurisdiction; but though it has been in vogue for three years, we have only had twenty-nine cases, of which about ten or twelve have been disputed. Our jurisdiction in matters of an equitable character extends up to £500.

12,331. What sort of suits would be brought under that jurisdiction?—Partnership accounts, trusteeships, and ordinary equitable rights and interests. There are very few exceptions.

12,332. Interests in land?—Not in interests in land directly. They would not necessarily be the subject of an equity suit.

12,333. Mr. Campbell.—In questions between executors and beneficiaries under an ordinary will, would you have jurisdiction?—Yes, we should take the account of an estate; and that is one of the principal businesses we have. A creditor alleges that the estate is wasted, and files his bill to take the account, and we take it.

12,334. The Chairman.—And that up to £500?—Yes.

12,335. But suppose, when the suit is in existence, it turns out, on the account being made, that the estate exceeds £500?—We take fright immediately, and send it to the Court of Chancery. But sometimes the Court of Chancery send it back again, and say, 'You are going on so well that we will remit it to you in another point of view.' They have power to send back anything they like to us.

12,336. Mr. Campbell.—In such a case are the proceedings which have taken place before you up to the point when it is ascertained that the amount exceeds £500, lost altogether; or have you the power of transferring the proceeding to the Court of Chancery, that they may take it up where you have stopped?—That depends on the feeling of the Court of Chancery. We should take up the proceedings where they leave them, if it were under £500, and there had been an investigation by the Court of Chancery; but we cannot say what they would do with us. They would probably think that we had not done it quite properly.

12,337. Mr. Webster.—What do you do when you stop your proceedings, so as to send what you have done to the Court of Chancery?—The registrar certifies that the subject-matter is beyond the jurisdiction, and the court sends the proceedings to the Court of Chancery. We refuse to go on. We say, 'This is beyond our jurisdiction, and you must take such steps as the law entitles you to do.'

12,338. The Chairman.—You say that this jurisdiction has belonged to the County Court for three years?—Yes, for two or three years; but it is very little resorted to in London. It is much more useful in the country.

12,339. Mr. Gordon.—How far is the jurisdiction of the County Courts exclusive of or concurrent with the jurisdiction of the Supreme Courts?—In what respect?

12,340. May you not bring your suit before the common law courts as well as before the County Courts?—I think not. At any rate, it would be at the risk of getting no costs; and that has a very deterring influence. If an equity suit in which we had jurisdiction was brought in the Court of Chancery, I believe it would be sent to us.

12,341. The Chairman.—The question rather referred to the common law jurisdiction, I think?—A judge may say that a thing is proper to be tried before one of the courts at Westminster.

12,342. Up to what point?—£20.

12,343. Then if any man brings a suit in the common law courts at Westminster for a sum under £20, would he not succeed in getting his costs?—That would depend on the character of the action. If he could induce the judge at chambers to say it was fit to be tried there, he would get his costs.

12,344. In an action involving character, for instance?—That would hardly come to us.

12,345. Lord Barcaple.—Or it may rule other cases?—It is a discretionary power.

12,346. Mr. Baxter.—If he does not get a certificate, he would not get his costs?—No.

12,347. Lord Barcaple.—Is there not a peculiarity in cases between £20 and £50?—There is a larger power of appeal.

12,348. But is there no difference as to the jurisdiction of the court?—None that I know of.

12,349. Mr. Justice Willes.—Before the last County Court Act, up to £20 there were no costs in an action brought in the superior court, unless the court, in the special circumstances, thought that there ought to be costs?—That is so.

12,350. I am under the impression that the last County Court Act left a concurrent jurisdiction between £20 and £50?—That is my impression.

12,351. There was a distinction between the London and the other courts. In the London courts it required an order for costs up to £20?—Yes; but I think that is altered now.

12,352. The Chairman.—What, in your opinion, is the cause of the County Courts being so little resorted to under their equitable jurisdiction?—It is of course only an individual opinion, but my impression is, that it is because the expense of it is so great. I will give you the figures accurately. In an estate not exceeding £300 in the whole, I think I taxed the costs of the two parties that were before me at over £60. Now, that is a very serious matter. It was not the fees that did it, though the fees are high, but there are certain allowances made to the profession in the shape of costs; and unless one is very particular in saying, 'We must go on from hour to hour investigating these accounts,' they will say, 'We have not evidence to prove that this was of a particular value.' They delay, and get repeated appointments; and being paid by the hour, that swells up the account. The estate which I mentioned was not over £300, and the taxed costs were £60 or thereabouts.

12,353. Lord Barcaple.—Is there another remedy that the party can seek which is cheaper?—None that is cheaper; but I think the procedure before the chief clerks at chambers is somewhat cheaper than ours would be. As far as I could judge, it was the object to make the County Courts in a measure pay themselves.

12,354. The result of parties not coming to you is that they go to Chancery?—I take it for granted that they do.

12,355. The Chairman.—And such suits as you would have had in the County Court will generally, I suppose, go to the chief clerks?—All of them, no doubt. They would hardly be heard before the judge.

12,356. Mr. Campbell.—Do you think that in the country it is probable that the County Courts may be considerably more resorted to than the court of Clerkenwell, to suit the convenience of parties?—Exactly; that is the reason.

12,357. The Chairman.—You have no particular knowledge of that yourself, I suppose?—I have not; but I incline to think that the equitable jurisdiction has not been appreciated by litigants generally.

12,358. But you think it has been more resorted to in the country than in London?—I think so; though I cannot give positive evidence of that.

12,359. Mr. Campbell.—There is one other department of duty devolving on the County Court judges—namely, bankruptcy?—We have none of that in London.

12,360. But the County Courts in England generally entertain such questions?—They do.

12,361. You know nothing about the extent of their interference in these questions?—I do not; but I believe it is identical with the jurisdiction of the Commissioners in London. The reason is that there is the Bankruptcy Court here, and there is no necessity for the interference of the County Courts in that matter.

12,362. Mr. Gordon.—What constitutes jurisdiction in favour of a County Court judge—that is to say, suppose the plaintiff resides in his jurisdiction, and the defendant does not?—You follow the defendant. The primary jurisdiction is where the defendant resides or carries on his business. But by leave of the judge or registrar, on stating that the cause of action arose in the jurisdiction of the plaintiff, we can give leave if we see fit; and I am bound to tell the Commission that the decisions recently in the courts at Westminster have been that a very small part of the cause of action is enough. For instance, a man orders goods in the country to be sent by railway, and the question is, Where is the jurisdiction? There is a decision, I think, in the Common Pleas, to the effect that if a railway carrier's cart calls on its ordinary rounds, in gathering up the goods, at the plaintiff's residence for them, that is the delivery of them in London, and gives the jurisdiction; and I am also bound to say that that decision has been most beneficial to the trading community, and they have availed themselves largely of it.

12,363. The Chairman.—That is very much for the convenience of plaintiffs?—It is.

12,364. Is it equally so for the convenience of the defendant?—I suppose not, but one-fourth part of the cases are not really disputed.

12,365. They are chiefly undefended cases?—Yes.

12,366. Mr. Gordon.—Suppose the plaintiff resides at some distance from the defendant, is he obliged to bring his action before the County Court of the defendant's residence, or is he not entitled to go to the Supreme Court?—Not now; he must go to the defendant's residence.

12,367. Within what amount?—£20, certainly.

12,368. And above that?—I believe he would go to the courts at Westminster.

12,369. And in that case he would recover costs?—I presume he would.

12,370. The Chairman.—Would you explain how a case is proceeded with in the County Court?—Any person having a debt due to him would come to my office, and there would be handed to him a paper to fill up, containing a space for the name of the plaintiff and his occupation, the name of the defendant and his occupation, and the amount of the claim. That would be handed to the clerk, who would give him what we call a plaint note, which would contain the day on which he was to appear to prosecute the suit. That plaint would be entered in a book called the plaint-book, and we should draw a summons and a copy of that plaint for the defendant. The summons would contain just a short statement of what was the alleged grievance. If it was above £2, it would be something that the plaintiff had left with us in his own handwriting: if it was under £2, it would be the duty of my clerk shortly to say in the summons, 'For goods sold,' or 'For rent,' or 'For wages.' If it is above £2, there are particulars of the claim required, and that is analogous to a tradesman's bill or a copy of a bill of exchange to be attached to the summons. They prepare that.

12,371. Who prepares it?—The plaintiff himself. He brings the particulars of his claim.

12,372. Mr. Gordon.—Or his attorney?—Or his attorney or agent,—anybody employed for him. This would be attached to the summons; which would only then contain in reality the day when he would be expected to appear and defend it, and it would state that the particulars are hereunto annexed.

12,373. What fee is paid?—The fee is 1s. in the pound, with 1s. over, on claims above 40s., which originally was meant to cover the expense of the court,—the building,—a sort of building fund as it was called in the first Act of Parliament. But 1s. in the pound is the fee, and we take no notice of fractions of pounds; that is to say, if you sue for £3, 4s., we should take 4s. for the summons, and 1s. for the building fund fee.

12,374. The Chairman.—You take the sum over the fraction?—Yes; if it was exactly £2, the fee would be 2s.; but if it was £2, 0s. 6d., it would be 4s. I often say to poor people when they come to the office, that it is a pity they don't strike out the 6d., as it makes a difference of 1s. on the summons, and 2s. on the hearing.

12,375. Mr. Gordon.—Does that fee cover all the subsequent proceedings?—Certainly not.

12,376. Mr. Webster.—Would you tell us about the serving?—The summonses are handed to a bailiff.

12,377. Mr. Clark:—By whom?—By the registrar. He sends the whole batch into the bailiff's office, and I not unfrequently take a hundred of them in a day. We make a copy, and the bailiff has the original summons and a copy; and his duty is to serve it ten clear days, in such a way as will satisfy the judge's mind that it really came to the defendant's notice. Ordinarily he goes to where the defendant lodges, and gives it to his wife.

12,378. Mr. Baxter.—Can no other person but a bailiff serve?—No other person.

12,379. The Chairman.—What is the cost of service?—That is included in the fee for the summons. We do not charge anything for serving as such.

12,380. In short, the court undertakes the service and charges nothing for it?—The court charges nothing for it, and finds the officer for it. I should say that that does not give so much satisfaction as you may think, because sometimes parties say, 'May we not serve our own summons?' But we almost invariably refuse that, unless we know the man very well; and then I ask the high bailiff to make him his officer for that specific purpose.

12,381. Mr. Campbell.—We have a form in Scotland which has given some dissatisfaction to the public, and which is known as the lock-hole execution,—that is to say, the officer of court proceeds to the dwelling-house of the defender, and finding that he is not at home, and that there is no person in the house when he calls, he knocks at the door, and inserts in the key-hole, or latch of the door, a copy of the writ which he is called on to serve, and he makes an execution to that effect: have you anything equivalent to that?—Not quite equivalent to that; but if the bailiff finds the door shut, and he believes it is shut for the purpose of evading the service, he can attach it to the door. But he must believe there is some one there, and that the door is shut to prevent the service. I should say it is not a good service if he had nailed it on the door, and had not gone on to swear that he believed the door was shut to avoid service.

12,382. Mr. Gordon.—What kind of substituted service have you in such a case as that?—None.

12,383. Is there no remedy?—None. It must come to the defendant's notice in some shape.

12,384. Mr. Webster.—Does the bailiff make an execution?—The bailiff indorses on the copy of the summons the day and mode of service, and that is handed back to the office, and is placed in the heap before me for hearing. I see, therefore, how it is done. They don't indorse it very fully, but 'on wife,' with the date; and then I know that it has been served on the party's wife, and I presume that she gave it to her husband.

12,385. The Chairman.—You cite defendants in all parts of the country in this way?—Yes.

12,386. Not merely in London, but all over England?—All over England.

12,387. Suppose the officer finds, when he goes to the defendant's house, that he has removed into another part of England, does he follow him there?—No; he returns the summons to us; it is not served.

12,388. Then what do you do?—We leave them to reissue the summons. There is very seldom time enough to reissue it to another court.

12,389. Mr. Webster.—Does your 4s. fee cover service over any part of England?—Yes; but there is a mileage, I believe, in the country allowed to the bailiff by the Treasury.

12,390. The Chairman.—The court does not pay the travelling expenses of the bailiff going to Northumberland?—No; it must be sent to the County Court of Northumberland. If I give leave to a man to issue a summons at Northumberland, I send it myself to the bailiff's office in Northumberland.

12,391. Mr. Justice Willes.—The plaintiff requires leave to sue a person out of the jurisdiction of the court in which he brings the action?—He does.

12,392. The Chairman.—When he sues a person out of the jurisdiction of your court, are the fees any higher?—No. I have taken out the number of plaints in this last year, and the average amount of them, and I find that in 1868 I issued 15,396 summonses, and the amount sued for was £45,683; the average of that would be about £2, 19s. 4d. a plaint. They came on for hearing, and orders were made in 9196 cases,—orders for payment, or judgments for the defendant. In those cases the plaint was disposed of judicially. What became of the difference between the 9196 and the 15,396, I don't know; they were probably settled between the parties. The amount for which orders were made in the 9196 cases was £24,528. The average of that was £2, 13s. 4d., without any costs,—without the percentage fee, or the attorney's or witnesses' fees; so that the average of the summonses issued was £2, 19s. 4d., and the average of those heard and disposed of was £2, 13s. 4d. That is an anomaly which I was not aware of till I had the list made out to-day; and I cannot explain it, because the larger the amount the more often they are disputed, though that does not appear to be so. The fees of court on all the proceedings in my court for one year amounted to £6347. That was the amount received by Government, and £6271, 9s. 3d. was the whole expense of the court; so that we pay our way.

12,393. Mr. Webster.—What fees does the defendant pay to the court?—He pays the whole if he loses, unless the judge does not give costs.

12,394. Has he any fee to pay to the court on making appearance?—No; none whatever.

12,395. The Chairman.—Can you tell us in how many cases the defendant appeared?—I have not got that here, but I can send to the Commission a copy of the return which I made last year. I stated that the fees which the Government desire us to take amounted to £6347, but that is exclusive of what we allow on taxation to attorneys and witnesses; and the amount that was allowed to attorneys and witnesses was only £1257.

12,396. Mr. Baxter.—When the defendant does not appear, what is your proceeding?—The plaintiff proves the debt before me satisfactorily, so that I can conscientiously say it is due. They don't go to the judge. A recent Act of Parliament gives me jurisdiction to hear them. I always have had reasonably strict proof, and I have heard probably nine-tenths of these cases. The parties grumble when I tell them they must prove the sale and delivery of the goods; but I will not take mere admissions.

Robert Cheere.

12,397. You won't give a decree in absence without any proof at all?—No; I won't do so till I am made to do so by the superior courts.

12,398. The Chairman.—Is that done in any of the County Courts?—I think that it is a pity that it is done; but I have heard this take place: 'Have you seen the defendant?' 'Yes.' 'Did he promise to pay?' 'Yes.' Now I think that is hardly to be justified.

12,399. Lord Barcaple.—Does the party say that on oath?—Yes.

12,400. Mr. Campbell.—Assuming one of these debts to be proved before you in the absence of the defendant, has the defendant any opportunity of having the case re-heard?—He must make a very strong application to the court.

12,401. He must show special cause?—Yes.

12,402. Mr. Gordon.—Within what time?—I think there is a limit of seven days.

12,403. Suppose no court is sitting?—He may file an affidavit. If I was satisfied that there was any doubt, I should suspend any proceeding on the judgment that I had so given.

12,404. Have you the power to suspend?—I should do it if I were satisfied; but as we sit every week, nothing arises on that.

12,405. When execution issues, is it done under your direction?—No. Parties bespeak the execution. Some time elapses between the order for payment and enforcing it. Generally I give a month. I suppose I must have made at least 500 orders payable on 24th May, and they have all this time to apply to the judge.

12,406. What notice does the defendant get that judgment has been pronounced against him?—An order is sent to him by post the same night from my office.

12,407. Stating that judgment has been given against him?—A copy of the order which he has to obey, and which he must bring with him when he pays the money.

12,408. The Chairman.—And that is addressed to the house at which the summons was served?—Yes.

12,409. Mr. Campbell.—And sent the same night?—Yes; or at any rate next day.

12,410. Suppose the case is first heard in the roll of court on a court day, and the defendant appears, what is the course of proceeding adopted?—I ask the parties if they are the plaintiff and the defendant, and then I ask the defendant if he admits the debt. If he says 'No,' and both parties are willing that I should, then I swear the plaintiff, and he begins to prove his case. I ask all the questions myself. I ask, 'Was the defendant a tenant of yours?' 'What was his rent?' 'What did he occupy?' 'When did he leave?' 'How much was due when he left?' and I take a short note for my own guidance. Then I hear what the defendant says.

12,411. Lord Barcaple.—On oath?—Yes. I ask him, 'Did you occupy the rooms?' harking back over the plaintiff's evidence, and getting it all confirmed as to the facts. He may say that the house was very bad and not fit for occupation, or that the plaintiff promised to forgive him the rent, or some nonsense of that sort.

12,412. Mr. Campbell.—The sums sued for vary from 1s. to £50?—Yes.

12,413. Is there any distinction between cases of the lower and higher amounts as to the right to employ counsel or attorney?—Anybody may employ counsel or attorney in anything, but we should not allow counsel or attorney in any case under £5.

12,414. The Chairman.—You would not allow the costs, you mean?—Yes; that is what I mean.

12,415. Do you always allow it above £5?—Not always. If there is any dispute, the basis of our proceeding is this: if we find the attorney has written for the debt, and the defendant has not acknowledged the letter, or filed an admission of the debt in court, which he has the privilege of doing five clear days before the hearing, then we allow the attorney. The cost of the attorney is 15s. up to £20. It is a fixed sum.

12,416. Mr. Webster.—Where there is counsel, what is the cost?—£1, 3s. 6d. up to £20, and we can give £3, 5s. 6d. to counsel, including his clerk's fee, in cases above £20.

12,417. Mr. Gordon.—Does the system of having a certain fixed fee to the attorneys give satisfaction?—I think, upon the whole, it does.

12,418. The Chairman.—What class of attorneys practise in the County Courts? Are they the same class that practise in the superior courts?—I am afraid not.

12,419. Mr. Campbell.—But sometimes, I suppose, very respectable attorneys, from consideration for their clients, do appear?—Very often most respectable attorneys; and they bring a batch of cases.

12,420. It may be worth the while of a very competent and respectable young attorney who has a batch of cases?—Yes; and a respectable attorney may make £400 or £500 a year out of the County Court. He is useful to the court and to the suitor; and he is always useful to the court if he is useful to the suitor.

12,421. Is there an obligation on the plaintiff or defendant to attend on the calling of their cases in court?—No.

12,422. But if the opposite party thinks the presence of his opponent essential, I suppose the court will continue the case?—We should say, 'You ought to have subpœnaed him if you wanted him as a witness; and if you have not taken steps to bring him here, the case must be adjourned, and the costs of the day must be paid.' These are matters of detail on which we exercise our judgment. If we see there is surprise, we may say, 'The costs of the day must abide the event;' or we may say to one of the parties that he ought to admit this, and that if he does not do that, we shall reserve the costs.

12,423. Mr. Gordon.—You spoke of the proceeding before yourself: is that proceeding in the presence of the judge?—No; the judge is in the court, and a little court has been made for me separately. There is a clause in the last Act which gives me the power to hear cases by default where the defendant does not appear.

12,424. But the case you gave us was that of the plaintiff and defendant being present?—No; I did not mean that, though I may fairly say that, after so long an experience, I find the suitors say, 'Will your Honour hear me?' and I say, 'I will with pleasure.' Then I write on my minutes, 'Referred to the registrar;' and the judge consents to the reference, and my certificate is the order. I hear the case just as the judge would do, and I hear the great bulk of them.

12,425. Mr. Campbell.—In a matter of accounting, arising in a dispute between the parties before the judge, is it a common practice in the court for the judge to remit to you, or to any particular officer?—He would generally ask me to do it. He would say that the case should be heard before the registrar.

12,426. You can examine vouchers and documents more conveniently?—Not more conveniently; but it is usual for the deputy to do more of the actual work than the principal.

12,427. The Chairman.—Is it any part of your duty to attend in court?—I believe it is, strictly. The judge can say that he will not have the registrar to do any of the work; but if he consents to our hearing the case, we sit in a different room.

12,428. When you don't attend, by whom is the judge attended?—By my head clerk.

12,429. Your representative?—Yes.

12,430. Mr. Webster.—Is the order written on the original plaint?—No, it is a separate paper. We have a printed form, all but the names and the amounts. We have two printed forms,—one where we make the order to pay the sum in full on a given day, and another when we make it to be paid by instalments, which we have the power to do—'Judgment against you for £2, 10s. 6d.,—4s. a month,—and the first payment on such a day.' Instead of a calendar month I have always taken the month of 28 days, because I wish, for the purposes of account-keeping, which are extremely voluminous with us, to have the money paid in every Monday; so that if the parties get their wages on a Saturday, and are not improvident on the Sunday, we get payment on the Monday. I make every order payable on the Monday, unless I say it is to be paid forthwith.

12,431. Mr. Campbell.—Then they are made payable at your office?—Yes; all monies are to be paid at the registrar's office.

12,432. Mr. Webster.—When the money comes to the registrar's office, by what form does the plaintiff get possession of it?—If it is above 10s., we send him notice that we have got it. The defendant brings the order which we have made, which is so framed as to enable us to put a receipt on it, and the clerk who received it would write the date and his initials.

12,433. Mr. Campbell.—Assuming that a case arises in which it is necessary for the judge to take a proof with regard to matter of fact—in actions of damages for instance—what is the usual course of procedure for the ascertainment of the facts?—The parties give their evidence viva voce.

12,434. Does the judge make any note of that evidence beyond what is necessary for the refreshing of his own memory in the course of the day?—That is all.

12,435. And he gives a decision on the facts proved before him in evidence?—Yes.

12,436. Is his judgment on the facts final?—It is, so far as the fact is concerned. The law may be reviewed by the judges of the courts at Westminster.

12,437. Suppose the judge to have arrived at a decision in point of fact and law, what record is there of the particular grounds in fact and law on which he has decided the case? Does he write out a detailed judgment?—No.

12,438. Then what record is there?—There is nothing but the order. The minute-book contains simply the name and the order made.

12,439. Mr. Gordon.—It is a register?—Yes; and if the parties are aggrieved, and intend to appeal to the courts at Westminster, the aggrieved party gives notice; and if they can agree on their case—that is, on the misdirection or the bad ruling in law—well and good; but if not, the judge settles the case between the parties.

12,440. Mr. Campbell.—When called on, he writes out a note of his decision?—He settles what they dispute about. He has a tolerably full note for his own guidance.

12,441. He says, 'I found such and such circumstances to be proved as matter of fact, and I deduced certain inferences as matter of law; and in the result I decided that the defendant should pay so much to the plaintiff?'—Yes.

12,442. Mr. Clark.—Is that done at once on the case being disposed of?—No. The party can give notice at the moment, or within twelve days, I think. Then they prepare their case, and find sureties for costs, to be approved by me. They then settle the case, and go to the courts at Westminster, and they have the selection of which court they will go to.

12,443. Mr. Campbell.—Have they the remedy of review, however small the amount may be?—No. Under £20 the decision is final. They may go to the judge from me, and he would hear it.

12,444. But when the judge himself decides the case?—That is final up to £20, except by leave.

12,445. Mr. Baxter.—Both in fact and law?—Yes.

12,446. Mr. Gordon.—Is there any power to remit a case under £5 which involves a question of difficulty?—There was; but I think it is qualified in some shape. One of the judges of the superior courts at chambers can order a writ of certiorari.

12,447. And the parties are put on terms?—That is entirely in the judgment of the court above. What we do is to return to the court sending us that certiorari the copy of the plaint, and the copy of the minute-book, if it has gone as far as order. We attach it and indorse it, and they go on in the courts at Westminster.

12,448. Mr. Campbell.—But that step is taken before any order is pronounced by the judge?—It may or may not be.

12,449. There is a power, I think, given to litigants in their option of having their cases tried by jury?—There is. I think £5 is the limit. If the claim is above £5, they may, in three clear days, call on me to summon a jury.

12,450. Before the hearing of the case?—Yes. Three clear days before the hearing of the case, either party may come and say, 'I wish for a jury of five,' and I am then ordered to summon ten jurymen.

12,451. Mr. Gordon.—What fee does he lodge for that?—One shilling for each juror that is to try the case, but no fee for the summons and the service.

12,452. Mr. Campbell.—What proportion of cases are tried in that way?—I suppose in the 15,000 cases that I have mentioned, about six, or probably ten, cases are tried by jury. It is a very small fraction.

12,453. Do those cases which are tried by jury involve large sums?—Not necessarily. It may have been a little temper in the parties; you cannot tell precisely what was their motive.

12,454. Then jury trial does not seem to be popular in the County Courts?—A great deal depends on the judge, I believe, and the feeling that exists towards him. Sometimes attorneys feel hurt at the judge's mode of proceeding, and choose to bespeak the jury—thinking, I suppose, that that will control the judge.

12,455. Mr. Baxter.—What is the qualification of the jury?—It is the same as in all the other courts. We take them from the common jury list.

12,456. Mr. Webster.—What fee are the jurors paid?—One shilling each. When they have given their verdict, we hand them 1s. a-piece.

12,457. Mr. Campbell.—The County Court judges have no control, have they, over questions involving servitudes or rights of way?—No; none with reference to real property.

12,458. Not with regard to the regulation of possession, except in the cases of ejectment which you mentioned?—That is all.

12,459. Mr. Gordon.—The County Court judge can change the venue?—Yes.

12,460. When it can be shown that the case will be more conveniently tried at another place?—Yes.

12,461. Mr. Campbell.—The County Court judge has no criminal jurisdiction?—None whatever.

12,462. He is merely a civil judge?—Yes.

12,463. When appointed to the office of County Court judge, is he precluded from engaging in any private practice of any kind?—He is not at liberty to practise now.

12,464. Either at the bar, or as an arbitrator?—That, I believe, is a vexed question. I believe the late Lord Chancellor Cairns expressed rather a strong opinion that he ought not to take arbitrations.

12,465. Are you aware what the practice has been?—I believe some few of the judges have taken them.

12,466. Mr. Justice Willes.—I think the practice has been not uncommon to take arbitrations?—I believe so.

12,467. Mr. Gordon.—How long is the County Court judge in your court occupied? Does he sit once a month?—He sits four days a week. It depends entirely on the business. We have usually a hundred cases a day on the list; and one case may take some hours, while the others may be got through in about three hours.

12,468. Mr. Clark.—What is the length of your legal year?—We have a vacation of six weeks, and now and then we can make a week for ourselves. We can fix our own sittings. We regulate the sittings according to the exigencies of the business.

12,469. Mr. Gordon.—And, when sitting, your court meets about four days a week?—The court itself is occupied about four days in the week; but the clerks are there every day from ten until four o'clock.

12,470. I presume that your court has a much greater amount of business than most of the County Courts?—My court has, I believe, the largest number of cases of any in London, though it is not the most lucrative. It is not so good as Westminster, which is a richer neighbourhood, and it is not so good as

Robert Cheere.

Bloomsbury; but the cases are more numerous than in these two courts.

12,471. But you have more business than the courts in the country districts?—With the exception of two or three, we have; but Birmingham has double the business we have.

12,472. Is there just one County Court in Birmingham?—Yes.

12,473. How many are there in the London district?—Nine or ten.

12,474. Mr. Campbell.—In the more populous districts, the time of the County Court judge is pretty fully occupied?—It is.

12,475. The office is not a sinecure?—No.

12,476. Can you tell us what the remuneration of the County Court judge is?—It is fixed by statute. Some have £1500 a year. That is the salary of the judge who presides in my court.

12,477. What is the minimum?—£1200.

12,478. The Chairman.—Is £1500 the maximum?—I think so. I should state that travelling expenses are allowed to them in addition.

12,479. Mr. Campbell.—But the judge of the Clerkenwell County Court has no travelling expenses?—No.

12,480. And the travelling expenses are not calculated on a scale which would do more than reimburse the judge for the cost he is put to?—It is supposed not to do more. I may state that the expenses of my office last year were £2364, 18s. 11d., exclusive of the judge.

12,481. Mr. Justice Willes.—Each judge, I think, got £300 additional in consideration of taking the equitable jurisdiction?—Yes; I believe so. The schedule of the fees is appended to the Act of Parliament.

12,482. Mr. Campbell.—You mentioned the gross cost of your establishment, exclusive of the judge; can you give us the details?—The judge's salary is £1500; my salary is £700 a year; and the nine clerks (including my salary) get £2364, 18s. 11d.

12,483. How much does the chief clerk get?—£350. We were originally paid by fees, which were much larger than the present fees. The first judge got between £2000 and £3000 a year out of the fees, and I got into my own pocket over £1800 a year. Then the Home Secretary said he thought £500 was enough, which made me feel dreadfully ill; but I secured to the clerks good payment. I was taken before the Lords of the Treasury, and the late Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, being then Attorney-General (Lord Chief Justice Jervis); they were very anxious to keep the expenses of the clerks down. I had always paid my clerks an ad valorem salary, which none of my brethren had done. I have no persons whom I care to serve except those who do their work well; I have no family connections; and I said to the clerks, 'Apparently by the statute I should have £600 a year; whatever the fees exceed, I will have the proportion of six to what you ordinarily would have in an attorney's office.' My head clerk would have had £100 a year in an attorney's office, and on account of the magnitude of the fees he got £300 a year. When Government saw that, and having power to reduce me from £1800 to £500, they said they would also take down the salaries of the clerks; but as I received the fees, I said I would not settle the account unless they got larger salaries, and Government agreed to give them the salaries which I had always given them formerly out of my own pocket.

12,484. On what footing do they hold their offices?—My pleasure.

12,485. Does the chief clerk hold his office only during your pleasure?—I am sorry to say that it is so.

12,486. Mr. Gordon.—They are not on the civil service?—No; nor are we.

12,487. The Chairman.—Have you no superannuation allowance?—No.

12,488.—Has the County Court judge?—He has. I believe he has £1000 a year.

12,489. Mr. Webster.—Is your appointment for life?—On good behaviour. I suppose I could be removed by the Lord Chancellor for cause. I can appoint a deputy; and if I was ill, I should appoint a deputy to do my work, and make my own pecuniary arrangement with him; and that would, in effect, be a retiring allowance.

12,490. Mr. Campbell.—But the other clerks have no such power?—They have no such power.

12,491. How many years must a County Court judge serve before he is entitled to a retiring allowance?—I don't know if there is any limit. It has been given in cases of sickness in the instances I have known. I may state that the next step after the hearing and the non-payment is an execution against the goods. When the plaintiff comes and produces the plaint note, we find nothing is paid in our ledger: he can then take execution against the goods; or he can have a judgment summons to bring the defendant before the judge, and see why he has not paid, and the judge may, for causes stated in the Act of Parliament, send him to jail. The number of judgment summonses last year was 1947 out of the 9000 orders. Of those, there were heard 747. What became of the difference between the 1900 and the 700 I must leave you to infer. It is possible that when the parties got the judgment summonses, they paid; but whether they did or not, I don't know. Some of them were not served. When they appear, the judge examines them as to their means and circumstances; and if he is satisfied that they could have paid, or that they have contracted the debt fraudulently, without reasonable means of payment, he can commit them for any period he sees fit, not exceeding forty days. In the cases that were heard, the judge made orders for commitment, no doubt; but out of the 747 the plaintiffs took out warrants to the number of 328 only, so that more than one-half who had obtained the judge's order to send the defendant to jail, found no occasion to use it, and did not even bespeak it, for the figures were—orders 747, warrants 328.

12,492. The Chairman.—Without a warrant there could be no imprisonment?—No. The man has the option of proceeding on the order to imprison. The judge says, 'I make an order to have him committed, unless in so many days he has paid the money.'

12,493. Is that imprisonment in satisfaction of the debt?—It is not.

12,494. Mr. Baxter.—Can you imprison for any sum, however small?—Yes. But it is not for the sum that we imprison; it is for not obeying the judge's order.

12,495. Lord Barcaple.—For contempt of court?—It is said to be so, but it is not really so. Out of the 328 warrants bespoken, only 143 went to prison, and I think comparatively few of them—probably the half—really suffered the terms of imprisonment. They paid on the pressure. I will give you an instance of one that happened this very morning. A party was sued in our court for a debt, the debt and costs amounting to £6, 8s.; he was ordered to pay it on 22d March; he was brought up on a judgment summons, and the judge ordered him to jail for forty days.

12,496. The Chairman.—That was the full period?—Yes; and he gave him seven days to make arrangements. The seventh day was last Saturday, and the defendant came this morning and paid £5, though but for that pressure the plaintiff would have had to whistle for the money. The balance is promised next week.

12,497. Mr. Baxter.—The period of imprisonment is always limited?—Yes; but I have no hesitation in saying that, without imprisonment for debt, you had better shut the County Courts up. It would be absolute folly to go on without it.

12,498. Can you imprison a second time for the same debt?—Yes, for the same debt, as often as the judge thinks fit.

12,499. Mr. Adam.—Have you any power of arresting wages?—No. That has often been talked about, but I hope it will not be carried out. It would do more mischief to the people than can be calculated.

12,500. Mr. Webster.—Do you seize goods?—Yes.

12,501. Can they go on with both operations at one time?—No.

12,502. Mr. Campbell.—Will you describe to us the mode in which goods are seized and brought to sale?—We issue a warrant, which we call a fi. fa. warrant, and the bailiff goes to the man's lodgings and takes the chairs and tables; he leaves a man in possession, and is told that the money will be sent; in the course of an hour or two it is sent, and the goods are not removed. I cannot tell exactly how many sales have taken place, nor how many warrants were issued in 1868; but I have felt so deep an interest in this matter, that I got the same sort of information some time ago, and it was an incredibly small number of sales that actually took place. There are some, and they are not very oppressive.

12,503. Mr. Clark.—Can you force your way into a house and take the goods?—We cannot force an outer door, I believe. The number of executions against goods was 2363; and of these, only 15 sales actually took place: this was not last year, but some time before.

12,504. Mr. Baxter.—Who maintains the debtor in prison?—He generally keeps himself.

12,505. Is the creditor not bound to do so?—I never knew of the creditor keeping him, or being asked to do so.

12,506. The Chairman.—You have told us the mode in which an appeal is taken from the County Court judge's judgment: are there many such appeals?—Very, very few.

12,507. Can you give us a notion how many?—Two or three in my court.

12,508. In a year?—In a year. The number is hardly so many. I don't think there have been half a dozen the whole time I have been there; I think these have been the result more of obstinacy than of necessity.

12,509. Do you ascribe the infrequency of appeals to the satisfaction of the parties with the judgments?—I do.

12,510. Mr. Campbell.—Has any agitation ever arisen in the profession, or among the public, with the view of securing an intermediate appeal between the County Court judge and the Supreme Court?—There is no other tribunal that they could agitate for. I don't know that any other tribunal could be resorted to.

12,511. Mr. Webster.—Can you give us an idea of the cost of obtaining a review by one of the superior courts?—I cannot.

12,512. Is there a rule of refusing to give costs in appeals from the County Courts?—I don't think there is.

12,513. Mr. Justice Willes.—I think latterly the rule has been to give costs, because otherwise the remedy would be worse than the disease?—Yes.

12,514. Mr. Campbell.—Can you give us an idea of the procedure which takes place after the judge has settled the case on which the appeal is taken?—I cannot. It will depend on the stage the proceedings are at on their removal.

12,515. Suppose the case is heard and disposed of, and the order for payment made by the County Court judge, and that the case is settled on which the appeal is taken, how do the parties then proceed?—They set it down as a special case. Both sides leave copies of the cases with the judges of the superior court, and it is set down in the ordinary way. It depends entirely on the business of that court. We know nothing more of them.

12,516. Mr. Adam.—You have said there were appeals on some matters from you to the judge?—He could review, I suppose, all my decisions. Mine is held to be a delegated authority; and it is simply because the people know me that my business is so large as it is.

12,517. In point of fact there is no appeal from you?—There has not been one, I believe, for two years. I suppose you are aware that all money for which we grant orders is paid into court?

12,518. Lord Barcaple.—What do you precisely mean by that? Do you mean that when you decern for the money, it is not paid directly to the plaintiff?—Not a shilling of it. It is all paid into court.

12,519. Mr. Campbell.—That is the case with instalments?—It is the case with all monies. It need not be; but as far as our procedure is concerned, we should not allow any subsequent step for any sum of money at variance with our ledger account. For instance, if, having got a judgment for £6, the plaintiff went and took an execution for £4, we should say, 'We must have the £2 here, in order to make our account square.'

12,520. Mr. Campbell.—Do you open a ledger account for every litigated case?—Yes.

12,521. And any partial payment is entered to the credit of the defendant, and a judgment order can be taken afterwards for the balance?—That is so. You will be very much surprised at the number of payments into court in one year. The number of payments last year was 15,984, and the amount £19,399.

12,522. Was a very large amount of that money paid in cases where the defendant had not appeared?—Yes. The number of payments out of court was 13,319, and the amount £20,830.

12,523. Mr. Webster.—Can you tell us the cost to the party of getting the money through the hands of the court?—It is nothing more than the fee he has paid. All the fees he has to pay are the 1s. on the summons, and the 2s. on the hearing; in fact 15 per cent. in a disputed case, and 10 per cent. on the debt in a non-disputed case.

12,524. The Chairman.—Can you tell me what proportion of cases you have where the amount sought to be recovered is over £20?—It is very small indeed.

12,525. When you say 'very small,' what do you mean?—Not one in 200.

12,526. One-half per cent.?—Hardly so much. I have taken out the accounts of three tradesmen who resort to our court; one took out 309 plaints in one year, another 163, and another 262.

12,527. When you say there is not above one-half per cent. over £20, what proportion should you say there is over £30?—That I cannot say.

12,528. Or £40?—Much the same. The bulk of our cases are under £20.

12,529. What sort of proportion is there between cases above and below £10?—That I cannot give you.

12,530. Are they more numerous under £10?—Certainly; very much. I have brought with me three specimens of the ledger accounts to show what the accounting is like. One of them is a bill of exchange case, another a doctor's bill, and another a draper's account. I have 58,606 entries of money accounts.

12,531. How soon does a plaintiff get his money after it has come into your hands?—Whenever he likes.

12,532. Mr. Clark.—You spoke of recovering a certain sum: is the whole of that sum entered in the ledger accounts?—Yes, what is recovered.

12,533. Do you raise a ledger account whenever decree is given?—For the convenience of our book-keeping, I have a ledger so made that there is a little space for every plaint that is entered.

12,534. Do you raise the account on decree?—Yes, on order. On the face of the ledger there would be eight accounts.

12,535. If the money is not paid, what do you do with the account?—We do nothing. We should only enter what the judgment was for and the costs, leaving it in a blank state till something was paid in. I am bound to say that the system of accounting and the whole procedure is extremely carefully done, though one runs the risk of enormous loss, as it is impossible to check it. I have myself been robbed, and have been quite unable to discover it till I make up my ledger balances. It is the duty of the clerk not to shut up at night till he checks the cash in the till with the amount in the cash-book; but it does not follow that it has got into the ledger, and there is great difficulty in checking it. I was robbed one year to the extent of £146, and we had to go through all the ledgers in which there were accounts, ascertaining what was due on one side and the other, and seeing if we had money to meet it. I set my nine clerks to work for six weeks at it, and still we could not account for it. At last, being on extremely good terms with my clerks, I told them that we must neither eat, drink, nor sleep till we had discovered it; and after waiting till about eleven o'clock that night, the clerk who stole it came and told me of it, and showed me how he did it. No checking could have helped it, for, taking an even sum always, he had called it 10s. short, and it had been so entered in the cash-book.

John Wickens.

JOHN WICKENS, Esq., examined.

12,536. The Chairman.—You are a Chancery barrister?—I am.

12,537. I suppose of some considerable standing?—Nearly twenty-nine years.

12,538. We are anxious to obtain some information from you as to the practice of the Court of Chancery. Would you be kind enough to describe the origin and process of an ordinary suit in Chancery?—I can only do that very generally, because our practice is unfortunately complicated, and it would take a very long time indeed to describe all the varieties of it. But an ordinary suit in Chancery is commenced by bill, which is a printed statement of the plaintiff's case in popular language, telling the story, mentioning the persons against whom he claims relief, and describing the relief that he thinks himself entitled to. An ordinary suit in Chancery is commenced in that way. There are some other modes of commencing proceedings in Chancery under particular Acts of Parliament, or otherwise, but that is the normal commencement of a suit. The plaintiff, as soon as he has filed his bill, has a right to require from the defendant an answer on oath to interrogatories founded on the bill; or he may, if he pleases, dispense with such an answer.

12,539. The bill, I presume, is served on the defendant?—Yes.

12,540. Mr. Baxter.—Have you any particular officer for serving it?—No; at least I believe not. It is served by the solicitor of the plaintiff, or his agent.

12,541. The Chairman.—Practically, I suppose, it is handed to the defendant's solicitor?—I believe so; that is to say, it is served personally upon the defendant, unless a solicitor undertakes to appear for him.

12,542. Mr. Campbell.—Is there any particular evidence of service laid before the court?—There is a formal affidavit which the clerk makes, I suppose; but I don't know what the form of it is.

12,543. Lord Barcaple.—Does the defendant put in an answer to the bill, separate from the answer to the interrogatories?—No; the two things are combined. The same printed document contains his answer to the plaintiff's case, and also the discovery—the answer to the plaintiff's interrogatories.

12,544. The Chairman.—If there be any?—Yes.

12,545. Mr. Gordon.—You use the word answer. I understand that as meaning a counter statement or a defence?—The defence is technically called an answer, but it contains the two things which I have mentioned.

12,546. Lord Barcaple.—That is to say, an answer to the statements in the bill, and an answer to the interrogatories. Does it contain a statement by the defendant of the facts that he thinks important?—Yes; if there are any facts which he intends to allege, and prove affirmatively, he may state them in his answer.

12,547. The Chairman.—But the answer does not consist of three parts?—No.

12,548. If there is an answer upon oath to the interrogatories, the only other part of the bill would be the defendant's statement?—Yes; the defendant's case, of course, may be either negative in form or affirmative in form, but in fact the answer consists of two parts, and not of three.

12,549. The answer being filed, what is the next proceeding?—The answer being filed, the plaintiff then elects in what way he will have the cause tried. And here arises an anomaly in our practice which I don't think anybody would venture to defend. The plaintiff has the right of electing whether he will have the cause brought to a hearing on motion for decree, or by filing a replication. The consequence is, that the plaintiff has a right to elect, although under certain circumstances he is compelled to elect one and not the other. But the results are very different. The motion for a decree is in general much more favourable to the plaintiff than the hearing on replication.

12,550. Lord Barcaple.—Would you explain precisely what are the two courses of procedure?—The distinctions are so very complicated that it would be difficult to make them intelligible to any one unacquainted with Chancery practice. Supposing the plaintiff elects to proceed on motion for decree, he gives a notice of motion that he will move for a decree four weeks after the date of the notice, and specifies at the foot of his notice the affidavits which he intends to use in support of his case. After that notice of motion is served, the defender has, I think, a fortnight—this time being enlargeable of course—to file such affidavits as he pleases, in opposition to the plaintiff's case, after which the plaintiff has a week to reply by affidavit to the defendant's evidence; either party may then during a fortnight cross-examine any of the witnesses on the other side before the examiners of the court. That is the proceeding on notice of motion for decree.

12,551. The Chairman.—All that being done, the case comes on for hearing?—That being done, if the cause is heard in that way, it comes on for hearing.

12,552. Mr. Webster.—Has the defendant put interrogatories to the plaintiff?—Yes; the defendant has a right, after having filed his own answer (if an answer be required), to interrogate the plaintiff exactly as the plaintiff can interrogate him.

12,553. Lord Barcaple.—Then replication?—When a cause is to be heard on replication, or (as it is called) in the regular way, the plaintiff, as soon as the pleadings are complete, files a replication, which is a formal document, not signed by counsel,—simply a traverse; and then eight weeks are allowed to each party for putting in the evidence. Of course, I need not say the result of that is, that the evidence on both sides is put in on the last day of the eight weeks, and consequently neither party has an opportunity of seeing the evidence of the other. The plaintiff has no opportunity of replying to the evidence of the defendant. The evidence is either given by affidavit, or, in the case of an unwilling witness, who will not make an affidavit, he is subpœnaed, and examined ex parte before the examiner of the court. After the expiration of the eight weeks, either party has a limited time for cross-examination. It follows, I think, from what I have said, that inasmuch as the plaintiff, when the case is heard on notice of motion for decree, has the opportunity of replying to the plaintiff's evidence, that course is in general very much more favourable to him than the other; but he is not always able to take it, because, on notice of motion for decree, he cannot get the evidence in chief of any unwilling witness. A witness who will not make an affidavit is inaccessible for that purpose. I ought to have stated that the cross-examination, when the cause is heard on replication, is in court, and not before the examiner of the court; and therefore there is a difference between the mode of hearing the case, according to the different mode in which the plaintiff chooses to try it. The hearing is conducted, I presume, very much like a hearing in any other court; that is, the plaintiff opens his case, the defendant then answers, and the plaintiff replies. But there is this peculiarity in the hearings before the Court of Chancery: the evidence being nearly entirely on paper some time before the hearing, very little time is practically consumed in reading evidence,—very little of the evidence is practically brought before the court, because the counsel on both sides soon see what facts are proved, and what are not proved; and a certain sort of elimination takes place, which in fact prevents the court from being troubled with more than a very small part of the evidence. In most cases, I should think no part of the evidence is read. It is taken as read.

12,554. The Chairman.—When you talk of reading the evidence at the hearing, do you mean that it is read by counsel?—Yes.

12,555. In the course of their speeches?—Hardly that. According to the ordinary rule, the case is opened by the leading counsel; and, strictly speaking, it is the duty of the junior to read the evidence.

12,556. Lord Barcaple.—Where there is cross-examination of witnesses at the hearing in the open court, that occurs in the middle of the discussion?—After the evidence is read. In the case of the cross-examination of witnesses in open court, if the cause were heard quite strictly, the leading counsel for the plaintiff would open the case, and then the junior counsel for the plaintiff would read his evidence; and if the defendant wished to cross-examine one of the plaintiff's witnesses, having given notice before, he would cross-examine him immediately after the reading of the affidavit of that witness.

12,557. Does every ordinary case in Chancery first come on for hearing before the Master of the Rolls or the Vice-Chancellor?—I may say every case.

12,558. Then, in that view of it, in every case there is a primary judgment by a single judge, from which there is an appeal?—In every case.

12,559. Is the review very infrequent, or is it pretty common?—The review is very frequent.

12,560. A large number of causes are carried to review?—It varies from time to time. At present, I rather think that our appeal courts have got much less business than usual.

12,561. There being more acquiescence in the first judgment?—Yes; but it is difficult to say to what it is to be attributed.

12,562. The Chairman.—It will depend in some degree, I suppose, on the estimation in which the judges of the different courts are held by the profession?—It would rather depend, I should think, upon the estimate which the advising counsel might be likely to form of the chance of a difference of opinion between the court above and the court below, without reference to the question which was right.

12,563. Lord Barcaple.—Has there been any considerable discussion in the profession or without the profession as to the necessity for having a judgment in the first instance, from which there is a review, rather than taking the judgment of a court consisting perhaps of more than one judge, from which there should be no review?—I have heard the question frequently mentioned, and I think, as far as I am able to judge, that the unanimous opinion is, that there should be one appeal against the first decision in every case.

12,564. That there should always be a right to one appeal?—Yes.

12,565. Mr. Webster.—And that there should always be a decision by one judge in the first instance?—I am not prepared to say that I know that there is unanimity about that.

12,566. Lord Barcaple.—Does the Master of the Rolls or the Vice-Chancellor frequently pronounce his judgment at the hearing, or is it more common for him to take it to consideration?—Judges vary very much in that respect; but certainly most cases are decided offhand.

12,567. Mr. Baxter.—In court?—In court.

12,568. Lord Barcaple.—I believe the Vice-Chancellors sit for a period of three weeks, and then rise for a week. Is there not some such arrangement as that?—A term is three weeks; there are four terms in the year; and there are, I think, three sittings out of term. The sittings out of term last five or six weeks.

12,569. The Chairman.—Each?—Each.

12,570. Lord Barcaple.—What sort of interval occurs between?—Between Easter term and Trinity term the interval is a fortnight; and there is an interval at Christmas of about three weeks, and an interval at Easter of about three weeks. Otherwise the interval between two consecutive sittings is a week.

12,571. Is the object of that interval understood to be to enable them to overtake judgments in causes which have been taken to consideration?—I never heard that it was. I don't know that it is.

12,572. The Chairman.—How many weeks in the year do the Vice-Chancellors sit?—I am a very bad authority on the subject; but I rather think that it is from 160 to 190 working days.

12,573. Mr. Adam.—In what form is the appeal taken?—The appeal is, technically speaking, a re-hearing. It is not an appeal proper. We make a distinction between an appeal proper and a re-hearing. It is taken in this form: you petition the Lord Chancellor that the cause may be re-heard; the petition simply states the decree below, without stating anything leading up to it; and there is a mere formal statement that the petitioner conceives himself aggrieved by it, and prays that the case may be re-heard before the Lord Chancellor, and that his Lordship may make such an order as he may think just.

12,574. Mr. Baxter.—Is it in writing?—It is in writing, and it is certified by two counsel to be a proper petition.

12,575. Lord Barcaple.—Can you give us any information as to the time within which ordinarily the cause will be heard by the court of appeal, after the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor?—I cannot; but at the present moment, although the Lord Chancellor is engaged four working days a week in the House of Lords, and therefore we have lost one-half of our appellate strength, there is no delay.

12,576. That is to say, it comes within a few weeks after the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor?—I should think less. It may have altered within the last two or three days; but when I last happened to inquire, there were very few appeals waiting to be heard before the Lords Justices.

12,577. Mr. Baxter.—Can you appeal at any stage of the case?—You may appeal against any order of any sort or kind that the court below makes. You may appeal against an order that the cause should stand over.

12,578. Mr. Webster.—Upon certificate by two counsel?—Yes; and in the case of a motion, without any certificate.

12,579. Mr. Gordon.—That does not stop the procedure before the Vice-Chancellor?—It does not stop the procedure. If it is desired to stop the procedure, you apply to the judge appealed from; and the practice of late has been to stop the procedure if the procedure was a costly one.

12,580. Lord Barcaple.—A final judgment upon the cause, I suppose, is appealable without any certificate?—No; it requires a certificate.

12,581. Mr. Gordon.—Is that very much matter of form, or do the counsel really apply their minds seriously to it?—I believe that we do not consider that we pledge ourselves in any way to a dissent from the opinion of the judge below, but only that we consider that the case is one which the party may reasonably ask to have decided before the highest tribunal.

12,582. Mr. Baxter.—What are the terms of the certificate?—I think they are, 'We certify that this case is proper to be re-heard before your Lordship, if your Lordship thinks fit.'

12,583. Lord Barcaple.—There are reports of the discussions and decisions in the Vice-Chancellor's court?—Yes.

12,584. When the cause comes on in the court of appeal, is it always at such an interval of time that there is a published report that can be made use of at the hearing in the appeal court?—More often than not.

12,585. Where there is not, there is no record, I suppose, of the opinion delivered, and the grounds of judgment stated by the Vice-Chancellor?—A shorthand writer's note is invariably taken of every case which is likely to be appealed from.

12,586. Mr. Baxter.—Of the judgment?—Yes, in every case that is likely to be appealed from.

12,587. Lord Barcaple.—That must be productive of considerable expense, I suppose?—That is a question I cannot answer.

12,588. Mr. Gordon.—Is the judge furnished with copies of the affidavits, or does he use the principal?—For the purpose of the hearing of the cause?

John Wickens.

12,589. Yes?—The judge always has printed copies of the affidavits.

12,590. Are they printed?—They are printed. He gets it; but whether as matter of right or as matter of courtesy, I cannot say. In the hearing of the cause, the pleadings and the affidavits are all printed.

12,591. I suppose you find that cheaper than having written copies?—Very much cheaper, I believe.

12,592. Lord Barcaple.—Is it the opinion of the profession that the system of affidavits works well?—I think it is. I think the opinion of the profession is that 19 witnesses out of 20 intend to tell the truth; and that where the witness intends to tell the truth, and the affidavit is prepared with a knowledge in the person preparing it and in the person swearing it that there may be a cross-examination upon it immediately, in the great majority of cases the affidavit, eked out by the cross-examination, is sufficient for all purposes.

12,593. And that is your opinion?—It is.

12,594. Mr. Baxter.—Who prepares the affidavit?—The affidavit is prepared, I suppose, by the solicitor, and very often settled by counsel.

12,595. By counsel for both parties?—No; the counsel of the party.

12,596. Lord Barcaple.—The taking of the evidence in court before the judge is a recent innovation?—Our system of taking evidence has been changed so often during the last twenty years, that I should not like to date any part of it.

12,597. But have you found that there has been a great feeling of an advantage resulting from the evidence being taken in open court in Chancery?—I have personally a strong conviction that in a case of really disputed fact, nothing but a mode of taking evidence in which the witnesses are produced before the court, and seen by the judge in person, can be satisfactory. But a case of really disputed fact is certainly the exception in the Court of Chancery.

12,598. You have already said that a case of doubtful credibility is, you think, very rare?—Yes.

12,599. There may be disputed fact where neither party may very seriously dispute the truthfulness of the opposite witnesses?—There may be so.

12,600. Is that a common kind of case in Chancery,—where the inferences to be drawn upon the whole matter is the dispute in point of fact, and not the credibility of the witnesses? Is that a common characteristic of the cases that you meet with in Chancery?—I am not perfectly sure that I can answer that question. The typical case in Chancery is a controversy as to the conclusion in law, which may be a mixed conclusion of law and fact, to be drawn from certain facts which are not seriously disputed. That is the most ordinary sort of dispute, I think.

12,601. The Chairman.—In short, the leading facts of a case are seldom in dispute?—Comparatively seldom.

12,602. Lord Barcaple.—Is the system of having the cross-examination in presence of the judge very much adopted?—Very little. It takes so much time, and is so inconvenient in many respects, that we always dispense with it if possible.

12,603. The Chairman.—Is it expensive?—It may be expensive where it is necessary to bring witnesses up to London from a distance; but the witnesses are not kept waiting. In all cases where the cross-examination of witnesses is to take place, a day is specially appointed for them, and they are not kept waiting for the termination of previous cases.

12,604. Lord Barcaple.—Have you always an affidavit by the witness before he appears to be examined in presence of the judge?—No. First of all, there are certain cases which I did not specify,—cases heard on replication in the regular way,—in which the plaintiff applies, immediately after the replication is filed, to have certain issues tried viva voce, and these issues are tried viva voce before the judge with or without a jury. That is the course, I think, ordinarily adopted in patent cases, but in practice it is almost confined to patent cases. I think it is found to be the most convenient way of taking scientific evidence, especially in cases of mechanical patents, where the thing speaks to the eye, to a certain extent. That is one exception. Another exception I mention incidentally, and it is this,—where, after replication filed, either party wants to examine a witness who will not consent to make an affidavit, then the unwilling witness is examined, and examined ex parte, before the examiner of the court. In that case, his cross-examination takes place afterwards at the hearing, though he has not made an affidavit.

12,605. Mr. Gordon.—Why should the cross-examination not take place before the examiner?—As a matter of principle I cannot tell you; nor do I know, nor have I found any one ever to inform me, on what principle the division between hearing the case on replication and hearing it on motion for decree—of which that is one of the consequences—has been made.

12,606. Mr. Baxter.—Can you take a counter affidavit from him without bringing him for cross-examination before the judge?—A witness may give evidence upon both sides. For instance, if a plaintiff's witness gives evidence with which I, the defendant, am dissatisfied, I may cross-examine him, or I may go to him and say, 'I propose to cross-examine you; but if you will put this or that fact in an affidavit on my behalf, that will satisfy my purpose.' That may be done, and is sometimes done. It is not unfrequently done where the witness is a person of extreme respectability, who has simply made some mistake, or omitted something that ought to have been stated.

12,607. The Chairman.—In speaking of the expense of examining witnesses in trying a cause in presence of the court, you mentioned only the matter of the attendance of witnesses: are there no other causes of expense connected with that procedure? The length of the proceeding in court must make it more expensive?—That does not increase the expense materially. I speak on very insufficient information with reference to these questions of costs; but I believe it increases the expense in this way: a particular fee is allowed to each solicitor for attendance for every day on which the cause is in the paper, and consequently if the hearing of the cause extends over three days instead of one day, or half a day, the fees are multiplied to that extent; but the fee to the counsel is not increased by the result of the cause taking three days instead of one. There are no refreshers.

12,608. Where the cause is tried in that way, and the witnesses are examined in presence of the Vice-Chancellor, does he make a note of the evidence?—Yes.

12,609. And is that the proper and authentic record of the evidence?—I believe so.

12,610. In cases where witnesses are cross-examined in court, which you say takes place where replication is filed, does the Vice-Chancellor in like manner make a note of the cross-examination?—Yes.

12,611. Are shorthand writers employed in such cases?—Always, I should think.

12,612. By the parties?—Always, I should think; but I understand that the notes of the Vice-Chancellor would, except by consent, be the proper record of the cross-examination on a re-hearing.

12,613. Mr. Gordon.—Jury trial has not been much resorted to in Chancery proceedings?—Not except in patent cases.

12,614. Were you concerned in the Paraffin Oil patent case?—I was not.

12,615. You know that it lasted a considerable number of days?—I remember many patent cases which have lasted many days.

12,616. The Chairman.—But not so long as that case, which I believe lasted about thirty days?—Not so long as that.

12,617. Mr. Baxter.—Do counsel attach themselves to particular courts?—Leading counsel do, but not junior counsel.

12,618. Lord Barcaple.—But there are counsel more or less attached to each Vice-Chancellor's court?—The leading counsel attach themselves, but not the junior counsel.

12,619. The Chairman.—Although a leading counsel has attached himself to a particular Vice-Chancellor, he does in fact attend other courts occasionally, does he not?—He attends the appeal courts. He attends any court in which he is specially retained.

12,620. Lord Barcaple.—And he goes into the appeal court as a matter of course?—Counsel make their own arrangements as to that. Some counsel will only go into the appeal court either as special, or upon appeals in cases in which they have been counsel in the court below; but the rule is not very strictly adhered to, and some counsel practise in two courts.

12,621. Mr. Baxter.—Do you feel it very convenient that the counsel attach themselves to particular courts?—Certainly it is very convenient.

12,622. The Chairman.—When you speak of a counsel going special into another court, is there any particular amount of fee that is in practice considered necessary?—50 guineas, besides the fee upon his brief. That is the lowest special retainer.

12,623. In short, there is a fee of 50 guineas in addition to what he would otherwise have?—Yes; it is over and above the other fees.

12,624. Mr Gordon.—Is he bound to give his attendance in the court for which he is specially retained, or may he also practise in his own court for that day?—I don't know that the obligation is higher in the one case than in the other. As a matter of fact, the cases in which special retainers are given are frequently important and interesting cases, and such as counsel is very willing to attend to if he possibly can. But special retainers are quite the exception.

12,625. The Chairman.—You have told us generally the history of a Chancery suit?—Very summarily indeed.

12,626. I think you mentioned at the commencement that there are other modes by which parties approach the Court of Chancery as suitors: will you give us some information upon that subject?—Originally the Court of Chancery could be approached by English bill only, as it was called, to distinguish it from the French pleadings of the common law courts, except in the one case of an infant, who could apply to the Lord Chancellor to be made a ward of court for protection by petition, which differs from a bill very slightly indeed; but still it does differ in some degree from it. However, various statutes have enabled suitors in certain cases to approach the court in a summary way. First of all, there are a very great many statutes—private and public Acts—which enable a suitor in certain cases to apply to the Court of Chancery by petition. The Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act, the Trustee Relief Acts, the Trustee Acts, and the Lands Clauses Act, are the most familiar instances. There are also certain cases in which the suitor is authorized to approach the Court of Chancery by a summons—by an application originating at chambers, the least formal of all applications. At the present time an application by an infant for a guardian and maintenance is generally made by summons; it may be made by petition, but it is generally made by summons. Certain applications for the administration of estates, which are very numerous, and form a material part of the business of the Court of Chancery, are made by summons; and the charity business, which was formerly commenced by petition under Sir Samuel Romilly's Act, or by information, is now frequently commenced by a summons authorized by the Charity Commissioners, who have the power of sending a case to be discussed in Chancery through chambers.

12,627. The Chairman.—What is the advantage of a petition over a bill?—I don't know.

12,628. Is it not entitled to any privilege of preaudience?—That is so. Each court has a petition day once a week, and, as a matter of fact, a petition does get some advantage in that respect.

12,629. Mr. Gordon.—Has the summons any advantage?—In the summons you don't go into court at all; you go into chambers, and you are launched into the matter of the proceedings very cheaply and summarily.

12,630. Mr. Webster.—Without bill or answer?—A mere informal statement of what you want on a piece of paper starts the proceedings.

12,631. The Chairman.—That saves a great deal of time?—Yes.

12,632. And expense?—Yes.

12,633. Lord Barcaple.—Is the proceeding emanating from that before the judge or before the chief clerk?—Generally before the chief clerk; but in all proceedings before the chief clerk the suitor has the right at any time to say, 'It shall be referred to the judge personally.' But, practically, proceedings such as are commenced by summons, which are to a great extent for the administration of estates, are accountants' work, as it were, which is done by the chief clerk without personal reference to the judge.

12,634. The Chairman.—Are there any other modes of initiating proceedings in the Court of Chancery?—There is a proceeding in the Court of Chancery distinct from any I have mentioned,—by special case, under an Act of Parliament called Sir George Turner's Act of 1850,—by which, if the parties can agree on a state of facts, they can take the opinion of the court on the question of law, without anything in the nature of a pleading beyond the statement. They agree on the case to be submitted to the court.

12,635. Do you not commence the proceedings by motion in any case?—I am not aware that you do. It is just possible that there may be some case which, if mentioned, might be familiar to me; but at the present moment I do not remember any such case.

12,636. How do you apply for an injunction?—You apply for an injunction by motion always, but after bill filed. Nothing is more common than that counsel should wait to move for an injunction till the clerk has come up to inform him that the bill is filed. When moving for an ex parte injunction you wait till the bill is filed, and then you are at liberty to address the court on the subject.

12,637. Mr. Gordon.—Can you interrupt the court for that purpose?—With the consent of the court, and the counsel in the case.

12,638. Can you interpose immediately after the finishing of a case?—Yes, for an ex parte injunction. In fairness to the court, you would not do so unless the application was very pressing.

12,639. Is the chief clerk an accountant?—He is a solicitor.

12,640. Does he perform a good deal of the accountant work?—He decides simple points of law, and very often complicated points of law; and he takes such ordinary accounts as would be involved in an ordinary estate, or in the winding up of a partnership, for instance.

12,641. The Chairman.—Can you give us any idea what proportion of cases are appealed from the Vice-Chancellor to the Lords Justices or the Vice-Chancellor?—No, I cannot. I believe myself, that if the figures were taken, they would be found to vary from year to year very much indeed.

12,642. Of course there are a great many cases that do not go beyond the Vice-Chancellors?—A very great many.

12,643. Or the Master of the Rolls?—There is a great difference between appeal courts as to their tendency to reverse; and the real test, as I said before—that which really multiplies the number of appeals—is the increase of the chance that there should be a difference of opinion between the court above and the court below.

12,644. And that depends on the constitution of the court for the time?—Yes.

12,645. Has the Master of the Rolls any jurisdiction different from the Vice-Chancellors?—He has, I think, the special jurisdiction of admitting solicitors; but for the purposes of such an inquiry as the present, I think practically he has no different jurisdiction. As a matter of fact, in consequence of the Master of the Rolls having the special function of admitting solicitors, a great proportion of the business relating to the taxation of costs has always gone to the Rolls; but that is a mere accident. All the courts have equal jurisdiction in that matter.

John Wickens.

12,646. That is to say, taxation of costs between attorney and client?—Yes.

12,647. Mr. Gordon.—How does the system work which requires a defendant to give his answer on oath?—That is rather a large question. If it were desired to make the pleadings very symmetrical, no doubt it would be better to have the answer not on oath, because the answer on oath cannot be amended, and you can withdraw no part of it; whereas the answer not on oath can be amended toties quoties. As a matter of fact, a plaintiff in equity has repeated opportunities of amending his bill; and it is his counsel's fault if his bill is not eventually put in the most satisfactory shape. But on each amendment of the bill the defendant has the right to file an answer; he has that right if he pleases, whether it is called for or not, and he may, in that answer, subject to remark, contradict, or explain, or qualify anything contained in the previous answer; but he can take no part of it off the rolls of the court, because it was on oath, the consequence of which is, that in a very complicated case the pleading of the defendant is much less symmetrical at the end than the pleading of the plaintiff; whereas if the pleading of the defendant were not on oath, it might be amended from time to time, and the cause might be heard with a symmetrical pleading on each side.

12,648. Is the calling on the defendant to make oath frequently resorted to?—Oh yes; in almost all contested cases he is required to answer.

12,649. But the plaintiff is not required to put his statement on oath?—And the plaintiff does not.

12,650. Can he be called on to do so?—Yes; after the defendant has answered, he can call on the plaintiff to answer on oath.

12,651. Do you think that the system of calling on your opponent to make his statement on oath tends to promote the ends of justice?—I think it is very desirable that each party should have the right of examining the adverse party on oath and on paper; but whether that should not be kept separate from the pleading, is a large question.

12,652. The Chairman.—I understood you rather to say that the combining of the interrogatories with the pleading tends to complication?—It tends to want of symmetry and to complication.

12,653. And the separation of the two would be an improvement?—My personal opinion is that it would be an improvement.

12,654. Lord Barcaple.—Can the party never require his opponent to answer upon oath except by putting specific interrogatories?—Only in that way.

12,655. Mr. Gordon.—There is no rule in your court requiring a party to give a categorical answer to the statement of fact in his opponent's pleading?—No. He must answer the interrogatories if any are put. If interrogatories are not put, he is not bound to put in any answer at all.

12,656. Does it occur to you that it would be an advantage that the defendant should answer categorically, not on oath, the statements in the plaintiff's case?—As at present advised, I do not see the advantage of that.

12,657. Lord Barcaple.—You do not find any difficulty arising from want of record?—Not the least. I think our system of pleading works reasonably well.

12,658. The Chairman.—Might it not be shortened?—Yes, it might be shortened. There are various reasons that make pleadings in equity longer than they would otherwise be. Perhaps the most important is, that the counsel who prepare them are very often short of time, and it takes much time and labour to reduce the pleading. Then the bill is very often framed by the plaintiff's counsel with a very insufficient knowledge of what the defendant's case may be, and therefore he is obliged to throw a wide net—he is obliged, in fact, to try to occupy in the first instance much larger ground than eventually he will fix himself upon. But the thing which tends most to the prolixity of pleadings is this,—nearly all Chancery suits of importance turn on the construction of written documents. If these written documents are stated in the pleadings in a summary way, stated as distinguished from being set out, it is necessary to supply counsel and the court with copies of them, which are written copies; and it is found to be cheaper and more convenient in all such cases to set out the document in extenso or quasi in extenso in the pleadings, so that counsel and the court have the thing once only, and in a printed form.

12,659. Mr. Gordon.—Or the material parts?—Yes; but in hæc verba, so much as is necessary. That is the thing which I think tends most to the length of our pleadings.

12,660. Lord Barcaple.—And that is irremediable: you must have these documents?—Yes.

12,661. The Chairman.—The counsel who has to argue the case in court is the same counsel who prepares the bill?—The junior counsel prepares the bill.

12,662. But there is a junior, who argues the case?—It is the special function of the leading counsel to argue the case. The junior only supplements him.

12,663. But what I mean is, that the junior who is to appear in court afterwards is the counsel who prepares the pleading?—Generally, in 999 cases out of 1000. He is there to explain his own pleadings, and to be answerable and responsible for anything that may appear abnormal in them.

12,664. Mr. Gordon.—There is a power of amendment?—In bills, but not in answers. An answer being on oath cannot be altered, and all our answers are on oath. We know no such thing as an answer which is not on oath, except where it is specially dispensed with, which is very rare.

12,665. The Chairman.—But the defendant's own case may be amended?—No; it is on oath. The only pleading of the defendant, which for the purpose of considering its nature one has analyzed into two or three, is one document in one printed paper, and all on oath.

12,666. Mr. Justice Willes.—Does a peer answer on oath?—No; he answers on honour. A peer has considerable privileges in the Court of Chancery, and that (if it be one) among them.

12,667. Mr. Webster.—Could the plaintiff amend where he has made oath?—There is no technical reason why he should not amend, although he may have verified his original bill by affidavit; but he would be in a very inconvenient position if he stated a case in his pleading which was inconsistent with his own affidavit.

12,668. Then he seems to fight at a disadvantage in the Court of Chancery?—On the whole, a plaintiff has the advantage.

12,669. Mr. Gordon.—Can the plaintiff withdraw his bill at any time?—Yes; at any time, on payment of costs.

12,670. Can a defendant withdraw from the suit?—He can offer to pay the whole that is asked against him, and the costs; and then he is entitled to stop the suit.

12,671. Mr. Webster.—Could the defendant, who discovers a new ground of answer or defence after he has sworn his answer, get it made available in any form?—Whenever a plaintiff amends his bill, the defendant has a right to put in a further answer; and therefore, if after putting in the first answer there should be an amendment of the bill, the defendant, having subsequently discovered matter material to his defence, would be able to introduce it in his amended answer; but if there be no amendment of the bill, he can only bring forward the new matter by special leave of the court to file a supplemental answer; which leave is very rarely given. The application is not frequently made, and very infrequently succeeds.

12,672. Mr. Campbell.—Such an application would be based on affidavit, I suppose?—It would.

12,673. The Chairman.—Affidavit to prove that the matter had recently come to his knowledge?—Not necessarily that; but to excuse his not adverting to it in the first instance. I think there is a case of Fulton v Gilmour before Lord Cottenham — one of the leading cases on that point—in which a defendant, having raised in his answer a defence arising from an East Indian insolvency, found out that he had mistaken the nature of the procedure, and that it was a much more complete defence than he had supposed it to be. It was not a case in which the fact had been unknown to him; but the proper conclusion to be drawn from it was unknown to him.

12,674. Was the amendment allowed there?—I believe it was; and the case was so clear that the suit dropped.

12,675. Mr. Webster.—The suit was founded on a docqueted account, and the partner had retired and advertised out?—I do not remember the details, but the supplemental answer put an end to the suit. In cases of supplemental answer, the court always require a distinct statement on oath that it is not for purposes of delay, and that it is a bona fide case.

12,676. The Chairman.—Is there any condition of costs imposed?—That is in the discretion of the court; but, in general, the court would make the person to whom the indulgence was granted pay the costs.

12,677. The previous costs?—The costs of the motion. When the supplemental answer is once filed, it becomes part of the pleadings in the cause, and would be dealt with in respect of costs as any other pleading, I suppose.

12,678. Lord Barcaple.—Do you think that system of making affidavit to prove that interlocutory orders asked by parties are not asked for the purposes of delay, has any real effect in preventing unnecessary delay and miscarriage of justice; or are they apt to be emitted very much as matter of course?—I think they have no effect.

12,679. Mr. Webster.—Does the court exercise discretion with reference to time for pleadings in all matters; or are there fixed periods within which any one thing must be done?—There are fixed periods, but in all cases extendable by the court.

12,680. Mr. Campbell.—I suppose the court is generally content to take the consent of parties as sufficient ground?—A consent would in all cases be a sufficient ground.

12,681. Lord Barcaple.—Is there very much time lost in the taking of evidence before examiners, from the difficulty of getting the parties to go on regularly?—There is a great deal of time lost in taking evidence before the examiners of the court, because the examiners at present have got more work than they can get through without great delay.

12,682. But, apart from that, do you find that the parties themselves, and their solicitors, are apt to let the matter lie over as long as it pleases?—I think there is often a tendency on both sides to delay to the utmost possible extent.

12,683. Mr. Gordon.—Mutual indulgence?—Mutual indulgence.

12,684. Has there been any attempt, by rule of court, or otherwise, to prevent such indulgence being granted in the Court of Chancery?—I am not aware of that. Either party has considerable facilities of driving on the other; but if neither party wishes to proceed rapidly, the thing sleeps.

12,685. Lord Barcaple.—You think there is no great harm done if they are equally willing to let it lie over?—I don't know that there is any great harm done in these circumstances. The court is doing some business.

12,686. The Chairman.—Such a thing may occur as parties not being dilatory, but only their representatives?—That may occur.

12,687. Then harm is done?—Yes.

12,688. Lord Barcaple.—And harm is done to the credit of the court, if causes occupy years, that might have been disposed of in months?—Yes.

12,689. Mr. Gordon.—The terms for pleading may be enlarged of consent?—To any extent, I believe.

12,690. Lord Barcaple.—But always by the intervention of the judge, or of the chief clerk?—Of the chief clerk.

12,691. That requires an order. The solicitors cannot do it?—Not without an order; but where there was consent, I should think an order was never refused. It must be remembered, that of the cases that are originated in the Court of Chancery, a very great many—I cannot say what fraction—are compromised. When the parties know what the case on the other side is, they generally find they have overestimated their own case a good deal, and become more willing to give and take; and, as a matter of fact, a very great many cases are compromised. I think it would not be unfair to say that a compromise is the natural end of a Chancery suit.

12,692. Mr. Webster.—Is not the wish to effect such compromises one cause of a great part of the delay?—I believe that that is so. No doubt, on the other hand, the delay causes people sometimes to compromise who would not otherwise be willing to compromise; but a great deal of the delay that takes place in court is due to the feeling on both sides, that a compromise would be the natural end of the suit.

12,693. The Chairman.—Not so much as half the cases are compromised, I suppose?—I cannot say; and I suppose it would be very difficult indeed to ascertain the statistics in any way.

12,694. Do you think it would be under or above one-half?—Cases are compromised in different stages. There are some cases which are compromised before the hearing, in which case it may be said that the thing is not fought at all. A great many other cases are compromised after decree—after the accounts have gone on to a certain extent—sometimes not only after the hearing, but after several hearings. In order to make the statistics of compromise worth anything, it would be necessary to distinguish between those cases which are compromised when all parties see their rights, with the view of just getting rid of the further proceedings in the suit, for the sake of saving a little delay and expense, and those cases which are compromised so early, that in fact the court has exercised no judicial action upon them.

12,695. Do many cases go to arbitration from the Court of Chancery?—Not many. The cases which go to arbitration, I conceive, are generally cases which it would not be desirable to discuss in open court; or else, cases which an engineer, with a view, is the proper person to decide.

12,696. A case depending upon the opinion of an expert?—Yes.

12,697. Are there considerable arrears before the judges in Chancery?—Not at the present moment, I believe.

12,698. There have been within the last few years?—The arrears have not been very serious at any time, I think, during the last few years.

12,699. Within what time after a case comes into court, after the bill is filed, may it be discussed upon its merits—I mean an average case before a Vice-Chancellor?—I think if the parties are tolerably inclined to be prompt, that a case of an ordinary description, in which full pleadings are required and considerable evidence is required, would probably take between three-fourths of a year and a year before it was heard.

12,700. When the evidence is complete, is it then put down for hearing, but not till then; or may the evidence be taken after the pleadings are completed; and does it hold its place on the roll?—As a matter of fact, causes come into the lists for hearing long before the evidence is complete, and there is no more ordinary application to the court than to strike out a cause set down for hearing for a particular day, on the ground that the evidence is not complete.

12,701. Then the three-fourths of a year would be consumed in preparation of the case, not making any allowance for arrears on the roll?—When I said three-fourths of a year to a year, I was making some allowance for delay in the court after the case was ripe to be heard.

12,702. Of course there are cases which are much longer of being heard?—There are cases much longer of being heard. There are cases in which the pleadings take a very long time indeed.

12,703. How long would you say?—I cannot put any limit to it. These are generally cases in which the parties are not in a very great hurry; but if the case is extremely complicated and the pleadings very heavy, the delay is more often to be attributed to counsel than to anybody else.

John Wickens.

12,704. But sometimes they may be two or three years in the course of completion?—I am afraid that there have been instances of such things. I don't think that there can be any excuse for the most complicated case taking nearly that time for the completion of the pleadings.

12,705. Lord Barcaple.—In what form does a Vice-Chancellor give his decision? What does he do in giving his decision, besides orally announcing his opinion?—Strictly speaking, he does nothing but orally announce his opinion.

12,706. He does not write or dictate any formal decree?—Not unless he thinks it necessary in order to avoid misconception as to what his real opinion is. In a case of great refinement and difficulty, the Vice-Chancellor would no doubt superintend the actual wording of the decree. Some judges are more inclined to do that than others; but in a case of great difficulty, I think they would generally do it. But that is the exception. The rule is that he pronounces his judgment, and that the manipulation of the decree is left with the counsel and with the registrar.

11,707. And is afterwards adjusted?—Yes.

12,708. Is that adjustment often a matter of some controversy?—Very often.

12,709. Mr. Gordon.—Controversy as to the terms in which the judgment is expressed, or as to the result?—Controversy as to the machinery to be adopted for working out what the judge intended, not generally as to the intention of the judge.

12,710. Lord Barcaple.—And the judge does not, at the time of pronouncing the judgment or afterwards, sign any document?—I believe not.

12,711. Mr. Webster.—That is to say, for the court of review?—The decision of the court of first resort in Chancery may be re-heard before the Lord Chancellor or the Lords Justices, and then there may be an appeal to the House of Lords; but before there can be an appeal to the House of Lords, it must be enrolled, which involves the signature of the Lord Chancellor, whether it be his decree or the decree of the Lords Justices; but it is a merely formal signature.

Edward William Le Riche.

EDWARD WILLIAM LE RICHE, Esq., examined.

12,712. The Chairman.—What is your profession?—I am a solicitor.

12,713. Have you had much experience?—I should say an enormous experience in common law cases.

12,714. In one particular agency house?—Yes; I was chief clerk in the largest common law house in London—Messrs. Gregory's—for more than twenty years.

12,715. Mr. Webster.—Would you describe the course of procedure in a suit at common law, particularly from the solicitor's point of view? What is it you do from the commencement to the trial of the suit?—A client consults you as to taking proceedings to recover a debt, and you write a letter for payment. Failing payment, you issue a writ, which is done in our courts by præcipe,—in Exchequer, or Queen's Bench, or Common Pleas, a writ or summons for John Jones against Thomas Thomas,—then the attorney's name and address, and the date, and you fill up the writ on parchment. You then take the præcipe with the parchment to an office called the Writ department of each court, and it is stamped with the seal of the court. Then we make a copy of it, and serve that copy, if it is to be served, in London; or we send the original to a country attorney, to effect service where the defendant resides.

12,716. Mr. Baxter.—Is the account in the cause of action in this writ? Does the defendant know what it is?—Yes; on the back of the writ it is said that the plaintiff claims so and so. Suppose I brought an action for goods supplied on the 1st of January 1869, I should say, '1st January 1869, to goods delivered, so much.'

12,717. He gets a copy of it?—Yes.

12,718. How do you serve it? Do you put it in the post office?—No; that is not allowed according to our practice. There is a mode of giving constructive service, if the defendant evades service. Then we have a mode of making three calls and leaving a copy of the writ, and applying to a judge of the superior court for an order on the defendant to appear as upon service. The order is then made, that in three days after service of that order, the action shall proceed as if personal service had been effected. After the writ is served, the defendant has eight days to appear; if he does not enter appearance, we sign judgment for want of appearance.

12,719. How is the appearance entered? Is it entered in court?—Yes; what we call in court. It is a small slip of parchment. 'In the Exchequer, John Jones, plaintiff, and Thomas Thomas, defendant. Edward William Le Riche, attorney for the defendant, appears for him.' That is filed in court with a 2s. stamp on it. The defendant is then in court. It is the practice to give notice of that appearance; that is not absolutely necessary, but it is considered courteous to do so.

12,720. Mr. Webster.—Who gives the notice?—The defendant's attorney gives notice to the plaintiff's attorney of the appearance; and 4s. is allowed for that in the taxed costs. That is the inducement for the attorney to be courteous. When the appearance is entered, the plaintiff delivers a declaration.

12,721. Mr. Baxter.—How do you mean?—One attorney sends it to the other.

12,722. Does he not put that into court at all?—No; there is a case in which it is filed in court; but that is very rare. Supposing the writ is not specially indorsed, the plaintiff has to file it in court; but that so seldom now occurs, that we either have the writ specially indorsed so as to enable us to proceed to judgment in case of need, or the defendant appears; and the third case very seldom occurs. Then we deliver our declaration, which is a printed form, headed, ' day of in the year of our Lord 1869, Middlesex, to wit (where the case is intended to be tried). John Jones sues Thomas Thomas for so much for goods sold, and for the account stated.' I am now giving the commonest form possible; and the plaintiff claims so much, being an amount sufficient to cover the debt sued for, allowing for interest.

12,723. The one attorney hands that to the other?—Yes; it is folded up, and on the back of it is just the name of the court,—Jones v. Thomas: declaration. It is addressed to the attorney who has appeared, delivered, and the defendant has to appear in eight days for judgment, the attorney delivering putting his name at the foot.

12,724. Mr. Webster.—The claim in the declaration is a claim for damage, not a claim for payment of the debt with interest? It is a claim for a sum of damage equivalent?—It is equivalent. He claims so much, being sufficient to cover the debt and supposed interest.

12,725. But the claim is for damages?—No; not in the sense in which you put it, because you must not separate the special indorsed writ from the declaration. The special indorsed writ is a claim for debt, and that must be a liquidated amount. Therefore the declaration cannot be for damages when the account is liquidated.

12,726. Mr. Baxter.—The declaration is not signed by counsel or agent?—No; the declaration is never signed.

12,727. Who prepares it?—In common cases the attorney; but if it is a little out of the way, we send it to a special pleader, and sometimes we get it done for 10s. 6d. or 7s. 6d.; but if it is a case of more importance, we send it to a barrister, and pay him one or two guineas, or more, as the case may be. Then the defendant has to plead in eight days from the delivery of the declaration.

12,728. How do you fix the date of delivery?—It bears date, and it reckons from the time of delivery.

12,729. Is the time of delivery noted on it?—The date when it is delivered is noted on it. Supposing it is delivered to-day, to-day is put on; and on the back there is a notice to plead in eight days, otherwise judgment. If the party does not plead at the expiration of the eight days, or obtain an order for time to plead, the plaintiff can sign judgment for want of a plea.

12,730. Mr. Webster.—Must the application for time be made before the expiry of the eight days, or merely before judgment has been signed?—Strictly speaking, you ought to serve the summons on the seventh day, expiring on the eighth day; but often we are driven for time, and we serve it on the eighth, and as the summonses are returnable at eleven o'clock, it stays judgment. There is rarely a case in which we do not get time. We sometimes get a day extra at a risk, but we save judgment. Supposing the defendant does not plead, we then sign judgment.

12,731. Tell us what that is?—It is a simple sheet of paper, with on the top, 'Judgment for want of plea, so much,' taking the amount specially indorsed. This is called the incipitur. You copy the portion of the declaration ending, 'The plaintiff sues So-and-so.' That is all, and you take that with the declaration to the judgment clerk; he signs the judgment, and marks it on the margin, 'Judgment signed' on such a date. Upon that, if the party has appeared, you draw out your costs, and you must give a copy of the notice to the opposite side. You then attend before the Master; the costs are taxed, the blank for the costs is supplied by the Master, and it is called the allocatur. That is the case where a party appears but does not plead.

12,732. Suppose he does not appear?—If he does not appear at all, on the specially indorsed writ, you sign judgment for want of appearance, and your costs are marked according to a regular scale, £3, 8s. or £4.

12,733. Mr. Baxter.—Have you to lead any evidence, or to substantiate your claim in any way?—None whatever, on a specially indorsed writ.

12,734. Mr. Gordon.—It is by default?—Yes.

12,735. Mr. Webster.—Suppose the judgment by default, and at a subsequent period the defendant wishes to state a defence, by what course of procedure does he get his defence stated?—He serves a summons to set aside the judgment, and to be let in to appear and defend; and that he generally supports by an affidavit disclosing merits, or some inopportune circumstance over which he had no control,—as for example, that his attorney coming to appear broke his leg. On that, the judge generally makes an order that he should be let in, he paying the costs in any event, because that is not the fault of the plaintiff. He pays the costs either then, or at the end of the suit.

12,736. The whole costs?—The costs thrown away by his not having appeared in due time. These are the only costs the Master would allow, because the writ is good for subsequent proceedings.

12,737. Mr. Gordon.—Is there any time within which that application must be made?—I know of no time.

12,738. If it has not been put to execution?—I have had it even after execution, and I have had to pay the sheriff's charges in addition to the taxed costs,—supposing the writ was a specially indorsed writ, all the costs marked on the judgment.

12,739. Mr. Webster.—Take the case now where there was appearance, and where the defender pleaded?—If the party pleads, you take the next step, which is a joinder of issue. That is done in the same way in the Court of Exchequer or Common Pleas or Queen's Bench—then the date, 'the plaintiff joins and takes issue on the defendant's plea.'

12,740. Mr. Baxter.—But what is the defendant's plea?—Supposing he pleads, the pleas are various—not guilty, never indebted, and so on.

12,741. That is not signed either?—No.

12,742. And it has just the attorney's name on the back of it?—No pleadings are signed now. Many years ago they used to be signed.

12,743. All the authentication is the attorney's name on the back?—Yes; but the attorney, of course, is liable to his court to be struck off the roll for malpractice.

12,744. Mr. Webster.—Who prepares the defendant's plea?—I should prepare all my common pleas, but not my special pleas. There is no reason why I should take the responsibility of doing so, when the charge would be allowed me in costs. I would say, what is fairly allowable against the client I don't see why I should take the responsibility of, and I might be better employed doing something else.

12,745. Mr. Baxter.—The defendant's pleas are very short?—Now they are, but I have had very long pleas. I was taxing some pleas to-day, where the pleas were 15 folios of 72 words.

12,746. Mr. Webster.—How many writs did that consist of?—I speak of the pleas themselves.

12,747. Lord Barcaple.—Was the bulk of that long paper occupied with statement of fact?—Yes. In the case I refer to, it was setting out a composition deed.

12,748. And it was set out in extenso?—Yes.

12,749. Mr. Webster.—You were describing the joining issue to us?—Yes. Supposing the plea is 'never indebted,' then there is the replication which is now called the joinder of issue. The special replications are different things altogether,—that is, perhaps that they traverse, or are in confession and avoidance; but if it is simply joinder of issue, as if I say, 'I am never indebted,' the plaintiff joins issue: 'therefore, etc.—therefore let the jury come.' Then a copy is made of the whole proceedings, including the declaration, plea, and the order to let the jury come; and the only alteration is that you introduce, 'who has been summoned to answer by virtue of a writ issued on such a day.' You put in the date in the issue, so that when the record is engrossed, it may appear on the face of the proceedings when the action was commenced. You fill that up, and then put on the back, 'In the Queen's Bench, issue, so and so—Mr. —— defendant's attorney, etc.,—Take notice in this cause for the first sittings at Michaelmas term, to be holden at Westminster Hall, or at Guildhall, or at the assizes at Liverpool, in and for the West Derby Division of the county of Lancashire,' as the case may be.

12,750. All this time have these pleadings not been in court?—Not one of them. That completes the issue and the notice of the trial.

12,751. Mr. Webster.—The defendant's solicitor is in possession of that?—He is in possession of a fair copy of it. Then you have to engross it upon parchment. The next step is to set down the cause for trial.

12,752. Mr. Baxter.—Have you to get the leave of the court for that?—No; you put that upon a slip of paper, paying £2, and in due time you lodge the record. You engross the record on parchment, which is a fac simile copy of the issue, the names of the parties, and the name of the attorney lodging. That is lodged, and it takes its place in the list. I should state that we have to annex to the record copies of all the particulars delivered in the action, whether they be particulars of the plaintiff's demand or of the defendant's set-off. By rule of court, we must annex that. You also get a common jury panel, if it is to be tried by a common jury, which is a list on paper of the jurymen to be summoned for that particular place, Middlesex or London, as the case may be. The particulars and that list are annexed to the record, and lodged with the associate. £2 are paid; and he enters it on the list, and it takes its position for trial in due course.

12,753. Mr. Webster.—If the trial be in the metropolis, the associate retains that in his custody; but how is it if the trial takes place at the assizes?—Then you send the record to a correspondent.

12,754. The London solicitor sends it to a correspondent?—Yes; to be lodged with the associate at the opening of the Commission.

12,755. Mr. Gordon.—Or the assize clerk?—Yes, at the opening of the Commission. Directly the Commission is opened, he appears in order to get an early entry; but if he wants a late entry, he delays the entry accordingly.

12,756. Can they not be entered till the Commission is opened?—No.

12,757. Mr. Webster.—Do the trials commence immediately after the Commission is opened?—No; not on Commission day, as a rule.

12,758. Lord Barcaple.—In the event of the case having been conducted by the London solicitor on his own account, and not an agent for a country solicitor, does he generally go down to the assizes to take charge of his own case?—There is a practice that the Masters pursue in allowing costs, that the attorney is entitled to follow his record. Strictly speaking, he might be at the assize town on the Commission day, and so de die in diem till the case is tried; but we generally send our records to be entered, and arrange that we shall be telegraphed for when we are likely to be required with our witnesses.

12,759. But the London solicitor goes down ultimately, or his head clerk?—Clearly; unless he likes to trust an agent; which would not be wise if it is an important case.

12,760. Then he does not generally trust an agent?—No; we should not do that if it was an important cause.

12,761. Mr. Webster.—Is there any other procedure before the matter comes before the jury?—No; I think I have stated in substance all that takes place. If you mean as regards interlocutory proceedings, there are a great many sometimes. There are summonses to inspect, summonses for interrogatories, summonses for discovery, summonses for time to plead, and for particulars.

12,762. Mr. Baxter.—These are before the Master?—Yes; except interrogatories and discovery, and that is reserved for the judges; but we go by consent sometimes before the Masters to save time. There are also summonses to change the venue.

12,763. Lord Barcaple.—The interrogatories for discovery require to be answered upon oath?—Yes.

12,764. Is that a form of procedure often adopted?—Very often; and it is a course which I generally recommend in every case if there is the slightest doubt. I have actually succeeded in causes by getting answers to interrogatories.

12,765. And you shorten your evidence afterwards?—Yes.

12,766. Mr. Gordon.—That is to say, the pleadings do not disclose the real facts of the case?—The pleadings disclose very little. For instance, if I plead 'never indebted,' you cannot tell what my ground may be. It may be partnership, or a great many defences would come under that. It gives no information whatever.

12,767. Mr. Webster.—It is only by discovery that you come to know?—You know a good deal by that. For instance, the other day I succeeded in a case by exhibiting interrogatories, which I am certain I could not have succeeded in but for the answers. Sometimes a party makes bold to swear very strong in answer; but if he makes a different statement afterwards, he is asked if he did not swear to such a thing in reply to such an interrogatory, and how he reconciles the answer he now gives with that. That is very beneficial sometimes.

12,768. Does the discovery investigation include the getting access to documents and books?—No, that is a distinct thing. If you don't know what documents your opponent has, you generally make an affidavit, and serve a summons for discovery, and in that affidavit you set out, if you possibly can, that there is one document,—marking it as well as you can; and upon that the judges will invariably give an order in general terms for all documents. Then you get, in your answer to that, a list of all the documents. Upon that you serve a summons; and the party generally states in answer to that, that he does not object to give inspection of such and such documents. He sometimes puts them in two schedules, and says, 'The deponent does not object to give inspection and copies of the documents mentioned in schedule 1, but he does object to give inspection or copies of the documents mentioned in schedule 2.' Thereupon the opposite party serves a summons to inspect, if he chooses, the whole of the documents, and raises the point before the judge whether he should not have, not only inspection of those that his opponent is willing to grant, but those that he is unwilling to grant inspection of; and his Lordship decides that. That inspection is had at the cost of the applicant, who pays 6s. 8d. per hour generally, and 4d. per folio for the copies; and that he cannot get from the opposite party. It is analogous to the old system in the Court of Chancery for a bill of discovery simply. In order to get the costs, you must make it a bill of discovery, and something else. Upon that we serve a subsequent order for the inspection and getting the copies, and we use them for our own purposes afterwards in the suit.

12,769. Mr. Webster.—Suppose the genuineness of the document to be matter of dispute, and you wish to have evidence upon that point, the document being in the hands of the opposite party, what do you do?—To test the signature to see whether it is a forgery?

12,770. Yes?—We would swear an affidavit. I had a case of that sort the other day, which was decided adversely to me. I sued upon a promissory note. Unfortunately, I sued as executor; the testator was of course dead, and the only witness to prove the writing was a lunatic; consequently I was without any proof whatever. I then exhibited interrogatories to get the party's answers. He still kept to the fact that he had never signed any document or paid any interest, whereby to take it out of the operation of the statute of limitations. He made a counter application for inspection of the note, on the ground that he did not recollect that he had ever signed it; and an order was made, and he had inspection of the note, so that he could test his own signature to see whether it was genuine or not.

12,771. The document, however, remaining in your hands?—Yes. We are not bound to part with the document. He is bound to follow and inspect the document where it is. We are not bound to send our document through the post, at the risk of loss.

12,772. Mr. Campbell.—Take the case of a tradesman's books, which, on inspection, have a certain appearance of being tampered with, in so far as entries look as if they had been made at dates subsequent to the dates they bear, and had been interpolated for the purpose of furthering the particular claims which may be made in the suit. How would you get access to the original books in such a case as that?—The only ground on which you can have a right to inspect the books and documents in the custody of another person is, that they help your case. Therefore you have to show prima facie in your affidavit that they will support your case. Once you have done that on affidavit, you get an order to inspect the books; but you would have to go and inspect them where they are.

12,773. But if you wanted to elicit that before the judge or the jury?—You can subpœna the party to produce his books; or if he is a party to the cause, you may give him notice to produce his books.

12,774. Mr. Webster.—You mentioned that the London solicitor usually attended the trial, though it took place in the country: is it usual for a country solicitor to attend the trial of a cause in London?—No; the converse of the proposition is not correct in fact. The Masters say that the agent in town is, as a rule, much more qualified to attend the trial in London, and therefore they won't allow for the country attorney, as a rule, coming up; but there are certain cases of very great importance when they do allow it. These, however, are exceptional.

12,775. Mr. Gordon.—Suppose the country agent was to come up, and that no charge was made for the town agent, would the country agent get his travelling expenses and time while travelling?—No; he would get so much as the town agent would have got; that is, 13s. 4d. for watching every day till the cause came on, and 2 guineas for the day that the cause was tried.

12,776. Lord Barcaple.—The country solicitor cannot, I suppose, in practice conduct even the previous part of the proceedings before the trial, except through an agent in London?—It is quite impossible, unless in the case of an attorney who lived within twenty or thirty miles of London, and had an office in London.

12,777. He must have an office within a certain number of miles of the General Post Office?—Yes; and he must also take out the London certificate.

12,778. In addition to the certificate he holds?—No; one certificate, for which he must pay a little more.

12,779. Mr. Webster.—Would you describe to us the forms of recording the verdict, and of dealing with the verdict when the trial is in the metropolis, and also when the trial has been in the country?—They are synonymous, as a rule. I don't know any distinction at this moment. In London the jury are sworn; the junior counsel for the plaintiff opens the pleadings; then the senior counsel states the case, and they call witnesses to prove their case; the defendant answers, and then the verdict is entered. In fourteen days after that, unless the judge gives a speedier execution, I get my judgment. I apply to the associate for what is called the postea—called so, because it commences with the word 'afterwards;' it is indorsed in the fold of the record, and it gives the findings of the jury,—Afterwards so and so, before the Hon. Mr. Justice So-and-so, the jury found so and so. We take out this postea after the expiration of the fourteen days, or at the limit of the time of the speedy execution given by the judge, and we sign judgment. That is taken to the judgment clerk; we then tax costs, and the allocatur is taken on the postea, and execution then issues.

12,780. That is where the verdict is not to be disturbed by either party?—Yes; and I know of no distinction, so far as the trial goes, in the country.

12,781. Can you explain to us the working of references made by a judge to a Master?—Under the Common Law Procedure Act, you apply in matters of account for an order to refer to the Master.

12,782. Without any previous judicial proceeding?—You must have your action.

12,783. Mr. Gordon.—Is that after the pleas are given in?—No.; you need not wait for pleadings. Directly the writ is issued, either party may make application to have it referred to the Master, if he makes affidavit that it is a mere matter of account. The other side may oppose that, and say that it is not a matter of account, and the judge determines that question. Suppose he comes to the conclusion that it is a matter of account, and that the order ought to be issued, an order is drawn up that it be referred to one of the Masters, he having all the powers of a judge sitting at nisi prius as to amendments, and so forth. You then take the original order to one of the Masters, and get an appointment to proceed on the reference. Having got the appointment from him, you serve the copy order with the appointment on the opposite party. Then the attorney, if he has any witnesses to call, draws out an authority from the judge's clerk to give him so many orders for the attendance of witnesses. He gives the names, and he is entitled to put four witnesses, as in our common subpœnas, in each order. He gets that order, and pays 5s. for it.

12,784. Mr. Webster.—The opposite party getting no notice of who the witnesses are?—He gets no notice. We then serve the copy of the order containing the time that the Master has appointed for proceeding on the reference; we serve that on the witnesses, and they attend, and are sworn and examined before the Master. Supposing he cannot complete it that day, he gives another appointment, and we serve further orders, and go on till the matter is completed.

12,785. Is that usually done by counsel or by the solicitor?—It is very often done before the Master by attorneys; but counsel also attend continually.

12,786. Mr. Baxter.—And then the Master gives his certificate?—Yes; generally on the back of the order. I had a case the other day in which the question was whether I should get £100 odd, and the Master gave me an order for £60; he said, 'I certify for the plaintiff £60, the defendant to pay all costs.' In the order of reference the costs of the action abide the event, but the costs of the reference are in the discretion of the Master.

12,787. Do you go back to the court with the Master's certificate?—If it is a compulsory reference, you are entitled to apply at the expiration of seven days to one of the judges to obtain a judgment on the Master's certificate, unless very good reason is shown before the judge that the Master is mistaken; and then his Lordship would send it back to the Master; but in the long experience that I have had, I don't think I ever had a case where the party successfully resisted an award made in that way.

12,788. Lord Barcaple.—As matter of form, is it necessary in all cases with the Master's certificate to get a judgment or award of the judge?—Not in all cases. That would require some explanation. I mentioned expressly as to the compulsory clauses. You get your judgment seven days after the award, unless the judge, upon the hearing of the summons, should be of opinion that it ought not to be granted. If the award is by consent, you have to enforce it in a different manner; you have to make the order of reference a rule of court, and move for an attachment or a rule to show cause why the party should not pay the sum awarded.

12,789. You have to move in court for that?—Yes. That is a different thing altogether. But I now provide in all orders for reference by consent that the party in whose favour the award is made shall have judgment, and that gets rid of the necessity of applying for a rule. I cannot do that in the compulsory orders; but if it could be done in these, it would save the necessity of serving a summons for judgment.

12,790. You get your judgment by going before the clerk?—Yes, by going with the necessary papers before the clerk who signs the judgments.

12,791. Mr. Justice Willes.—Do you suppose the summons to be necessary in which one makes an order to sign judgment on a Master's award?—Your Lordship has the same view of that matter as Mr. Baron Bramwell, but I don't know that it is ever done. I told the judgment clerk the other day that I was satisfied it was not necessary after the fourteen days.

12,792. I have always thought it unnecessary to take out a summons before the judge. In compulsory references I think the certificate of the Master equivalent to a verdict; and I should have thought that you might sign judgment upon it, though the practice is to take out a summons?—I know that Baron Bramwell said in his opinion it did not require an order after fourteen days.

12,793. Mr. Gordon.—Are there any pleadings given in to the referee by the parties?—No.

12,794. Does he occasionally order them to give in a statement of their case?—No.

12,795. Is there no record preserved of the nature of the disputes that arise before him?—None whatever, unless it is a reference after the pleadings, after the case is at issue. It is the practice of some attorneys not to refer, if they can possibly help it, till the case is at issue, that they may then know the case intended to be set up; but there is no necessity for that.

12,796. Do you file interrogatories calling on the party to answer?—No, not of necessity.

12,797. How is it known what proceedings have taken place before the referee in the event of there being a challenge?—You cannot tell unless there are pleadings, except so far as the plaintiff is concerned. He, on the back of his writ, has indorsed his claim.

12,798. But it may arise on the defence?—Then you cannot tell; but no injury is likely to result before the Master from that, because he is master of his own proceedings, and will adjourn from time to time if the plaintiff is taken by surprise, so that he may have ample time.

12,799. Does he preserve notes of the evidence?—Yes, he takes down the evidence.

12,800. And notes of the pleading or argument?—He takes the heads of the points taken; but he always takes the evidence.

Edward William Le Riche.

12,801. Mr. Justice Willes.—He always has his note; and if any complaint is made, we let the case stand over till the Master is in his place in court, and then he produces his note, and explains to the court, in the presence of the parties or their counsel, what really took place. I never knew any difficulty as to what took place before the Master?—I have never known any.

12,802. Mr. Webster.—Have investigations into matters of disputed fact and disputed accounts been conducted satisfactorily to the members of the profession? Has it been found a satisfactory way of unravelling these matters?—On the whole it has. We do it greatly to save expense. The only objection I see to it is this, that sometimes, from the pressure of business, it is a long while coming on. I have just completed a case which I think lasted for four months altogether. My opponent was a very contentious man. He obtained a certificate that he was ill, and there were all manner of excuses of that kind, and the Master did not like to proceed ex parte.

12,803. Mr. Baxter.—But I suppose that does not often happen?—No; but the objection to the references to Masters is, that they are so much engaged with taxing costs, and probably examining witnesses and other matters, and in attending court. The other day, when I was at the Court of Exchequer, two Masters were in the court at Westminster, one was at judges' chambers under the new régime, and two were holding references, so that there was not a single Master to tax bills of costs. In that way it operates to the detriment of the suitor sometimes; but, as a rule, I should say that the references were satisfactory.

12,804. Mr. Webster.—And very inexpensive as compared with jury trial?—Very, in certain cases. But as a matter of fact, the costs of references and trials greatly vary according to circumstances and the importance and nature of the cases. Voluntary arbitrations are sometimes less and sometimes much more expensive than trials. I had a reference about a year ago in which the number of meetings was between twenty and thirty, and the arbitrator charged about £400 for his fees.

12,805. Would you say that the result was more or less satisfactory than the result of a jury trial?—If I had a case in which I had a witness who would be a hard swearer, I would not have a reference, but I would bring him before the judge and before the jury. But if I had a doubtful case, where possibly justice would be done without technicality, I should be more likely to succeed before an arbitrator, as he would take a more lenient view, and a judge would hold more to the strict law. I would venture to suggest for the consideration of the Commissioners, that another mode of disposing of actions in addition to the present modes by arbitration and trial before jury should be instituted. Both these modes have their advantages and disadvantages; and as it is the opinion of many that juries can be safely dispensed with in all cases except criminal cases, and which is evidenced by the number of references to lay and legal arbitrators, I would suggest that the judges be required to try cases without juries if both parties should consent, and that there should be the same appeal from the judge's decision as at present, unless the parties should agree to the decision of the judge being final.

12,806. Lord Barcaple.—In the proceedings before the Master, do counsel appear?—Yes; they may attend if they choose.

12,807. Is it common to have counsel?—Yes; you have counsel there as much as attorneys. Counsel are allowed.

12,808. In the event of the case being one which if it went to a jury would be a short cause, tried in an hour or two, from what does it result that the procedure before a Master is so much less expensive? If there are counsel before the Master, and if the proceedings are very apt to go off in consequence of his being otherwise engaged, how does it come that the expense is usually much less before a Master than before a jury?—A plaintiff going before a jury must always have two counsel; but upon a reference he never has more than one, unless in large railway references. In jury trials also, witnesses have frequently to wait for days till prior cases are disposed of; whereas in references a day is fixed, and the case must come on.

12,809. Mr. Gordon.—May the Master not grant delay?—Yes; but if a party applies for a postponement of a trial or a reference, he may have to pay the cost of the day.

12,810. After a portion of the proof has been led, does the Master generally adjourn to enable witnesses to be brought forward?—Yes; that is one great advantage in references. If we find that our case, from some unforeseen circumstance, is not strong enough, the Master would, on intimation that we could prove certain facts, but that we had been taken by surprise, adjourn the case for that purpose, in order that justice might be done.

12,811. Lord Barcaple.—Is the detention of witnesses a heavy portion of the expense of a jury trial?—I think so, especially if they come from a distance. I have a case where the witnesses will come from Yorkshire, and I cause one of my clerks to watch every afternoon whether it is in the paper for the following day, so that I might telegraph immediately for the witnesses to travel all night.

12,812. But the witnesses must make the same journey, whether the case is before a Master or before a jury?—But before a Master they come with the certainty of being heard. In the other case they may be kept two or three days, even when the case is on the paper; and in order to save expense as much as possible, I never bring up the witnesses till it is in the paper.

12,813. Have you not trials during term?—Yes; in Middlesex.

12,814. Are you not better aware of the day on which the case may come on there than in cases taken at the sittings?—It is the same thing. There are sittings in term, and sittings after term. There used to be certain sittings in London and in Middlesex (at Westminster Hall and Guildhall). Now there are no sittings in term, but only sittings nisi prius at Westminster Hall, and after term they take the sittings in London.

12,815. Mr. Gordon.—Why have you not sent the Yorkshire case which you have mentioned to the assizes at York?—I am the defendant in that case; but I will explain why it is not done. There is an assize after Hilary term, and there is no assize for the trial of causes after Easter term, which brings you down to August. I could try a case during Easter term, and get my judgment earlier; all I want is 26 days to get to trial,—8 days on the appearance, 8 days on the declaration, and 10 days' notice of trial.

12,816. The plaintiff resorted to Middlesex, then, to avoid three or four months' delay?—Exactly.

12,817. Would the expense of trying the case at York be greater or less than the expense of trying it in Middlesex?—That is very doubtful, because at the assizes you may be kept for ten days. I had a case in which I was concerned for a person in the city of London: the venue was laid in Liverpool, the cause of action arose there, and most of the witnesses were there. I was for the defendant, and I was ten days waiting for that cause. I came within two of it once, when the special juries intervened; and until the second judge disposed of the criminal business, my case could not get on.

12,818. If a case is important, do you often take leading counsel down specially?—That is not done often. It must be a very heavy case indeed in which that is done.

12,819. I suppose the facilities afforded by railway travelling make it cheaper now to have cases tried in London than it used to be?—Very much; and the power of telegraphing also makes a very great difference.

12,820. Mr. Webster.—Would you explain the system of dealing with the fees as between principal and agent, where a solicitor in the country employs a London solicitor?—They can make their own arrangements. I am sorry to say that some attorneys take less than others; but the usual rule is equal division. Some houses also say, 'It is not fair that we should keep a large staff of clerks, and pay a heavy rent, and also pay a stationer for copying, and you get the nett half of the profits;' and therefore some agents in certain cases have taken 2½d., and let the balance go to the attorney in the country—that is 2½d. to one, and 1½d. to the other. But, as a rule, they divide it equally; and supposing the charge to be 4d. a folio for copying, that is 2d. to each.

12,821. That applies to the charges by the London solicitor?—Yes.

12,822. And not to the charges by the solicitor in the country?—The London solicitor has no share of the country attorney's charges.

12,823. The London solicitor makes the outlays?—Yes; taking care, if he can, to get something on account from the principal. But he makes the outlay, and does all the London work.

12,824. Mr. Gordon.—Does he charge interest on the outlay?—No. Some houses give notice to their clients that after a year they will charge interest upon the balance.

12,825. Lord Barcaple.—Are there a considerable number of causes which come to be decided by the full court without having been in any form before a single judge?—No.

12,826. I refer to cases which come before the full court on demurrer and on special cases, where the full court dispose of the cause without its ever having been in any form before a single judge, unless it may be for interlocutory orders at chambers?—The only cases I remember are cases which come up on special cause or upon demurrer. These come before the full court.

12,827. Are these cases pretty numerous?—Yes; there are a great many of these cases; and then the special case would determine the action. You could have an appeal on the special case, and go to the court above with it, according to the Common Law Procedure Act; but in the case of a demurrer, supposing the demurrer by the defendant was after the declaration, as not disclosing a cause of action, if the court were of opinion that the plaintiff had no cause of action, the demurrer would dispose of it. But they would still be entitled to bring error upon the judgment of the court, which would be argued in the court of appeal called the Exchequer Chamber.

12,828. But these are cases which are disposed of by the full court upon the law of the case?—Yes.

12,829. There being no question of fact before them at all?—No; but it is very seldom that there is only a demurrer, and not a plea raising questions of fact. You seldom find a case where there are not issues of fact as well as law.

12,830. In such cases where there is a demurrer, and also a plea upon fact, the demurrer is first disposed of, is it not?—Not of necessity.

12,831. But is it frequently so?—I don't know whether you could say frequently, because it very often happens that we can get a trial before we can get the demurrer argued, and it often happens that if the fact is decided for us, there is no need of the demurrer. I have just had a case where a composition deed was set up, and there was a demurrer. The defendant did not attend at the assizes in time; and consequently he did not prove his deed, and the verdict went against him. On that the plaintiff applied to strike out his demurrer, because there was no occasion for him to try the question of law when the other party had not proved his issues in fact; and he got his judgment.

12,832. But where the case does go upon demurrer before the full court without any trial at all, and where the judgment is favourable to the defendant, the cause is disposed of upon the law. Have you found any difficulty in getting the question well raised, so as to be quite intelligible to the full court, without its having been in any form dealt with before a single judge previously?—No.

12,833. Do the court or the counsel seem to find a difficulty in making the whole case perfectly intelligible, so that it may be judged of in the first instance by the full court?—You mean that by the demurrer limiting the question to be decided, not having the facts before the court, they cannot satisfactorily decide the demurrer?

12,834. No; not exactly. There may be questions of law, and the case may be one of some complexity; but is there any difficulty found in making it quite intelligible to the whole court, so as to admit quite readily of their forming an opinion on it?—I have never experienced any; but I have known cases where it would have been better that the facts had been first ascertained.

12,835. Does it frequently happen that, when a case goes to trial, it turns out, on the case being opened and explained, that truly the whole doubtful matter in the case, and the whole thing about which there is any real dispute, is a matter of law?—There are cases unquestionably which turn out to be mere questions of law.

12,836. Are they frequent?—I have known many of them; but the majority certainly require facts to be elicited first.

12,837. When they do turn out to be matter merely of law, the procedure at the trial is, I suppose, very much lost labour and lost money?—It would be to a certain extent lost labour; but if the facts are short, they would soon be disposed of, and you could raise the question of law upon the facts as proved.

12,838. But the facts are disposed of at great expense if there is a jury trial?—Yes; but the expense is very much less than it used to be, by reason of the facilities given by railway and telegraph.

12,839. Mr. Gordon.—Have you found any inconvenience resulting from the practice, which I understand exists in English courts, of producing documents at the trial without exhibiting them to the other party, or giving notice of your intention to adduce them at the trial?—If you want a document which is in the possession of a third party, you serve a subpœna duces tecum for him to produce it.

12,840. Is that communicated to your opponent?—It is not, for it would not be advisable at all times that your opponent should know the documents you intend to give in evidence. In some cases it might.

12,841. But supposing you have a document in your possession, the contents of which may be quite unknown to your opponent, you are entitled to produce it at the trial without giving him notice that you have such a document, or that you are going to call on another party to produce it. Does that lead to injustice or surprise?—I have known cases where it has led to injustice in this way, that it has necessitated an application for a new trial afterwards, on the ground of surprise. But, on the other hand, I should be very loath to let my case be known to my opponent.

12,842. Lord Barcaple.—Do you often see a failure of justice arising from that?—I don't think so. If it is a document which you are entitled to inspect, you can get an order to inspect it.

12,843. Mr. Webster.—If you know of it?—Yes; but you cannot provide for all cases.

TUESDAY, 4TH MAY 1869.

Members Present:—

THE LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.
MR. JUSTICE WILLES.
LORD BARCAPLE.
E. S. GORDON, Esq., Q.C.
JAMES CAMPBELL, Esq.
JAMES ADAM, Esq.
J. B. BAXTER, Esq.

THE LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL IN THE CHAIR.

Henry Cadogan Rothery.

HENRY CADOGAN ROTHERY, Esq., examined.

12,844. The Chairman.—You are Registrar of the Admiralty Court?—I am.

12,845. Have you been long in that office?—Since 1853.

12,846. Do you hold any other office?—I am also Registrar of Her Majesty in Ecclesiastical and Admiralty causes in connection with the Privy Council.

12,847. You are a member of the Judicature Commission in England?—I am.

12,848. We are anxious to learn something of the course of proceedings in the Admiralty Court,—of the form of pleadings, among other things?—The form of pleading in the Admiralty Court is, I think, as simple as it is in any court. The rule with respect to pleading is, that 'every pleading shall be divided into short paragraphs, numbered consecutively, which shall be called the articles of the pleadings, and shall contain brief statements of the facts material to the issue.'

12,849. These are statements of fact, without law?—Without law.

12,850. By what form of writ is a process commenced in the Admiralty Court?—It is commenced by a præcipe, which the proctor or solicitor fills up, and brings into the Registry. That is the first step. The form of the præcipe is this: 'I, A B, of ——, do institute a cause of —— (damage or salvage) on behalf of ——.' Thereupon an entry is made in the cause-book; the cause has a number given to it; and that number, which is called the distinguishing number of the cause, is thenceforth marked upon every paper in the cause, so that it is readily known to what cause any paper belongs.

12,851. Mr. Gordon.—Does that number continue just for a year?—No; it runs on.

12,852. The Chairman.—How is the defence brought into court?—Sometimes the defendant has notice of the institution of the cause from the plaintiff's solicitor, and comes in voluntarily; often, however, the plaintiff's proctor proceeds to take out a warrant of arrest against the property, if it is a proceeding in rem, which most Admiralty causes are. But to entitle him to a warrant, he must show that he has a primâ facie case; that is, that the court has jurisdiction, and that he has a reasonable ground of action. Thereupon a warrant issues for the arrest of the vessel, which the proctor leaves with the marshal, who executes it through the collector of the customs at the port where the vessel happens to be.

12,853. The service is done under the direction of the court?—It is. Before I was Registrar, and for a short time afterwards, the practice used to be for the solicitor himself to serve the warrant through his own agent, thus, as it were, transferring the property to the defendant's possession. This practice, however, was attended with much inconvenience; and accordingly, in concurrence with the Treasury, we obtained permission to employ the collectors of customs in the different ports, to act as substitutes of the marshal; and it is through the collectors of customs that the arrest is made. One great advantage resulting from the present practice is, that the collector knows pretty nearly where every ship in the port is, and he has greater power, than an ordinary person would have, to prevent the vessel leaving.

12,854. Mr. Gordon.—In London the marshal does it?—Yes.

12,855. Mr. Baxter.—How does the defendant get notice?—The notice is served upon the ship itself. In a proceeding in rem, the proceeding is against the res, and against all persons having any interest in the property, who are cited to come in and protect their interests. The warrant is in these terms: 'Victoria, &c., to the marshal, &c., and to his substitutes.—Whereas a cause of —— has been instituted in our said court on behalf of —— against —— in the sum of ——, we therefore hereby command you to arrest the said vessel, and to keep the same under safe arrest until you shall receive further orders from us, and to cite all persons who have or claim to have any right, title, or interest in the said vessel, to enter within six days from the service hereof (exclusive of the day of such service) in the registry of our said court, an appearance in the said cause. We further command you to warn all the said persons that, if they do not enter an appearance as aforesaid, the judge of our said court will proceed to determine the said cause, or make such order therein as to him shall seem right.' The proceeding is against the res, and the presumption is, that there is always somebody in possession of this res, who will inform the parties who have an interest to appear and protect their interests.

12,856. The Chairman.—The form of that writ which you have just read seems to be a command to the officer who is to execute it, to give warning to parties?—It is.

12,857. But that is not done?—It is done in this way: the warrant is served on the ship, by showing the warrant to the person actually in charge of the ship, and by leaving affixed to the mast, or to some part of the vessel, a true copy of it. That is considered to be a sufficient service.
